On the 20th day of March, 1913, the defendant Nathan Wise was the entryman upon a homestead of the United States government consisting of 160 acres, located in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and particularly described as follows, to wit: The northwest one-quarter of section 5, township 1 S., range 18 W., S. B. M. Said Nathan Wise (to be designated hereinafter as defendant) as such entryman then and there was and continued to be in possession of said property until the 24th day of April, 1916, when a patent was issued to defendant for said land by the government of the United States; that ever since the last-mentioned date said defendant continued to be the owner in fee of said property. On said 20th day of March, 1913, plaintiff made and entered into a written agreement with said defendant and said Alford Wise in substance as follows: That whereas defendant had been in possession of said property under an entry of homestead from the United States government, had made certain improvements thereon, and was about to commute the said homestead and receive patent thereon; in consideration of the sum of $1,100 paid by plaintiff to defendant, the receipt whereof was acknowledged, said defendant agreed that when he had completed the commutation with the said United States government and had received his final receipt therefor, he would grant to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in and to said property, together with the improvements thereon. It was further provided in said agreement that should defendant fail to procure or receive said patent the parties thereto would make a settlement, which has no concern in this appeal and need not be considered.

On the 17th day of February, 1913, defendant offered commutation proof in the land office of the United States at Los Angeles, Cal., of his homestead entry of the above-described property; on the 17th day of January, 1916, he completed said commutation proof, and on the 24th day of April, 1916, the United States land office granted a patent to said land to defendant, which was received by him on the 15th day of May, 1916.

The defendant having failed to execute said grant to the plaintiff, he has brought this action for the specific performance of said agreement, and that said defendant be adjudged to sell and convey an undivided one-half interest in and to said premises and improvements thereon unto plaintiff, and to execute a good and sufficient deed of said interest to plaintiff.

While the answer of the defendant herein contains certain denials of the averments of the complaint, it was stipulated upon the trial that all the allegations of the complaint are true.

The only defenses urged by the defendant to this action were: First. The plaintiff is estopped from enforcing the specific performance of said contract for the reason that Israel Botwin had filed a contest against the defendant for the homestead right, upon the ground that Nathan Wise was not a citizen of the United States, and hence not entitled to a homestead; and second, the contract which plaintiff seeks to enforce is in contravention of the United States statutes.

[1] Upon the first ground of defense the evidence established the fact that said Israel Botwin did file the contest above referred to, said contest was decided adversely to Botwin. The patent to the land was granted to Wise, which is conclusive proof that said contest was unfounded and of no merit. This contest, we now hold, was not prejudicial to the rights of Israel Botwin to maintain this action, for it established the legal right of Wise to the patent, did the latter no harm, but cleared his title to the land which he had contracted to sell to Botwin. This ground of defense is therefore unavailing to defendant.

[2] Upon the second ground of defense the defendant has neither presented nor cited any statutes of the United States declaring that a contract, such as that set out in the complaint, was illegal and void. We find, however, that the courts have very carefully considered such contracts and have established their validity. In the case of Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291, 20 L. Ed. 562, the court said:

"The object of Congress was attained when the pre-emptor went, with clean hands, to the land office and proved up his right, and paid the government for his land. Restriction upon the power of alienation after this would injure the pre-emptor, and could serve no important purpose of public policy. * * * The legislation was directed against the assignment or transfer of the right secured by the act, which was the right of pre-emption, leaving the pre-emptor free to sell his land after the entry, if at that time he was, in good faith, the owner of the land, and had done nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the law on the subject."

See, also, Merrill v. Clark, 103 Cal. 367, 37 Pac. 238. These decisions clearly determine the present controversy. There is no merit in this appeal.

[3] In the present case the appellant has manifested a spirit of indifference which invites the criticism of this court. No reply brief was filed by appellant in response to respondent's brief. No stipulation was entered into between the parties that the matter should be submitted upon the briefs on file. Counsel for respondent, having traveled from Los Angeles to San Francisco, appeared before the court and argued his cause. The court, finding there was no merit in the appeal, now concludes that there was no reason for such appeal, except for delay.

It is therefore ordered that, in addition to the costs of this appeal, respondent recover from appellant the sum of $100 as damages on account of the appeal herein having been "made for delay."

The judgment is affirmed.

In re SEICK et al. (Civ. 2559.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 26, 1920.)

1. Statutes $\Leftrightarrow$ 227—Whether statute is mandatory or directory depends on object and consequences of different construction.

Whether a particular statutory provision is mandatory or directory depends upon the intention of the Legislature, to be ascertained from a consideration of the object of the statute and the consequences that would result from construing it one way or the other.

2. Taxation $\Leftrightarrow$ 726—Sale only starts running the five years allowed for redemption.

The only practical effect of a sale of property under Pol. Code, § 3771, relating to tax sales, is to start running the five years within which redemption can be effected and at the expiration of which a deed may be issued to the state, as provided by section 3785.

3. Taxation $\Leftrightarrow$ 699—Five-year redemption period is not postponed until filing of notice under land title law.

The commencement of the five-year redemption period provided under Pol. Code, § 3771, relating to tax sales, is not postponed until the filing of the notice that Land Title Law, § 77, required to be filed in all cases where property brought under the provisions of the Torrens law is sold.

4. Records $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(3)—Prime purpose of Torrens law stated.

The prime purpose of Land Title Law, § 77, is that there shall be in the registrar's office in the book known as the "register of titles" a leaf or folium to which any person dealing with any particular piece of land that has been brought under the act may look in order to ascertain the exact condition of the title before purchasing, leasing, or loaning money secured by a mortgage.

5. Records $\Leftrightarrow$ 9(13/4)—Tax sale of property registered under Torrens law is nullified by failure to file statutory notice within five days.

A tax sale under Pol. Code, § 3771, of property brought under the provisions of the Torrens law is nullified where notice of the sale is not filed within five days, as required by Land Title Law, § 77, producing a situation such as would exist had no tax sale ever been made or attempted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

In the matter of the application of Julius Seick and others for initial registration of title to land. From an order directing the register of titles to enter memorial of tax sale as prior lien to a new mortgage on certificate of title, owner and mortgagee appeal. Order reversed, with directions.

Earl Newmire, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and J. Allen Davis, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Prior to June 27, 1917, Xenophon Bouris was, and is, the "registered owner" of a lot in Los Angeles county, registered under the Land Title Law, an initiative measure adopted by the people at the election of November 3, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1932), whereby a system for the registration of land titles is provided. This law is of the class commonly known as Torrens laws, the designation being taken from the name of Sir Robert Torrens, by whom the first Torrens law, enacted in South Australia in 1858, was drawn. On June 27, 1917, the county tax collector sold the lot in question to the state by declaring it sold and making on the delinquent assessment list the entry "Sold to the State," as provided by section 3771 of the Political Code. He did not, however, file with the county register of titles any notice of such sale within five days thereafter, as required by section 77 of the Land Title Law.

The Torrens law provides a complete scheme of procedure whereby, as the result of a decree of court in a proceeding inaugurated by petition filed by the owner, any land may be brought under the operation of the act. The purpose of the law is that there shall be in the county register's office a book, known as the "register of titles," the leaves or folio of which are certificates of title, each "certificate of title" containing the facts relative to the title of the particular piece of property described therein, and which has been brought under the act. Each leaf or folium is evidence of the title to the property therein described. So that an intending purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee, or other person having dealings with the property, may go to the register's office, examine the leaf whereon the title to that property is registered, and at once, with safety, take a deed, lease, or mortgage from the owner of the property, file it, and have himself accordingly registered upon the leaf or folium as owner, lessee, or mortgagee. The title is to be set down on the leaf, or certificate of title, and is to be registered in the name of the owner. It is to be stated to be subject to such liens, etc., as are specified. The system involves, in the first place, the initial registration of title, or, as it is called, "bringing the land under the act," and, secondly, all subsequent matters. Such subsequent matters as leases, mortgages, or other charges upon the land, are shown by "memorials," noted upon the folium or certificate by the register of titles. For an interesting note upon the Torrens system of land-title registration reference may be had to L. R. A. 1916D, 14 et seq.

Section 77 of the Land Title Law of this state, after providing that if any land registered under the act shall be sold to any private individual for any tax or assessment, such purchaser, within five days thereafter, shall file in the office of the register of titles a written notice of such purchase, and the register shall thereupon enter a "memorial" thereof upon the certificate of title, further provides for the filing of a similar notice by the county tax collector in all cases where land registered under the act has been sold to the state for delinquent tax or assessment. The language of this part of the section is:

"In case the state or a municipal corporation becomes the purchaser of land sold for any tax or assessment, the tax collector or other officer attending to such purchase, shall, within five days thereafter, file with the registrar a notice to that effect. And thereupon the registrar shall enter a memorial thereof upon the register, and shall mail notices to interested parties, as in the case of an individual purchaser. Unless such notice is filed as herein provided, the land shall be forever released from the effect of such sale, and no deed shall be issued in pursuance thereof." Stats. 1915, p. 1945.

In the instant case the tax collector neglected to present to the registrar of titles notice of the tax sale until the eighth day thereafter. Because the notice was not presented within the five days provided by the act, the registrar refused to receive it. It was not filed by the registrar until January 14, 1918, on which day he filed it pursuant to the order of court from which this appeal is taken. Meanwhile, viz., on January 10, 1918, a release of a mortgage that had been a prior lien on the property, and a new mortgage, executed by the registered owner, Xenophon Bouris, to one Thomas H. Stafford, were presented to the county registrar of titles for registration and for "memorials" thereof on the owner's certificate of title. The registrar refused to accept this release and likewise the new mortgage to Stafford. Instead, being in doubt as to the proper memorials to make respecting the tax sale, the release of the old mortgage and the making of the new one, he referred the question, by certificate in due form, to the superior court for its decision. This he is expressly authorized to do by section 99 of the Land Title Law. Stats. 1915, p. 1948. On January 14, 1918, the court decided the question so referred to it, and made its order whereby, after finding the facts to be substantially as we have stated them, ordered that—

"The registrar of titles be, and he hereby is, instructed and authorized to accept said above first-mentioned notice of sale for delinquent taxes for registration, and to enter same as a memorial upon certificate of title No. 1871, Xenophon Bouris, registered owner, and to show same as a prior lien to the above-mentioned mortgage."

As we construe this order, it is more than a direction to the registrar to enter a memorial showing the tax lien to be superior to the mortgage. It is tantamount to a direction that he note on the owner's certificate a memorial showing a valid and subsisting tax sale to the state, made prior to the execution of the new mortgage to Stafford. At any rate, appellants and respondents have placed this construction upon the order, and we, therefore, shall adopt their interpretation as correct, and shall decide accordingly the one question presented by the briefs for our determination.

From the order of the court so made on January 14, 1918, the registered owner and the mortgagee under the new mortgage, Thomas H. Stafford, have taken this appeal claiming that the release of the old mortgage and the lien of the new mortgage should, by appropriate "memorials," be shown on the owner's certificate of title as prior to the tax sale to the state.

As we have shown, the Land Title Law, in section 77, specifically declares that unless the notice of tax sale be filed "as herein provided"—which, of course, means within the five days therein prescribed—"the land shall be forever released from the effect of such sale." Respondents argue that the provision of the act fixing the time within which the notice shall be filed is not mandatory, but directory only. We cannot accede to this construction of the plain and unambiguous language of the law.

[1] Whether a particular statutory provision is mandatory or directory depends upon the intention of the Legislature, to be ascertained from a consideration of the object of the statute and the consequences that would result from construing it one way or the other. 36 Cyc. 1157. In Black, Interpretation of Laws, p. 343, the rule is stated as follows:

"When a statute specifies a time at or within which an act is to be done by a public officer or body, it is generally held to be directory only as to the time, and not mandatory, unless time is of the essence of the thing to be done, or the language of the statute contains negative words, or shows that the designation of the time was intended as a limitation of power, authority or right."

Here, not only does the language of the statute show that the designation of time was intended as a limitation upon the authority to file the notice of tax sale—the language is that unless the notice be filed "as herein provided," i. e., within the five days, the land "shall be forever released from the effect of such sale"—but it may readily be seen that time is of the essence of the thing to be done. It is a matter of substance, vitally affecting the rights of the owner of the registered land, and the rights of subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers.

[2, 3] During the five-year period allowed for redemption from a tax sale—the period intermediate the sale of the property to the state under section 3771 of the Political Code and the issuance of a deed to the state as provided by section 3785 of the same Code—the title to the property continues in the taxpayer subject to the lien in favor of the state created by the assessment and tax levy. The only practical effect of a sale of property under section 3771 is to start running the five years within which redemption can be effected and at the expiration of which a deed may be issued to the state. Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 596, 87 Pac. 102. But this period within which the taxpayer may redeem commences running from the date of the sale to the state, not from the date of the notice of sale. That is, the commencement of the five-year redemption period is not postponed until the filing of the notice that section 77 of the Land Title Law requires to be filed in all cases where the property that has been sold for taxes is property that has been brought under the provisions of the act.

[4] It is of the utmost importance to one about to loan money secured by a mortgage on real property that he shall know whether the land has been sold for taxes, and, if it has, how long he may safely wait before effecting a redemption in the event that it shall become necessary for him to redeem in order to protect his mortgage security. As we have said, the prime purpose of the Torrens law is that there shall be in the registrar's office, in the book known as the "register of titles," a leaf or folium to which any person dealing with any particular piece of land that has been brought under the act may look in order to ascertain the exact condition of the title before purchasing, leasing, or loaning money secured by a mortgage. If the Code or any statute had provided that, as to land that has been brought under the operation of the Land Title Law, the time to redeem from a tax sale shall commence to run only from the filing of the notice of sale that is required by section 77 of that law, it doubtless would be a matter of indifference to a prospective purchaser, lessee, or mortgagee whether the notice of the tax sale was presented to the registrar and filed within five days, or at a later date. But the Code makes no exception in the case of lands registered under the Torrens law. It does not declare that the time to redeem shall commence to run only from the filing of the notice of sale prescribed by section 77 of the Land Title Law. Without exception, the time for redemption commences to run from the date of the tax sale. Pol. Code, sec. 3780. If, therefore, it were held that the notice required by section 77 of the Land Title Law need not be filed within the five days prescribed therefor, that is, if that provision were held to be directory only and not mandatory, it might happen that the notice of a tax sale would not be filed until shortly before the expiration of the five-year period that the Political Code allows for redemption. In the meantime, a person might purchase the land, or lease it, or take a mortgage on it, without knowing when the time for redemption would expire, unless he looked elsewhere than the registered certificate of title and the memorials thereon. But the principal purpose of the Land Title Law is to obviate the necessity for looking elsewhere than the registered certificate of title and the memorials noted thereon.

[5] For these reasons we think that as declared by the emphatic language of the act itself, the land is "forever released from the effect of such sale" if the notice of tax sale be not filed by the tax collector with the registrar of titles within five days after the sale to the state. The effect of the failure to file the notice of the sale as provided by the act is completely to nullify the sale, and produce a situation such as would exist had no tax sale ever been made or attempted.

We do not mean to say that this necessarily means that another sale may not be made by the tax collector by beginning all over again. As to this, however, it is not necessary to express an opinion; though we may say that, after a cursory examination of the Code sections relative to tax sales, we are inclined to think that the following is substantially a correct view of the situation respecting the tax collector's power to proceed de novo: The tax lien remains; the Land Title Law expressly declares that the land, if the notice of the tax sale be not filed as in that law provided, "shall be forever released from the effect of such sale." This means that the sale is completely nullified by the failure to file the notice within the prescribed time. The situation is, therefore, precisely what it would have been had no sale ever been attempted.

Though the tax lien continues as a valid incumbrance on this land, the five-year period for redemption before a deed can issue to the state has not commenced. Nor can it commence until a sale shall have been made under section 3771 of the Political Code, after proceedings therefor have been taken de novo—assuming that there is no statutory inhibition against new proceedings looking to a new and enduring tax sale—followed by the filing of the notice of such second sale with the county registrar of titles within the prescribed five days.

For these reasons we think it was error to direct the registrar of titles to enter a memorial showing the tax sale as an existing and valid sale made prior to the mortgage that the registered owner had executed to his mortgagee, Stafford.

The order is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter an order consonant with the views herein set forth.

GENEREUX et al. v. RICHFIELD OIL CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 1, 1920.)

1. Sales $\Leftrightarrow$ 101—Seller's failure to exact strict performance is not waiver of right to enforce another contract.

That defendant, under a contract between plaintiffs and another oil company, delivered oil and received payments without any attempt to rescind the contract because of plaintiffs' failure to pay promptly, will not establish waiver of right to cancel for plaintiffs' failure to pay as stipulated, a later contract whereby defendant in its own name was to furnish plaintiffs with oil.

2. Sales $\Leftrightarrow$ 101—Waiver of right to exact strict performance not implied from other transactions.

While a party who has habitually waived strict compliance with a contract, as one for delivery of oil over a period of years, may not terminate the contract for noncompliance, without notice, acts showing such waiver must arise out of the contract involved, and not out of other transactions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by E. J. Genereux and another against the Richfield Oil Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

H. E. Barbour, of Fresno, and Walter S. Clayson, of Corona, for appellants.

James, Smith & McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. On the 18th day of December, 1915, the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a written contract in writing by which it was agreed that the defendant would sell, and the plaintiffs would buy, all the gas engine fuel oil of a gravity of 40 to 44 degrees, which plaintiffs might require in their business or pumping plant in Riverside county, Cal., for a period of two years, commencing May 17, 1916, and ending May 16, 1918. The price agreed upon was $1.08 per barrel of 42 gallons each.

The contract provided that payments should be made on the 15th of each month for all goods delivered during the previous calendar month. It also contained the following: "If payments are not made as specified, the seller shall have the option of canceling this contract." Pursuant to the terms of the contract, the defendant delivered to the plaintiffs during the month of June, 1916, oil amounting at the contract price to $401.76. On the 17th day of July, 1916, no payment having been made by the plaintiffs to the defendant for the oil delivered in the month of June, the latter sent a telegram to the plaintiffs, as follows:

"Engine fuel oil contract, dated December 18, 1915, is hereby canceled for failure to make payment on the 15th of July for deliveries for previous calendar month."

Thereafter, though requested by the plaintiffs, the defendant refused to make any further deliveries of oil under the contract. Whereupon the plaintiffs brought this action to secure damages for failure of defendant to furnish them fuel oil. Findings and judgment were in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

[1] The decision of the court was founded on the express terms of the contract wherein the option was given the defendant to cancel it if payments were not made according to the terms thereof. Appellants claim that defendant was not justified in availing itself of this provision of the contract because by its long-continued course of business with the plaintiffs it had waived it, and before it could avail itself of it defendant should have given plaintiffs notice that they would be held in the future strictly to the terms of the contract in this regard.

It appears that prior to the execution of the contract of December 18, 1915, the plaintiffs had been supplied with oil under a contract between them and the General Petroleum Company. Under that contract deliveries were to begin on the 15th day of May, 1914, and end on the 15th day of May, 1916. Under that contract much oil was delivered, but, it seems, never paid for when due and payable. By some arrangement, which does not clearly appear, after this contract was executed, the defendant delivered oil to the company and collected the bills for it instead of the General Petroleum Company. What the arrangement was between the defendant and the General Petroleum Company which permitted or authorized these acts by defendant is not made to appear.

The defendant continued after December, 1915, to collect of plaintiffs for oil delivered under the General Petroleum Company contract until May 17, 1916, when deliveries began under its own contract. During this period the plaintiffs were always late in making their payments and the defendant was constantly reminding them of it. Indeed, so remiss were they that in one letter, that of May 8, 1916, the defendant wrote, after referring to a long overdue account:

"We beg to notify you that unless we receive a remittance from you covering the above account by the 15th of this month we shall take whatever steps we consider necessary to enforce collection."

This letter was dated only a week before deliveries were to begin under the present contract.

There are several considerations that lead us to the conclusion that defendant had not waived its right to insist upon the terms of the contract being observed and to cancel it if payments were not made when due. The parties had never done business under any other contract executed between them. As to the General Petroleum Company contract, as observed by the learned trial judge:

"It does not appear that the defendant took an assignment of the contract in question and it is a matter of doubt, under the evidence, whether or not the defendant had a right to exercise the option mentioned in the contract."

Between the date of the contract on which this suit is brought and the time deliveries were to begin under it, the defendant had been put to very much annoyance and trouble in getting payments from plaintiffs, even to the extent of threatening legal proceedings, as appears from the letter above quoted. It was, probably, this unpleasant experience that determined it to insist on prompt payments for all deliveries that might be made under the contract it had entered into, to permit no delays that might thereafter be claimed as a waiver of the terms of the contract as to payment.

Without discussing any other phase of the case, we think it sufficient to hold, as we do, that the accepting by defendant of delayed payment for oil purchased under the former contract (the General Petroleum Company) was not a waiver of any of its rights under the contract it entered into with the plaintiffs in December, 1915.

[2] The cases which hold that a party to a contract, which provides that payments shall be made to him at certain times, waives his right to cancel the contract for failure to pay promptly by accepting delayed payments, all proceed upon the principle that by his course of conduct he has induced the other party to the contract to believe that he will not be held strictly to the terms of the contract as to payments. After such a course to suddenly cancel the contract, without any notice of a change of attitude, is in the nature of a fraud upon the other party. Some cases place it upon the ground of estoppel. The rule is stated in Pomeroy on Contracts, § 294 (quoted with approval in Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 295, 110 Pac. 949, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126), as follows:

"The one entitled to insist upon a punctual performance by the other or else that the agreement be ended, may waive his right and the benefit of any objection which he might raise to a performance after the prescribed time, either expressly or by his conduct; and his conduct will operate as a waiver when it is consistent only with a purpose on his part to regard the contract as still subsisting, and not ended by the other party's default."

And, again, in the same case, it is said:

"Where a forfeiture has been practically waived by partial payments by the vendee after the time prescribed, the vendee cannot then suddenly stop short and insist upon a forfeiture for the nonpayment of the arrears remaining unpaid, without any previous notice of the intention to do so if the arrears are not paid."

The conduct of a party that will operate as a waiver of the provision of the contract as to payments is with reference to that particular contract and not to some other transactions. No conduct of the defendant as to this contract "is consistent with a purpose on his (its) part to regard the contract as still subsisting and not ended by the other's default."

It never accepted any overdue payments under it, never said or did anything in reference to it to cause the plaintiffs to believe that defendant had or would waive any of the provisions of the contract. We know of no principle of law and have found no decision holding that, because a party by his conduct waives the provisions of one contract, therefore he has waived or will waive the provisions of another and independent contract.

A man's general business character, as being that of one who does not insist upon strict performance of contracts made with him, cannot be invoked to prove that he has waived the provisions of a particular contract.

The facts that it had had trouble in getting payments made on the other contract, that it accepted payments after they were due, that plaintiffs were so remiss that it had to threaten legal proceedings, instead of showing an intent not to insist on prompt payments after the contract of December, 1915, became effective, would seem to suggest a good reason for the opposite course, and would seem to suggest the wisdom of its so acting under this contract as to prevent the plaintiffs from ever claiming a waiver of any of its provisions.

The plaintiffs, for some reason, must, at least, have suspected that this would be the attitude of the defendant, else why write in the letter of May 11, 1916: "All future business with you will be done strictly in accordance with the terms of said contract."

A careful reading of the record fails to convince us that defendant by any act waived the right given it by the contract to cancel it for failure to pay for oil at the times fixed by it.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILKINSON v. GRANT et al. (Civ. 3236.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 4, 1920.)

1. Judgment ⚡240—Separate judgments, vacating judgment against defendants sued severally, not objectionable.

Where judgment creditor of a corporation sued several defendants for amounts claimed unpaid on subscriptions, and after judgment was entered for the creditor the court entered judgments for the several defendants on separate motions to vacate, the complaint against each defendant being several, such several judgments were warranted, under Code Civ. Proc. § 578.

2. Pleading ⚡7—Presumption of continuity is not applicable to pleading.

The presumption that a thing, once proved to exist, continues as long as is usual, declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, is not a rule of pleading, and there is no presumption that a fact alleged as existing on a date preceding commencement of the action continues to exist thereafter.

3. Trial ⚡395(1)—Presumption of continuity not applicable to findings.

The presumption of continuity, declared by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, is not applicable to findings of fact.

4. Trial ⚡396(1)—Findings of fact must follow the essential averments of the complaint.

Findings of fact must follow the essential averments of the complaint in order to support the judgment.

5. Corporations ⚡244(1), 268(1)—Liability for unpaid subscriptions depends on ownership at commencement of action.

To render one liable for unpaid subscriptions to corporate stock, it must appear that such person was owner at time of commencement of action; hence, where the complaint in an action against alleged stockholders merely showed that they had owned such shares at a time long prior to commencement of the action, and the findings went no further than the complaint, a judgment for the corporate creditor was properly set aside, under Code Civ. Proc. § 663, and judgment entered for the defendants.

6. Judgment ⚡393—Requirement that court which sets aside the judgment correct findings is only directory.

The provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 663, requiring the court on setting aside a judgment, etc., to correct findings is directory, and where judgment for plaintiff was properly set aside, plaintiff cannot complain that findings were not corrected.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action by the judgment creditor of a corporation to recover from the defendants as stockholders therein the amount of the plaintiff's judgment out of the unpaid subscriptions of said stockholders. Upon the trial of the cause the action was dismissed as to the defendants other than those who are the respondents herein, but as to these the court made its findings and conclusions of law, in the latter of which it found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against these defendants for the amounts which would be applicable out of their unpaid subscriptions, respectively, to the plaintiff's judgment against the corporation. A judgment was entered in accordance with such conclusions of law, whereupon the defendants separately moved the court, under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to vacate the judgment so entered and enter a judgment in favor of each of said defendants. The court granted each of these motions, and upon each proceeded to enter a judgment in favor of the moving party and against the plaintiff. While there were thus in form two judgments finally entered in the action, they were as to the plaintiff the same. The plaintiff has appealed from both these judgments.

[1] There is no merit in the appellant's first contention based upon the fact that there are two judgments in this case. The complaint against each of these defendants was several, as were also their defenses, which were separately and severally made. In such a case, under section 578 of the Code of Civil Procedure, several judgments may be entered. Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 577, 23 Pac. 198.

The next and main contention of the appellant is that the trial court was in error in granting the motions of the defendants to set aside the judgment at first entered in the plaintiff's favor, and in entering the judgment or judgments in favor of each of said defendants and against the plaintiff upon the findings in the case. The motions of the defendants to that effect were based upon the fact that there was no averment in the plaintiff's complaint that either of said defendants was a stockholder in said corporation at the time the action was commenced, and upon the further fact that there was no finding that either of said defendants was such stockholder at the time of the commencement of the action. The record discloses this to be the fact as to both the complaint and the findings in the case. In the complaint it is alleged that on or about July 25, 1914, nearly three years before the commencement of this action, each of said defendants subscribed for and had issued to him the shares in the corporation upon which his liability in this action is sought to be predicated. It is also alleged that the cause of action upon which the plaintiff's judgment against the said corporation was founded arose during the ownership by said defendants of their respective shares of stock in said corporation, but it is nowhere averred that said defendants continued to be the owners of their said stock or any portion thereof up to the date of the institution of the action. The findings of the court repeat these averments of the complaint, but embrace no finding of any ownership of the stock of the corporation in question at the time of the institution of the action.

[2-5] It is a rule of evidence expressed in section 1963, subdivision 32, of the Code of Civil Procedure, "that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature." It has been frequently held, however, that this is not a rule of pleading, and that there is no presumption that a fact pleaded as existing upon a date preceding the commencement of the action continues to exist thereafter. Pettit v. Forsyth, 15 Cal. App. 149, 113 Pac. 892; Herzog v. Atchison & Topeka R. R. Co., 153 Cal. 496, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428; Van Alstine v. Whelan, 135 Cal. 232, 67 Pac. 125; Fredericks v. Tracey, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750. It has also been held that the rule of evidence above cited has no application to the findings of fact in the case. Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576; Est. of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 63 Pac. 775. The findings of fact must follow the essential averments of the complaint in order to support a judgment in the plaintiff's favor, and if, in this case, it was essential that the plaintiff should have averred the fact of the ownership by these defendants of their respective shares of stock upon which their liability upon their unpaid subscriptions was to be founded at the time of the commencement of his action, and if it was further essential that the plaintiff should have proved this averment in order to recover a judgment based upon such liability, then it was equally essential that the court should have found the ultimate fact that the ownership of said stock was in the defendants, respectively, at the time of the institution of the action in order to justify a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. This requirement would not be met by a finding that the defendants were the owners of their alleged stock at some date long prior to the commencement of the action, nor even by a finding that the defendants owned said stock at the time the liability of the corporation to the plaintiff arose.

Under the well-established rule of law, ownership by a defendant of the stock upon which it is claimed he is liable for unpaid subscriptions must be alleged and found to exist as a fact at the time of the commencement of the action in which he is sought to be held liable for unpaid subscriptions thereon. People's Home Savings Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 Pac. 858; Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 255. This general rule is subject only to the exception that the defendants' transfer of stock upon which there are liabilities arising out of unpaid subscriptions may be alleged and shown to have been fraudulent, in which event his liability continues notwithstanding such transfer. In the instant case, however, there is no such averment, proof, or finding, and it follows that in the absence thereof the plaintiff was not entitled to the judgment in his favor which was at first entered in this action, and hence that the defendants were each entitled, upon their motion under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to have such judgment set aside and a judgment entered upon the findings in favor of each of them.

[6] The appellant's final contention is that, conceding the foregoing views to be correct, the court committed an error of procedure, requiring a reversal of these judgments, since it did not also correct its conclusions of law in the case, as section 663, Code of Civil Procedure, directs. That this requirement of said section is merely directory, however, seems to have been held in the case of Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66, in which the Supreme Court said that, "when judgment is given by the court, it is itself the real conclusion of law, and supersedes any conclusion of law embraced in the decision."

Judgment affirmed.

MODOC COUNTY v. BALLARD, County Auditor. (Civ. 2132.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1920.)

Counties 178—Notice of election to issue highway bonds need not describe highways.

The board of supervisor's notice of election for the issuance of highway bonds under Act March 19, 1907, and acts amendatory thereto (Deering's Gen. Acts 1915, Act 1448), is not defective because of failure of the notice to describe the highways to be constructed and repaired, section 7 adopting the provisions of Pol. Code, § 4088, which is the general law as to the issue of county bonds and provides that the board of supervisors must by order specify amount of bonds, rate of interest, etc., and the subsequent provision in section 7 for description of the highways to be described being in the alternative.

Application by the County of Modoc, State of California, for writ of mandate against T. H. Ballard, Auditor of the County. Writ granted.

Lillenthal, McKinstry, Raymond, Haber & Firebaugh, of San Francisco, for petitioner.
C. S. Baldwin, of Alturas, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an application by the county of Modoc for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as auditor of said county, to attest certain bonds of the county amounting to $400,000. His refusal to attest the bonds is for the alleged reason that the election, at which the issue of the bonds were authorized, was not called in conformity to the provisions of section 7 of the act of the Legislature of March 19, 1907, and acts amendatory thereof, commonly called the County Highway Commission Act. Deering's General Laws of California (1915 Ed.) p. 516.

The specific ground of his refusal to attest the bonds is set forth in a notice to the board of supervisors of said county, in which he alleges that the notice of election was defective in that:

It "did not describe the highways to be constructed and repaired with the proceeds of such bonds, as required by section 7 of said statute; but on the contrary, said notice merely referred to such highways of the county, as embodied in the report and delineated on the map prepared by the county highway commission, which said report and map have been accepted and approved by the said board of supervisors on the 26th day of May, 1919."

In view of the respondent's objection, it is necessary to consider certain provisions of the act of March 19, 1907, in connection with certain provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code. This section of the Political Code is the general law as to the issue, sale, and payment of county bonds, for all purposes for which a county may issue the same, including bonds "for the purpose of building or constructing roads, bridges or highways."

To institute a bond issue under the provisions of this section the board of supervisors must by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the amount of bonds which they propose to issue, the rate of interest, the number of years, not exceeding 40, the whole or any part of the bonds are to run, and shall further provide for submitting the question of the issuance of said bonds to the electors of the county at the next general election, or at a special election to be called for that purpose.

The section further provides that the notice of election "must contain the time and place or places of holding such election, the names of election officers to conduct the same, the amount and denomination of the bonds, the rate of interest to be paid, and the number of years, not exceeding forty, the whole or any part of such bonds are to run."

The said section does not provide that the notice of election shall contain any particular statement of the purpose of the bond issue. The provision of this section as to a statement of the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred is that the board of supervisors shall specify such purpose in the original initial order.

Section 1 of the act of March 19, 1907, provides that upon receipt of a freeholders' petition the board of supervisors may appoint a highway commission, and section 6 of said act provides that, after ascertaining what improvements should be made and the estimated cost thereof proposed to be covered by a bond issue, the commission shall make and file with the board of supervisors a report setting forth the highways proposed to be improved, by their termini, describing generally the kind of improvements to be made thereon, and stating the estimated cost of the work to be done, and the amount to be raised by bonds therefor, and praying the board of supervisors to call a bond election for the issuance of bonds for the estimated amount.

All of the foregoing was done by the board of supervisors of Modoc county, and in the report filed by the highway commission and adopted by the board the proposed roads to be improved and constructed were described by their proposed termini, and a map was filed by the commission and approved by the board of supervisors on which is delineated the proposed highways.

Section 7 of said act of March 19, 1907, provides as follows:

"If the board approve the report they shall adopt the same, and shall without delay call an election to determine whether bonds of the county shall be issued in the amount recommended by the commission, for the purposes stated in their report. Said election shall be called and held and said bonds issued, sold and paid under and in accordance with all the provisions of law now or hereafter existing in regard to the issuance, sale and payment of county bonds, and all proceedings had in regard to such bonds shall be in accordance with such provisions of law; * * * and provided further, that it shall be sufficient to set forth the purpose of the bond issue in said proceedings by describing the highways to be improved as the same are described in said report of the highway commission. * * *

The supervisors, as before stated, did approve the report of the commission and did call an election to be held on July 1, 1919, to determine whether bonds of the county should issue to the amount of $400,000, as recommended by the highway commission for the purposes stated in said report.

The notice of election was duly published, and no objection is made to the sufficiency of the notice, except the objection before stated that it is defective in that it "did not describe the highways to be constructed and repaired with the proceeds of such bonds as required by section 7 of the act of March 19, 1907," etc.

Section 7 of the act of March 19, 1907, provides that the election "shall be called and held and said bonds issued, sold and paid under and in accordance with all the provisions of law now or hereafter existing in regard to the issuance, sale and payment of county bonds, and all proceedings had in regard to such bonds shall be in accordance with such provisions of law." The effect of this language is to make the provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code in reference to the calling of elections for bond issues applicable to an election called under the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 19, 1907. In other words, the provisions of section 4088 of the Political Code as to the notice to be given of such election and its contents are applicable to an election called in pursuance of section 7 of the act of March 19, 1907.

The respondent bases his objection to the sufficiency of the notice upon the second or concluding proviso of section 7 of said act, which is as follows:

"Provided further, that it shall be sufficient to set forth the purpose of the bond issue in said proceedings by describing the highways to be improved as the same are described in said report of the highway commission."

This proviso does not provide that the purpose of the bond issue must be set forth in the notice of election by "describing the highways to be improved as the same are described in said report of the highway commission." It contains merely a general statement that it shall be "sufficient" to set forth the purpose of the bond issue by describing the highways, and there is nothing contained in said proviso requiring the notice of election to contain anything else than what is required by section 4088 of the Political Code. As before stated, section 7 of the act of March 19, 1907, expressly provides that the election shall be called in accordance with all the provisions of law existing in regard to the issuance of county bonds, and such provisions, as stated above, provide for the contents of the notice of election, and do not require that such notice shall contain a statement of the purpose of the bond issue.

Conceding that the concluding proviso of section 7 of said act does apply to the notice of election of a highway bond issue, it follows merely that an alternative method is provided for identifying the bonds in said notice. By such alternative method the notice of election would be sufficient if it described the roads to be constructed and repaired as they are described in the report of the highway commission; but it is nowhere provided that such alternative method must be taken, and there is nothing in said proviso that militates in the least against the proceedings as followed by Modoc county in this matter.

The demurrer interposed by the respondent to the petition is hereby overruled, and it is ordered that the peremptory writ of mandate prayed for be issued.

O'CONNELL et al. v. FOWLER et al.

Specific performance — §114(2) — Complaint must show fairness of contract.

Where a complaint for a specific performance was amended at the trial by striking therefrom the paragraph alleging that it was fair and equitable and furnished adequate consideration for the conveyance, the complaint thereby became insufficient to state a cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Daniel S. O'Connell and another against Nellie A. Fowler and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hendee & Rodabaugh, of San Diego (H. C. Ryan, of San Diego, of counsel), for appellants.

Adam Thompson, of San Diego, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel specific performance of an agreement for the exchange of real properties between plaintiffs and the defendant Fowler.

The following are, in substance, the facts of the case: On February 16, 1917, plaintiffs were the owners of two parcels of real property situate in San Diego county, one parcel being subject to a mortgage of $10,000 and the other to a mortgage of $500 and certain street improvement bonds, which property they agreed to exchange for certain unimproved property situate in the county of Los Angeles belonging to the defendant Fowler. On said 16th day of February, 1917, deeds covering their properties were executed by the respective parties and delivered in escrow to the defendant title company, together with two sets of instructions, one set being signed by plaintiffs and the other by the defendant Fowler. There were no conditions required to be performed by the defendant Fowler prior to the final delivery of the deeds, but plaintiffs were required to adjust the interest on their mortgages to date, and were to obtain a statement from the holder of one of the mortgages that there was not more than $500 due on that mortgage. Plaintiffs also agreed to hand to the escrow holder "sufficient (money) to redeem the Middletown property of the street bonds and to adjust the interest on mortgages." The defendant title company was instructed to prepare certificates of title, and the transaction was to be closed within ten days or the deeds returned to the respective parties. Three days subsequent to the delivery of the deeds in escrow to the title company the defendant Fowler notified said title company, in writing, to proceed no further with the transaction. The reasons given therefor were as follows:

"The ground and reasons for this notification to you is on account of the false and fraudulent representations made to me with reference to the value of the property which I am about to receive under said escrow instructions and transfer of said property. Had I known the value of the property that I was about to receive under the escrow instructions I would not have signed said escrow instructions. This will be your authority for refusing to do anything further in the premises. You are hereby notified to notify Mr. and Mrs. O'Connell of this revocation. Also any other title company interested in bringing down the title for either of the parties mentioned in said escrow instructions."

Accordingly, said title company did nothing further. It thereafter refused to make final delivery of the deeds to the grantees therein named or to return the deeds to the respective grantors. This action was commenced on April 5, 1917, to compel specific performance of the agreement.

Plaintiffs' case was presented and tried upon the theory that the transaction for the exchange of said properties constituted an executory contract, and pursuant to that theory they alleged in paragraph 7 of their complaint that they had performed all of the conditions required of them by said escrow agreement to be performed, and that the transaction was "fair, just and reasonable in all its parts, and the consideration being so paid by such exchange by these plaintiffs to the said defendant, then was and now is and at all times since the execution of said agreement has been an adequate price for said property so agreed to be conveyed to these plaintiffs by the said defendant."

The defendant Fowler denied that plaintiffs had performed the conditions imposed upon them by the escrow agreement, and denied that the agreement for the exchange of said properties was a fair, just, or reasonable one, or that there was adequate consideration therefor. As a further and separate defense, defendant Fowler charged plaintiffs with having made false and fraudulent representations to her concerning the value and character of their properties.

The action was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that there were no false or fraudulent representations, but found that there was an inadequacy of consideration. The court further found that said plaintiffs had not performed the conditions imposed upon them by the terms of said escrow agreements, and judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendants, from which plaintiffs appeal.

It is the contention of appellants on this appeal that, inasmuch as defendant Fowler sought to rescind the agreement upon the single ground of fraud, she ratified the agreement in all other respects, and was afterwards prohibited from urging the defense of inadequacy of consideration, and that since the court found against said defendant upon the issue of fraud, which constituted the ground of rescission, the court was without legal power to annul the agreement on any other ground.

While we do not subscribe to the correctness of appellants' contention in this respect, for the reason that fraud and inadequacy of consideration are separate and distinct doctrines (Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548), the one being a defense which a defendant must allege and prove following a rescission, while the other is a matter for the plaintiff to affirmatively allege and prove before he is entitled to relief (Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 170, 66 Pac. 231; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193), that question becomes quite immaterial in view of the fact that the judgment must ultimately be affirmed upon the ground that plaintiffs' complaint failed to state a cause of action after it had been amended by plaintiffs, in the following manner: After the evidence was closed and prior to the submission of the cause to the court for decision, plaintiffs requested and were granted permission to file an amendment to their complaint, whereby they struck from the complaint all of paragraph 7, which embodied those essential allegations as to the fairness of the transaction and the adequacy of consideration. Plaintiffs' purpose in striking out said paragraph 7 was doubtless to strengthen their theory that defendant Fowler, by failing to incorporate the ground of inadequacy of consideration in her notice of rescission, had waived her right to avoid the contract on that ground, and plaintiffs sought by such amendment to entirely eliminate that issue from the case. The amendment, however, accomplished just the opposite effect. Instead of strengthening their complaint, they took from it the vital parts that gave it life.

The complaint, by reason of the amendment, was emasculated in such a way as to render it entirely insufficient in stating a cause of action. As the complaint stood when the cause was submitted to the trial court for decision, it was entirely void of any allegations that the transaction was fair, or that the consideration was adequate. Such allegations and the proof in support of them were absolutely essential to plaintiffs' recovery. Joyce v. Tomasini, 168 Cal. 234, 142 Pac. 67; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193; Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co., 172 Cal. 714, 158 Pac. 196; Bishop v. Barndt, 184 Pac. 901; Ehrhart v. Mahony, 184 Pac. 1010. This same question arose on demurrer to the complaint in the case of Joyce v. Tomasini, supra, and it was said:

"We think the demurrer should have been sustained. The contract is sued on as an executory agreement to execute a lease, in substance an agreement to grant an estate for years in a parcel of land. The object of the action is to enforce specific performance of this executory agreement. The Civil Code, following the settled doctrine of equity jurisprudence, declares that specific performance of an executory contract cannot be enforced against a party, if he has not received an adequate consideration therefor, or if it is not, as to him, just and reasonable. Section 3391. It is well established as a rule of pleading in such cases that the plaintiff, in order to allege a good cause of action, must set forth facts which show that the consideration provided for in the contract sought to be enforced is adequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable to the defendant. A complaint which fails to state such facts does not state a cause of action to enforce such contract."

And in Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co., supra, it was said:

"A decree for specific performance cannot be supported in the absence of allegation and finding that the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate."

The further question of the necessity of the performance by plaintiffs of the conditions of the escrow agreement is of no importance, in the absence of an averment and proof on the part of plaintiffs of the fairness and reasonableness of the agreement. Porter v. Anderson, 14 Cal. App. 716-724, 113 Pac. 345.

Judgment affirmed.

DUVALL et al. v. WHITE et al. (Civ. 2067.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 25, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨195—Party not asking to amend cannot complain of denial of leave.

Appellants cannot complain that the trial court, in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, abused its discretion by refusing leave to amend, where they did not ask for permission to amend, or indicate how the complaint could be amended so as to meet the objections raised by the demurrer.

2. Mines and minerals ⇨52—Complaint for impounding oil of stated value does not entitle to injunction.

A complaint to restrain defendants from impounding on their property oil flowing down a water course to plaintiffs' property, which alleged the value of the oil which flowed each day, does not show a right to an injunction, since it does not show irreparable injury, especially in absence of any allegation that defendants were insolvent.

3. Mines and minerals ⇨83—Purchaser of oil discharged into stream cannot prevent diversion of stream.

The purchasers from the owners of oil wells of the oil which escaped into a stream cannot deprive a riparian owner whose land lay between the oil wells and the purchasers' impounding works of the right to divert the water of the stream, including the oil mingled therewith.

4. Mines and minerals ⇨83—Owner abandons oil by permitting it to leave land.

The owner of oil abandoned it and lost all rights to it by permitting it to flow from his land in a natural water course, so that a purchaser from him cannot prevent the impounding of the oil by a riparian owner along the water course.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨39—Occupant of public land is a riparian owner as against one having no claim.

An occupant of land under claim of right has the right of a riparian owner as against one having no claim to the land occupied, even though the occupant has no title as against government.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨138—User of stream to carry oil not shown to have been adverse confers no rights.

The fact that the stream across defendant's land had been used for five years for conveying oil to plaintiff's works below gives plaintiff no right against the riparian owner, in the absence of a showing that the use was adverse, since without showing it is presumed to have been permissive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by S. A. Duvall and another against C. N. White and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

George E. Whitaker and Foster & Barnhart, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Respondents have made a fair statement of the case, which we substantially adopt. From the complaint it appears that certain oil companies were operating in Kern county, and that waste oil escaped from their works and flowed down a water course adjoining their lands. This oil was carried by the water beyond the lands operated by said companies, across lands claimed and occupied by defendants, then beyond these and across other land until it was carried into a lake known as Buena Vista Lake. In consequence of the danger of the oil contaminating the waters of the lake, the operators constructed a dam below their lands and near the lake for the purpose of preventing said contamination. The operators then orally agreed with the plaintiffs that if they would maintain the dam and construct other works to prevent the oil from flowing into the lake they should be entitled to the waste oil escaping from the operators' property that was saved by means of the dam. The plaintiffs thereupon constructed said works for saving said oil. These works were constructed on the lands of the Kern Trading & Oil Company with the consent of that company. Afterwards the defendants herein began the construction of works on lands occupied by them lying below the lands of the oil companies and above the lands of the Kern Trading & Oil Company with the alleged intention of diverting the escaping oil ordinarily flowing down on the waters of the stream to the dams of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this suit to enjoin the defendants "from obstructing, diverting, or in any way interfering with the flow of said oil and water to plaintiffs herein." The defendants demurred on the general ground, and on the special grounds that the complaint was uncertain and ambiguous and unintelligible in certain respects and that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and the appeal is from the judgment entered thereupon.

demurrer without leave to amend. This follows for the reason that it does not appear that they asked permission to amend, or indicated in any manner how the complaint could be amended so as to meet the objections raised by the demurrer. The rule is well settled in this state, and among the many decisions it is sufficient to specify Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 83 Pac. 699; Varnē v. Devoto, 10 Cal. App. 304, 101 Pac. 934; Carley v. Vallecita Mining Co., 16 Cal. App. 781, 117 Pac. 1037.

[2] 2. It is equally apparent that the complaint fails to state a cause of action for an injunction. It does not appear therein that plaintiffs would be irreparably damaged by the threatened acts of defendants. To the contrary, the complaint shows that plaintiffs will lose oil every day of the value of $15. Mere monetary loss is not ordinarily irreparable in the contemplation of the remedy by injunction. At least, it should not be considered so in the absence of any averment or showing that the parties causing the loss are insolvent or in any manner unable to respond in damages. Nothing in the complaint herein is inconsistent with the view that an action at law would afford a complete remedy for any injury that has been or may be suffered by plaintiffs; and hence it does not appear to be a case for the equitable remedy of injunction. In this connection the cases of Mechanics Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 Pac. 703, and California, etc., Co. v. Union etc., Co., 122 Cal. 641, 55 Pac. 591, are quite instructive.

[3] 3. Moreover, as to respondents, said agreement between plaintiffs and the oil companies is entirely ineffective and inoperative. Otherwise the situation would be this, that plaintiffs would have a right to impound all the oil flowing down the stream miles below the works of the operatives, and thereby prevent any intervening landowner from diverting a single drop of water from the stream for any purpose, as any diversion of the water, however small, would deprive the purchaser of the floating oil of a portion of his right. It would necessarily follow, as pointed out by respondents, "that the stream must continue to flow in the same manner for time immemorial in order that the plaintiffs may collect their oil, and that no intermediate owner can divert it from its natural channel for fear of depriving the plaintiffs of their oil." It is manifest that the riparian rights of those dwelling upon a natural water course cannot be so easily destroyed by an agreement between third parties. If the intermediate riparian owners have the right—as must be conceded—to divert the water for domestic purposes, it would be absurd, of course, to contend that they must separate from it the oil, and permit the latter to flow on down the stream. The two elements are inseparable and the right to the use of one carries the other as an incident. The foregoing is stated to indicate to what unreasonable results the contention of appellants would lead, although in the case before us there is no allegation as to the diversion and appropriation of the water but only of the oil.

[4] We are satisfied that the operators had no such interest in the oil after it left their premises that they could bind intervening landowners by such a contract as the one involved herein. The true position, as we conceive it, is that after the oil was carried beyond said premises it became what may be designated abandoned property, and it was entirely beyond the control of said operators. While the oil remained on their land they could have impounded it or authorized another to do so, but, having been allowed to escape, it became subject to disposition with the water. In 18 R. C. L. 1205, it is said:

"Both petroleum and gas, as long as they remain in the ground, are a part of the realty. They belong to the owner of the land and are a part of it as long as they are on it, or in it, or subject to his control. When they escape and go into other hands or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone."

A large number of cases is cited in support of the text, including decisions from the United States Supreme Court, and they justify said statement of the rule.

We may add that other authorities affirm the same doctrine, but they need not be specifically noticed.

Appellants, in support of their contention, cite Dougherty v. Creary, 30 Cal. 290, 89 Am. Dec. 116; but it is not inconsistent with the position of respondents herein. That case involved a controversy among the tenants in common, and related to the diversion on their own property of water and gold-bearing earth conducted by flumes from the mining claim. The rights of third parties were not litigated, but the diversion was made, as found by the court, for the benefit of the owners of the said mining claim. It is true though that the court said:

"So long as the miners of the basin and the Blue Point Mining Company abandoned the water and tailings which passed from their mining grounds, the Cheek & Ackley Flume Company had the right to take and appropriate the same to its own use, and upon the passage of the water and earth through that flume the Side Hill Flume had the right to take and appropriate what so passed through the Cheek & Ackley Flume to its own use."

This is in line with the contention of respondents that when the oil left the land of the operators it became abandoned property. However, in the Dougherty Case the court proceeded to state that the owner need not continue to abandon the "tailings," but he may change his purpose and reclaim it himself if he chooses. But this must mean that he may reclaim it while it is under his control; that is, before it has passed beyond his possession. So, in the case at bar, no doubt the operators could impound the oil on their own property, and thereby prevent its diversion by a third party, to the extent at least that it did not interfere with the riparian rights of others; but the case is different where they claim the right to recover it after it has escaped from their own possession and been appropriated by lower riparian owners.

[5] 4. There is some contention that the claim of respondents is based upon an unlawful occupation of government land and that they are not even riparian owners. As to the first of these contentions it is clear that plaintiffs are in no position to raise the point. They claim no interest in the land, and the occupancy of the defendants constitutes sufficient title as against one claiming no interest whatever in the property. The character of the possession of defendants is a matter to be settled between them and the government. Woodbury v. Dorman, 15 Minn. 338 (Gil. 272); McMillen v. Gerstle, 19 Colo. 98, 34 Pac. 681; Tidwell v. Chiricahua Cattle Co., 5 Ariz. 352, 53 Pac. 192.

Occupying, under a claim of right, lands adjoining said water courses, defendants must also be considered riparian owners, at least as far as plaintiffs are concerned.

[6] 5. There is no merit in the claim as to user. That the streams may have been used for five years for the purpose of conveying the oil can avail plaintiffs nothing. There is no allegation of any of the elements that characterize a use as adverse. We must presume that said use was permissive rather than hostile in the absence of any showing to the contrary.

We think there is no substantial merit in the appeal, and the judgment is affirmed.

FORSLAND v. FORSLAND et al.
(Civ. 3213.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 3, 1920. Rehearing Denied April 2, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife ⇨279(6)—Wife's derogatory remarks held not a breach of her agreement not to disturb husband's peace.

Where husband and wife before divorce entered into agreement for settlement of property rights, and the husband after paying the wife a considerable sum agreed to deposit $1,000 which should be paid over to her if she refrained for a stipulated time from disturbing his peace, or that of the employes of the company in which the husband was interested, the fact that the wife did make derogatory remarks to a third person concerning the husband cannot be deemed a breach of the agreement; such remarks not disturbing his peace.

2. Appeal and error ⇨171(1)—Party cannot rely on inconsistent theories.

Where a husband, who had deposited money to be paid to his wife in event she refrained from disturbing his peace for a given period, etc., sought to have the money paid over to him on the theory that she had violated the agreement, the husband cannot thereafter change his theory and proceed on the assumption that the agreement was void for want of consideration.

3. Husband and wife ⇨278(5)—Agreement to pay wife for refraining from disturbing husband held valid.

Agreement by husband, on separation from his wife, that if she did not disturb his peace for a given period of time, etc., a sum of money deposited in a bank should be paid over to her, is valid and binding and not subject to attack on the ground of want of consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by C. H. Forsland against Nance B. Forsland who filed cross-complaint, and the Humboldt Savings Bank and others. From a judgment for defendants and cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford and C. J. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. K. McKevitt, of San Francisco (Royal E. Handlos, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

GOSBEY, Judge pro tem. This action arose out of the following facts: C. H. Forsland and Nance B. Forsland were, on the 25th day of September, 1917, husband and wife. Trouble and differences arose between them which subsequently resulted in their separation by a decree of divorce. Before the divorce was had and as a settlement of certain property rights, they entered into the following written agreement:

"This agreement, made and entered into between C. H. Forsland, hereinafter called the first party, and Nance B. Forsland, hereinafter called the second party, witnesseth that:

"Whereas unfortunate differences have arisen between the parties hereto; and

"Whereas, the parties hereto have not lived together as husband and wife for some fifteen months last past; and

"Whereas, the parties hereto entered into an agreement on the 12th day of April, 1917, wherein the first party promised and agreed to pay to the second party for her support and maintenance the sum of $100 per month, payable in advance on the 12th day of each month; and

"Whereas, litigation is now pending between the parties to set aside the agreement settling property rights heretofore referred to as well as to sever the bonds of matrimony now existing between the parties hereto; and

"Whereas the said parties desire to make a more satisfactory and final settlement of their property rights:

"Now, therefore, in lieu of any prior settlement and agreement heretofore entered into between the parties hereto and as a full and complete and final adjustment of their property rights the parties hereto agree as follows:

"In consideration of the cancellation of the prior agreement heretofore made between the parties hereto and the return to the first party of all papers, writings and documents of every kind pertaining to the business of the first party and of the Anti Teredo Paint Company, now in the possession or under the control of the second party, and also those two affidavits made by the stenographer of the Anti Teredo Paint Company reflecting upon the character of the first party hereto, and the giving up of all further claims against the first party hereto and the Anti Teredo Paint Company, and any claim that the second party might make against the estate of the first party, and the dismissal of the action now pending in the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, which suit was and is for the cancellation and setting aside of the agreement settling property rights hereinabove referred to, and also in consideration of the turning over to the first party of all of the papers, writings, documents and affidavits hereinabove referred to, the first party hereby agrees to pay to the second party the sum of four thousand dollars, and the further sum of $200 as and for her counsel fee, upon the receipt by the first party of the aforementioned papers, and also agrees to place an additional sum of one thousand dollars in a savings bank, to be turned over to the second party in a year and five days from the date hereof, provided that during the said year and five days the second party shall not in any way molest or disturb the peace of the first party, or of any employe of the Anti Teredo Paint Company, it being distinctly understood and agreed that if the second party does so disturb the peace of or molest the first party, or any employe of the Anti Teredo Paint Company, as aforesaid, during said period, she shall forfeit the said one thousand dollars, otherwise at the end of the said period the said sum of one thousand dollars shall be paid over to the second party.

"And in consideration of the foregoing payment to her by the first party of the sum of four thousand dollars, and the further sum of two hundred dollars for her counsel fee, and the further sum of one thousand dollars upon the conditions hereinbefore set out, the second party hereby consents to accept the said sum of five thousand dollars so paid as aforesaid in full settlement of all demands and claims of every character and description which she now has or may have against the first party and the Anti Teredo Paint Company, and she hereby renounces all claims against the estate of the said first party, all letters, papers, documents and contracts of every character and description pertaining to the business of the first party, or of the Anti Teredo Paint Company and the affidavits aforesaid.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have set their hands this 25th day of September, 1917.

C. H. Forsland [Seal.]

"Mrs. N. B. Forsland. [Seal.]"

On the 1st day of October, 1918, the plaintiff filed his complaint herein, alleging that he had deposited $1,000 with the Humboldt Savings Bank "upon the understanding and agreement with said Nance B. Forsland that she would return to said plaintiff certain documents, letters, papers, contracts, and formulas for the making of paint, and also that the said defendant Nance B. Forsland should not disturb the peace of the said plaintiff or molest any employé of said plaintiff"; that said bank would pay the said sum of $1,000 to said Nance B. Forsland unless restrained by the court. Plaintiff further alleges:

"That ever since the execution of the said agreement as aforesaid the said Nance B. Forsland has willfully failed, refused, and neglected to return to said plaintiff any such contracts, papers, and formulas as provided for in said agreement, and that said Nance B. Forsland in addition thereto has on several times and occasions violently disturbed the peace of plaintiff and called the said plaintiff names and spoken scandalously about plaintiff, thereby violating the terms of the said agreement."

The plaintiff prays judgment declaring that said Nance B. Forsland has no right or claim to the said $1,000, but that the same be paid to himself. The defendants deny each and all of the allegations of the complaint. Nance B. Forsland, however, as a separate defense and by way of cross-complaint, admits that she made and executed said agreement, which she sets out in hæc verba in her answer. She alleges that all of the conditions of said agreement on her part to be kept and performed were kept and performed by her; that on the 30th day of September, 1918, she was entitled to receive said sum of $1,000; but that no part thereof has been paid to her.

During the progress of the trial of the action testimony was given by the plaintiff that said Nance B. Forsland had looted his safe and taken many letters, papers, checks, contracts, etc., from him. While inquiries were being made as to the taking away of these papers, etc., the trial court concluded that further proceedings along this line were not necessary, holding that the payment of the $4,000 mentioned in the agreement had to do only with the return of said papers, contracts, etc., while the payment of the $1,000 was only in reference to another and entirely different matter, namely, that said Nance B. Forsland would not molest or disturb the peace of the plaintiff or any employé of said paint company. Upon this latter issue the court gave judgment for the defendant, Nance B. Forsland. From said judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

Notwithstanding the announcement of the trial court relative to the only issue to be considered by it in the trial of the action, we find in the record on appeal the following finding made by the court:

"That ever since the execution of said agreement said Nance B. Forsland has not willfully refused or neglected to turn over to said plaintiff papers or formulas as provided in said agreement; that no demand has been made upon her so to do."

The court furthermore found that said Nance B. Forsland did not during said period of one year and five days mentioned in said agreement, on several occasions, or at all, disturb the peace of plaintiff, or violate the terms of said agreement. Upon this latter finding and the conclusions of law based thereon the court must have rendered its judgment.

The record presented to this court shows a confusion as to the issues raised by the pleadings, the findings of fact, and the judgment rendered thereon. Yet the ruling of, and the position taken by, the trial court at the time of the trial in eliminating all consideration with reference to the payment of the $4,000 and the surrender of said papers and documents, were assented to and approved by the attorneys representing the respective parties to the action. In view, therefore, of the construction placed upon the said agreement by the said court, we shall give no further consideration to this feature of the transaction.

[1] The appellant seeks to set aside said judgment upon two grounds, which we deem are the only ones of sufficient importance to be considered, viz.: First, that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment; and, second, said agreement is void for lack of consideration therefor.

As to the first ground, the record does not show that said Nance B. Forsland ever in any manner or at any time, in the presence of either the plaintiff or any employé of said paint company, did or said anything to molest or disturb the peace of the said plaintiff or of said employé. There is evidence, however, that Nance B. Forsland did at one time make some remarks to a third party about the plaintiff, but there is a conflict in the testimony as to the words she uttered. The trial court decided that whatever words said Nance B. Forsland may have spoken concerning the plaintiff to such third party did not molest or disturb the peace of the plaintiff. We shall not interfere with the conclusion reached by the trial court in this particular.

[2, 3] As to the second ground, we find the plaintiff has put himself in a rather embarrassing position and should not now be heard to complain. In his complaint the plaintiff demanded that said $1,000 be returned to him because Nance B. Forsland had violated said agreement by molesting him and disturbing his peace, and insisted upon the enforcement of said agreement as set out in his complaint. When the trial court made its ruling and gave its construction to said agreement and rendered its judgment thereon, then for the first time plaintiff claimed that the said agreement is void for the reason recited in his specification of error, viz., that said agreement was wholly void for lack of consideration.

The trial court made no finding whatever as to the consideration mentioned in or connected with said agreement; no issue was made or presented regarding a consideration. Plaintiff should not be permitted to attempt to enforce his own cause of action on one ground, and then attempt to defeat it on another ground. Such inconsistent positions cannot be upheld.

Contracts of the nature of that portion of said agreement wherein the $1,000 is involved are legal and binding. 13 Corp. Juris, 329; Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29, 8 Pac. 614.

We are satisfied from an examination of the record in this cause that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding in regard to the $1,000 portion of said agreement and to uphold the court in its judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

HERALD v. GLENDALE LODGE NO. 1289, B. P. O. E. OF UNITED STATES.
(Civ. 3167.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California, Feb. 25, 1920.)

1. Associations ⇨20(2)—Unincorporated association cannot be sued in its own name in absence of statute.

Without express statutory authority an unincorporated association cannot be sued in its own name, but the action must be against the individual members, or some of them as representatives of all, or against the members of its governing board of trustees, or the committee if by its rules it has entrusted its management and control to such officers.

2. Associations ⇨20(2)—Statute relating to suits against associations in "business" construed.

Code Civ. Proc. § 388, providing that two or more persons associated in any "business" under a common name may be sued in such name, held not limited in its application to the associations formed for commercial business, but is applicable where a number of persons are associated under a common name in an undertaking in which the associates incur obligations for which they are legally liable, whether it is a money-making concern or otherwise, the term "business" having a common and general application to all sorts of enterprises which engage people's attention and energies.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Business.]

3. Statutes ⇨208—Word to be construed in harmony with context where open to construction.

Where the sense in which the word is used is open to construction, it should be accepted with the meaning most in harmony with the context.

4. Appearance ⇨25—Without objection to being sued in associate name held waiver of such objection.

Where incorporated association being sued in its associate name appeared without, by motion, demurrer, or answer, raising the point of misnomer, or misjoinder, or legal capacity of parties, it waived any objection that could be taken to being sued in its associate name under Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

5. Injunction ⇨103—When equity will restrain commission of crimes.

Equity will not enjoin the mere violation of a law, but will restrain the commission of acts which are violative of public policy, create a nuisance, or assail rights of property, although such acts are crimes and punishable as such.

6. Evidence ⇨84—Presumed that infractions of the law will be prosecuted.

The legal presumption is that infractions of the law will be prosecuted.

7. Evidence ⇨83(1)—Presumed officers will prosecute and courts will convict violators of ordinance.

In suit by member to enjoin lodge from serving liquor to its members in violation of an ordinance, on the ground that the continuance thereof will subject the lodge to prosecutions, fines, and other expenses and losses incident to such prosecutions, it will be presumed that the officers of the municipality will prosecute, and that courts will convict and impose the penalties provided by such ordinance.

8. Injunction ⇨102—Member held entitled to enjoin lodge from serving liquor to members.

A member of a lodge is entitled to an injunction to restrain the lodge from serving liquor to its members in violation of an ordinance, since the continuance of such practice will subject the lodge to prosecutions, fines, penalties, and other expenses incident to the prosecutions, and will affect its material prosperity and social standing.

9. Intoxicating liquors 10(2)—City may prohibit liquor under its police power.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, a municipality under its police power may enact stringent prohibition of the sale of and distribution of intoxicating liquors.

10. Intoxicating liquors 146(7)—Ordinance held to prohibit lodge serving liquor to members at luncheons or banquets.

City ordinance, prohibiting a club or association from selling, furnishing, delivering, or giving away intoxicating liquors, held to prohibit a lodge from serving its members with liquor at luncheons and banquets.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by George R. Herald against the Glendale Lodge No. 1289, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. Dean Clanton, and W. E. Evans, of Los Angeles, amicus curiae, for appellant.

Bert P. Woodard, of San Francisco, and Michael F. Shannon, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal after demurrer sustained to complaint without leave to amend. Plaintiff brought the action as a member of the defendant lodge to enjoin it from serving beer to the members at luncheons and banquets in violation of an ordinance of the city of Glendale prohibiting the serving or distribution of malt or spirituous liquors by any person, club, corporation, or association.

No briefs are on file, other than that of the city attorney of Glendale, appearing on behalf of the complainant as amicus curiae. It is represented that the issue presented has become of slight practical concern to the club because of the potent stimulus to abstemious practices of the prohibition amendment to the federal Constitution. However, as there is nothing before us to indicate that the controversy has become a moot question, it seems necessary to decide the points raised upon the record.

The demurrer upon which the complaint was held insufficient alleged: insufficiency of facts to constitute a cause of action; that the acts complained of do not constitute a public offense or violation of the ordinance of the city of Glendale; and that the city of Glendale was without constitutional power to enact the ordinance prohibiting the serving of beer to its members by the lodge.

The first question which presents itself upon the face of the record—although not directly raised by the demurrer or referred to in the brief on file—is whether or not the defendant lodge can be sued in its associate name. It does not appear from the complaint that the defendant has any legal entity. The complaint alleges that—

“This defendant, Glendale Lodge No. 1289 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States, is a fraternal and charitable organization, instituted upon the authority and by permission of the Grand Lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the United States of America, and the only authority by which such lodge 1289 has heretofore and now continues to exist is by virtue of a charter granted to it by said Grand Lodge, which charter is subject to revocation by said Grand Lodge.”

[1] There is nothing in this statement to give legal personality to the defendant. It must be considered as an unincorporated association, and as such cannot be sued in its associate name, unless it comes under the provisions of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that—

“When two or more persons, associated in any business, * * * under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name.”

It is clearly established by the decisions that without express statutory authority an unincorporated association cannot be sued in its own name, but that the action must be against the individual members, or some of them as representatives of all, or against the members of its governing board of trustees or committee, if by its rules it has intrusted its management and control to such officers. Pearson v. Anderburg, 28 Utah, 495, 80 Pac. 307; Pomeroy's Remedies, 395; Doyle v. Burke, 29 R. I. 123, 69 Atl. 362, 16 Ann. Cas. 1245; Greer, Mills & Co. v. Stoller (C. C.) 77 Fed. 1; Spaulding v. Evenson (C. C.) 149 Fed. 913; Kimball v. Lower Columbia, etc., Ass'n, 67 Or. 249, 135 Pac. 877.

Neither can section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure be appealed to very confidently as permitting this action to be maintained against the defendant lodge in its associate name. By its terms this section is limited in its application to an association “in business” of two or more persons under a common name. If the word “business,” in this connection, means an actual commercial business, carried on for profit, the defendant here, as described in the complaint, cannot qualify. As alleged in the complaint, its purposes are purely social and benevolent. It maintains a clubhouse, with lodgerooms, amusement rooms, kitchen, banquet hall, and other accessories for the amusement and entertainment of its members. The expenses of the lodge, including the expense of maintaining the clubrooms, kitchen, and banquet hall, are met by the payment of regular monthly dues by the members. It owns property; but neither the lodge nor any feature connected therewith is run for profit or gain; and all funds remaining after the expenses of the lodge are paid are devoted to charity or the furtherance of the lodge's interests in pursuit of its regular and legitimate purposes. It clearly is not a business concern, in any mercantile or commercial sense. On the other hand, if the word is used with the more general and very common meaning of any occupation, employment, or interest in which persons may engage, it would include this defendant. The California decisions are by no means in harmony or determinative on this point.

In the case of Warman Co. v. Redondo Beach Chamber of Commerce, 34 Cal. App. 37, 166 Pac. 856, decided in June, 1917, the first division of the Court of Appeal for the Second District held that the defendant, an unincorporated association organized for the general promotion of the business interests and general prosperity of the community, was not a business organization such as contemplated under section 388, Code of Civil Procedure, and that action against it could not be maintained in its common name—citing Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, 67 Cal. 567, 8 Pac. 94, a case of doubtful relevance, and St. Paul Typothetæ v. St. Paul Book Binders' Union, 94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 727, 3 Ann. Cas. 695, which is clearly in point. In the latter case, construing a statutory provision practically identical with section 388, Code of Civil Procedure, in its application to an unincorporated trades union society, the Minnesota Supreme Court says:

"The statute, it is clear, was not intended to include associations of this character. Its purpose was to authorize the courts to take jurisdiction over unincorporated associations engaged under a common name in some sort of business in which property is bought and sold, debts contracted—concerns owning and holding property and incurring pecuniary liability—and not associations of the character of labor unions, having no property, engaged in no business occupation, in a proper sense of the term, and whose only function is the promotion of the interests and welfare of the persons who are members thereof."

On the other hand, the First Appellate District Court of this state, in a later decision, of date November 13, 1917 (Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 Pac. 409) without referring to the case in the second district—and, it must be admitted, without the consideration given to the matter in the last-mentioned case—uses the following language:

"We do not think it was necessary to authorize the maintenance of the action against the members of the club by their common name, to show by the complaint the specific purpose or purposes for which the members of the club had so associated themselves together. Nor is it important whether it was a voluntary association, and not organized and conducted for pecuniary profit to its projectors or members. Armstrong v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 341, 342 [159 Pac. 1176]. By this we mean to say that 388 has reference to an association of two or more persons who thus band together for the purpose of transacting as a single body any kind of business, whether for profit to themselves or for charitable or philanthropic purposes."

The case of Armstrong v. Superior Court, cited in the foregoing decision, does not throw much light on the subject, because in that case the matter arose on a record, as shown by the pleadings, and, the complaint having alleged the defendant to be "an association composed of two or more persons associated in business under a common name," it sufficiently appeared that it could be sued under section 388.

[2, 3] We are inclined to hold with the ruling in Camm v. Justice's Court, supra. We see no sufficient reason for restricting section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure to associations formed for commercial business. As already pointed out, the term "business" has a common and general application to all sorts of enterprises which engage people's attention and energies. When a number of persons are associated under a common name in an undertaking in which the associates incur obligations for which they are legally liable, why should they not be sued in the common name which they have adopted, whether it is a money-making concern or otherwise? Indeed, the question of profit is the only distinction that exists between the two classes of associations suggested. If a number of persons were associated together, furnishing to their patrons for pay precisely the same accommodations, entertainment and service that the Elks' lodge furnishes its members, there would be no question but that they were engaged in a "business." Why should a different rule of liability exist because the associates happen to contract their liabilities in an enterprise in which they are catering to themselves? The word "business," in its broad sense, embraces everything about which one can be employed; and in its narrower sense it signifies a calling for the purposes of livelihood or profit. Easterbrook v. Orphan Society, 85 Conn. 289, 82 Atl. 561, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615. Where the sense in which the word is used is open to construction, it should be accepted with the meaning most in harmony with the context. Parker Mills v. Commissioner, 23 N. Y. 242.

[4] However, irrespective of which of the conflicting constructions of the Code section under consideration should prevail, we are of the opinion that there has been a waiver of the point that in this instance suit was improperly instituted in the associate name of the lodge. The question presented does not involve the sufficiency of the cause of action as pleaded, or jurisdiction of the court, particularly in view of the fact that it is not the circumstance that defendant is an unincorporated association, but the class of unincorporated associations to which it belongs, that is the test of the liability to suit under the association name. An appearance was entered here by the defendant in the name under which suit was brought, without, by motion, demurrer, or answer, raising the point of misnomer or misjoinder or legal capacity of parties. Under section 434 of the Code of Civil Procedure, all objections not so taken, and not going to the sufficiency of the cause of action or the jurisdiction of the court, are waived. Deems v. Albany & Canal Line, 14 Blatchf. 474, 7 Fed. Cas. 348; Liederkrantz Singing Soc. v. Germania Turn Verein, 163 Pa. 265, 29 Atl. 918, 43 Am. St. Rep. 798; Agricultural Extension Club, etc., v. Hirsch, 179 Pac. 430. The case of Armstrong v. Superior Court, supra, is at least authority sustaining the power of the court to issue an injunction in an action against associations, under their common name, which shall be operative "against * * * all members of any such association having knowledge of the terms of any injunction issued therein, as well as all their officers, agents, representatives, and employés."

The next question—as to the ruling of the court on the demurrer to this complaint—goes to the power of a court of equity to enjoin the alleged unlawful serving of malt or spirituous liquors by defendant at the lodge banquets, and whether such action can be taken on the complaint of a member of the society complained of. These precise issues were presented to the Supreme Court in the cases of Cuzner v. California Club, 155 Cal. 303, 100 Pac. 868, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, and Varcoe v. Alameda Lodge, B. P. O. E., 174 Cal. 549, 163 Pac. 909. Both actions were by individual club members to enjoin sale or distribution of liquors to members in alleged violation of local ordinances. Both cases went off on the decision of the Supreme Court that the practices complained of did not come within the provisions of the ordinances pleaded. No other point is referred to in the opinion in the Varcoe Case; but in Cuzner v. California Club, the court, inferentially, at least, recognized the right of a club member to prosecute such action. Mr. Justice Angellotti, delivering the opinion of the court, said, "It is assumed by the parties that such an action will lie on behalf of a member of the club," and cited Klein v. Livingston Club, 177 Pa. 224, 35 Atl. 606, 34 L. R. A. 94, 55 Am. St. Rep. 717. In the case cited—and thus incidentally approved—the right of a club member to prosecute injunction proceedings to restrain illegal sale of liquors was recognized. But that case also went off on the point that the acts of the club complained of were not in violation of law. The court, however, says:

"A bill having for its sole purpose an injunction against crime or misdemeanor it is well settled does not lie; but it is just as well settled that equity will interfere if the alleged criminal acts go further and operate to the destruction of or diminution of value of property."

[5] In the case of Manderson v. Commercial Bank, 28 Pa. 379, which, in principle, is somewhat analogous to the case here, the charter of the bank, granted by an act of the Legislature, provided that "the rate of discount at which loans shall be made shall not exceed one-half of one per centum for thirty days." It was held that an injunction should issue at the instance of a stockholder to prohibit the practice of the directors in discounting notes at a rate in excess of that allowed by its charter, on the ground that such a practice jeopardized the rights of the stockholders. The court says:

"A violation of the rule in relation to the rate of discount may expose the institution to the penalties for usury, and may also put the continuance of the charter in doubt. A stockholder has a right to the necessary means to prevent a course of practice which may produce such results."

It is beyond controversy that equity will not interfere by injunction to prevent the mere violation of law; but it is equally well settled that injunction may issue to restrain the commission of acts which are violative of public policy, which create a nuisance or assail the rights of property, although such acts are crimes and punishable as such. O'Hara v. Stack, 90 Pa. 477; Niblack, Benefit Societies, 115, 120; 14 R. C. L. 368; Roper v. Burke, 83 Ala. 193, 3 South. 439; Goodman v. Jedidjah Lodge, 67 Md. 117, 9 Atl. 13, 13 Atl. 627; Christensen v. Kellogg, etc., Co., 110 Ill. App. 61; People v. Tool, 35 Colo. 225, 86 Pac. 224, 229, 231, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 822, 117 Am. St. Rep. 198; Hackney v. Vawter, 39 Kan. 615, 18 Pac. 699; Cope v. District Fair Ass'n, 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30. The case last cited was an action by a stockholder of the fair association to enjoin concessions to gambling devices. Relief in that case was denied on the ground that—

"The licensing of gambling tables * * * cannot in any sense be regarded as the act of the company * * * unless authorized by the stockholders, in which case it would doubtless be such an abuse of the company's franchise as would warrant the state in restraining them."

The court further says:

"If the bill in this case showed any pecuniary loss or injury, it would present an entirely different question."

[6-8] The petitioner in the present case bases his claim to relief on the fact that he is a member of the lodge, and as such directly and financially interested in its affairs; that the lodge refuses to desist from, and threatens to continue, the practice of the unlawful serving of beer to its members and guests; and that as a result of such violation of the law the lodge will thereby subject itself to prosecutions, fines, and penalties, and other expenses and losses incident to such prosecutions. The legal presumption is that such infractions of the law will be prosecuted; that if the facts are as here pleaded—which, for the purposes of this appeal, must be presumed—the defendant lodge will be fined, and perhaps put to expense for attorney's fees and other incidental costs; and that such fines, costs, and expenses will fall upon the membership of the club, or at least be paid from money in which the members have an interest. It is not to be doubted—at least the law will not entertain a doubt—that the officers of the municipality will prosecute, and its courts will convict, those who are guilty of criminal offenses within its jurisdiction, and that the penalties provided will be imposed and enforced. Why, then, should not the individual members of the lodge be entitled to enjoin such harmful consequences as would thus result? This procedure is not against the infraction of law in itself, but against the infliction upon the club and its members of the pecuniary loss, as well, perhaps, as social odium affecting the material prosperity of the club, growing out of the unlawful method adopted by the managers in carrying on its business.

[9, 10] The remaining question is as to the constitutionality of the ordinance pleaded and its application to the alleged practices of the defendant lodge. That a municipality in this state, under section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, is empowered, under its police authority, to enact the most stringent prohibition of the sale and distribution of intoxicating liquors has been settled by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court. Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. 747; Ex parte Ellsworth, 165 Cal. 677, 133 Pac. 272; Ex parte Anixter, 166 Cal. 762, 138 Pac. 356. And we think it clearly appears that the Glendale city ordinance covers the alleged offense of the defendant lodge in serving liquor to its members. The ordinance in question is about as sweeping and inclusive as language can make it. It declares that any person, firm, corporation, club, or association that keeps or maintains a place where vinous, malt, or mixed liquors or any alcoholic or intoxicating drinks are sold, furnished, delivered, or given away, or that sells, furnishes, or delivers any such drinks, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and that every person having in his possession any such liquors with intent to sell or distribute the same, and every person who visits or is present at any place where such liquors are sold, kept, delivered, or given away in violation of the ordinance, is guilty of a misdemeanor. This ordinance is easily distinguishable from that under consideration in Cuzner v. California Club, supra, where it was held that the prohibition was only directed to persons, associations, etc., "conducting, managing or carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer." In Varcoe v. Alameda Lodge, supra, it was also held that the charter provision in question was applicable only to those engaged in the business of selling or dispensing intoxicating liquors. Although in that case the language of the charter is similar to the ordinance before us, in declaring it "unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to establish, open, keep or carry on any saloon, bar, store or any place where liquors are sold or given away, or for any person to sell, barter, or give away any intoxicating liquors without a license," this rather inclusive language is modified by further provisions indicating a limitation of its application to places where liquor is dispensed as a business—as, for instance, the direction that "no license shall be issued entitling the licensee to carry on the business licensed at more than one place." In both cases above cited the laws construed were license regulations, but in both decisions the Supreme Court expressly holds that it was within the power of the municipalities to absolutely prohibit all traffic in intoxicating drinks as a beverage, if they so enacted in explicit terms. We think that this has been done in the ordinance here pleaded, and that the complaint states facts which show that the defendant lodge was engaged in the habitual serving of malt liquors in violation of law, under circumstances calculated to inflict pecuniary loss on the lodge and its members, and that, under the facts as pleaded, the plaintiff was entitled to maintain his action.

The order and judgment appealed from are reversed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; THOMAS, J.

JUMP v. BARR et al. (Civ. 2071.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 26, 1920.)

1. Mortgages §401(2) — Provision for acceleration of maturity on default in payment of interest does not involve forfeiture.

Provision in note or mortgage to secure its payment, or in both, that, on default in payment of interest accumulated on note at time specified, owner of note and mortgage may treat whole of principal and interest as due before maturity of note, is merely agreement as to time when debt shall become due and enforceable, and does not involve forfeiture.

2. Mortgages §401(4) — Holder seeking to foreclose under acceleration clause need not give notice of election to declare principal due.

Holder of note secured by mortgage, with provision whole debt shall become due on failure to pay installment of interest, before commencing foreclosure action under acceleration clause need not give notice to defaulting maker and mortgagor of election to declare principal due for nonpayment of interest.

3. Trial §393(1) — Recitals of fact in decree may be treated as findings.

Where recitals of decree foreclosing mortgage involved full statement of ultimate facts, or all facts essential to support decree, facts stated may be treated as findings, and proposed findings signed nunc pro tunc by trial judge may be disregarded, and propriety of signing not determined.

4. Appeal and error §1170(10) — Inclusion of findings and conclusions in decree not reversible error.

Illegality in procedure in including in judgment or decree itself findings of fact and conclusions of law held not to have caused a miscarriage of judgment in suit to foreclose mortgage so as to justify reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

5. Appeal and error §1050(3) — Evidence admitted held harmless in view of facts and stipulation.

In suit to foreclose mortgage executed by corporation, where both note and mortgage bore name and seal of corporation, and the genuineness of the officers' signatures was stipulated by counsel for the company and individual defendants, admission in evidence of letter, signed by company's officers, stating that at meeting of directors authority was vested in company to negotiate loan and give mortgage, held harmless to individual defendant.

6. Corporations §432(5) — Burden is on objector to show corporate mortgage was made without authority.

Where mortgage, purporting to have been given by corporation to secure debt or money borrowed, is signed by proper officers under corporate seal, presumption is that officers have been fully authorized, or did not transcend their authority, and the burden is on adverse party to show want of authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by James W. Jump against Florence A. Barr, Walter G. McCarty and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant Barr appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Davis, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Leo V. Youngworth and Vernon Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. From a decree of foreclosure of mortgage on real property in the county of Los Angeles, defendant Florence A. Barr prosecutes this appeal.

On the 1st day of April, 1914, Walter G. McCarty Company, a corporation, executed to plaintiff a promissory note in the sum of $4,000, payable three years after date, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly. Said note contained the following provision:

"Should default be made in the payment of any installment of interest when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note."

The mortgage in question was given as security for the payment of said note. The only interest payment made on the note was that which fell due on the first day of July, 1914, which payment was made 10 days thereafter.

The complaint in the action was filed on the 10th day of February, 1917, 19 days before the maturity of the note. It stated specifically and separately the several amounts falling due from time to time as interest on the note, the last item of interest so stated being: "Interest due January 25th, 1917." Then follows this averment:

"That by reason of the nonpayment of said interest which became due as hereinbefore set forth and which is now due, owing and unpaid, plaintiff herein elects to declare and does hereby declare the whole sum of principal and interest immediately due and payable."

The charter of Walter G. McCarty Company became forfeited on the 4th day of March, 1916, by reason of its failure to pay the state license tax required by law. Walter G. McCarty, Margaret E. McCarty, and W. H. McCarty, sued as trustees of said corporation, and Florence A. Barr filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and the defendants the McCartys made no further appearance. The defendant Barr answered the complaint, alleging that she was the owner in fee of the property mortgaged by the corporation; that the principal sum of the alleged note is not yet due; that plaintiff had no legal right to declare the whole sum of principal and interest immediately due and payable, and has not done so; that the mortgagee has repeatedly waived the provision of said note giving him such option; "that every installment of interest that was ever paid on said note and mortgage was paid long after same fell due and was received and accepted by the payee long after the same had become due;" that it had become the custom of defendants to pay and the plaintiff to receive said interest long after the same was due, and plaintiff has never notified defendants of his intention to depart from such custom, and that by such conduct plaintiff has waived his right to declare a forfeiture by reason of the non-payment of interest.

At the trial, proof was received of the execution of the note and mortgage in question, the payment of one installment of interest, the payment of taxes, etc., by plaintiff. A motion for nonsuit was made and denied, and defendant introduced no evidence.

It is contended by appellant—

"That the failure on the part of the mortgagee to declare a forfeiture on the numerous occasions when that right was open to him constituted a waiver of that right on his part which could only be reinstated by notice to the mortgagor that in the future prompt payment would be expected."

This argument is based upon the fact that the mortgagor never paid any but the installment of interest first falling due, he having failed and refused to pay the 10 successive installments falling due prior to the institution of this action.

[1] The action here is not, as appellant seems to suppose, one to declare a forfeiture by reason of the default of the defendant in paying interest on the note at the time stipulated therein. The action to foreclose the mortgage proceeds entirely upon a breach of the agreement that the defendant would pay the accruing interest on the note at certain designated times and that upon its failure to comply with that provision of the agreement the payee of the note would be at liberty at his option to treat the whole sum of principal and interest as being due and payable, and, if exercising his right to treat the whole sum as due, to proceed to collect or enforce the collection of the principal and the accrued interest. There is no forfeiture to be made or suffered or penalty imposed. The maker of the note loses nothing but the right it acquired under the contract to retain the payee's money until the expiration of the time during which the note was to run, and this right it has lost because of failure on its part to comply with the agreement as to the payment of interest. The situation is altogether different from where a party has paid his own money in part payment for something under an agreement for a sale, providing that he is, upon a certain or the first payment, to take possession of the thing he proposes to purchase, and that if he fails to make other stipulated payments at other specified times he is to return the thing to the vendor and the latter is to retain the money already paid. The case suggested involves a forfeiture. This is, as stated, simply a case of breaching an agreement whereby one party lends to another certain of his property upon the condition that with respect to the loan the borrower will do a certain thing, which he fails to do, and thus loses his right further to retain or keep in his possession the thing loaned. In other words, a provision in a note or in a mortgage to secure its payment, or in both, that, upon default in the payment of the interest accumulating upon the note at the time specified, the owner of the note and the mortgage may treat the whole of the principal and interest due before the date of the maturity of the note, is nothing more than an agreement as to the time when the debt shall become due and enforceable according to its terms. Dunn v. Barry, 35 Cal. App. 325, 169 Pac. 910; Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) § 1181; Whitcher v. Webb, 44 Cal. 127; Bank, etc., et al. v. Mundy, 162 Ill. App. 138; Curran v. Houston, 201 Ill. 442, 66 N. E. 228. In Dunn v. Barry, just named, the facts are mutatis mutandis, precisely the same as those of the case at bar, and therein Justice Burnett of this court, clearly shows that there is no forfeiture involved or inhering in the contract of the character of the one we are now dealing with. That case is, indeed, decisive of the point under consideration against the position of the appellant.

The cases named by the appellant do not support her contention. Two of these cases only involve actions to foreclose mortgages, to wit, Crossmore v. Page, 73 Cal. 213, 14 Pac. 787, 2 Am. St. Rep. 789, and Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 556, 91 Pac. 385. In the first-named case it appeared that the defendant defaulted in the payment of interest on a promissory note which provided that, "if default be made in the payment of the interest, as above provided, then this note shall immediately become due at the option of the holder," but that the holder of the note did not bring suit to foreclose the mortgage given to secure the note until some months after the default. It was held that, while the holder of the note was entitled to a reasonable time after default in the payment of the interest within which to exercise his option, a delay of 7 months was unreasonable, and that, in attempting to exercise his right of option, the plaintiff was required to remain within the terms of his contract, which he did not do; hence, so it was held, it was necessary for him to wait until the next installment of interest was due. Here the action was brought 16 days after the last installment of interest became due.

In the other case (Trinity County Bank v. Haas), the defendant had failed to pay the interest due and payable on July 11, 1904, and a subsequent installment fell due on October 11, 1904. On the latter date one of the defendants, who had purchased the greater part of the mortgaged property and assumed the mortgage debt, tendered to the plaintiffs the interest then due comprising the two installments payable, respectively, on July 11, 1904, and October 11, 1904. The tender was refused on the ground that the plaintiffs had exercised their option "of considering both principal and interest due on that note and that their money was not sufficient." The defendant Elliott, who made the tender, thereupon and immediately deposited the aggregate amount of the interest due on the two installments "in a bank of deposit of good repute and gave notice thereof to plaintiffs." Civ. Code, § 1500. The only evidence of the exercise of the option by plaintiffs was that, two weeks before the commencement of the action to foreclose the mortgage, they had elected to exercise their option and declare the whole note due and payable and had directed their attorneys to proceed to foreclose the mortgage. The defendants were given no notice of such election until the day on which they tendered payment of the interest due on the two installments above mentioned. The Supreme Court held that the right to exercise the option and declare the whole amount of the note due was lost by reason of the fact that the defaulting debtor offered to pay the overdue interest prior to the time at which the attempt was made to exercise the option by the commencement of the suit to foreclose.

[2] Referring in this connection to the contention of appellant here that, before the mortgagee could exercise his right of option, it was requisite for him to have given the mortgagor notice of his default and of the former's election to declare the whole debt due, we may quote the following from the case last above considered as a sufficient reply thereto:

"It is settled by several decisions of this court that the holder of an instrument of this kind need not, before commencing his action, give any notice to the defaulting maker of his election to declare the principal due for nonpayment of interest. Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5 [27 Pac. 423]; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600 [29 Pac. 220]; Clemens v. Luce, 101 Cal. 432 [35 Pac. 1032]; Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156 [58 Pac. 451]. As was said in Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5 [27 Pac. 423]: 'The commencement of the action was notice of the exercise of the option, * * * and no previous notice or demand was necessary.'"

It is obvious that the above cases do not uphold the position of counsel on the point now in question.

The other cases cited by the defendant to the same point are Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Myers v. Williams, 173 Cal. 301, 159 Pac. 982; Pearson v. Brown, 27 Cal. App. 125, 148 Pac. 956; and Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751. A brief statement of the character of these cases will show that they are not applicable to the case here. The first case was for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, the contract containing a provision that the balance due after the first payment made on the execution of the contract should be paid in certain specified monthly installments, with the stipulated interest, and, if any installment was not paid within 60 days after it fell due, the whole of the unpaid balance should, at the option of the vendor, forthwith become due, in which case the vendor was authorized to sell the land to satisfy the unpaid portion and to retain as forfeited all previous payments.

Myers v. Williams is in its facts similar to the case of Boone v. Templeman; the action there, however, being for the purpose of having declared as forfeited the rights of a vendee under a contract for the sale of real property and to recover the possession of the said realty.

Pearson v. Brown was an action by the vendee to recover from the vendor a certain sum of money paid by the former under a contract for the sale of real property, which provided that, in the event that the vendee defaulted in the payment of any of the installments as provided therein, his rights in the property or under the contract and the moneys by him already paid should be forfeited, the latter as liquidated damages.

Stevinson v. Joy involved an action by the vendor in a contract for the sale of real property on the installment plan to quiet title to said property, the contract containing a provision as to default in payments of the purchase price and forfeiture substantially the same as those contained in the contracts considered in the cases last above referred to.

It is, of course, manifest that those cases dealt with contracts involving and authorizing forfeitures for breach of covenants as to time payments, and are therefore, as declared, entirely different from this case by reason of the provisions of the contracts authorizing action on the part of the vendors amounting in the very nature of the situation to a forfeiture.

[3, 4] It is next urged that the court was without jurisdiction to sign and cause to be filed findings of fact at the time at which that act was performed. The facts are: Findings of fact and conclusions of law were not waived. Proposed findings, unsigned by the judge and undated, were filed with the clerk on the 8th day of June, 1917. On the 11th day of June, 1917, the court signed and filed its decree. Thereafter, and on the 6th day of September, 1917, without notice to appellant or her counsel, and after a notice of appeal had been served and filed, the judge who tried the case signed the proposed findings, nunc pro tunc, as of the 11th day of June, 1917.

It has been held that, under certain circumstances, and upon the principle that justice requires it, the signing of findings, nunc pro tunc, is allowable. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328, and cases therein cited. It has also been held that, while the nisi prius court may correct a mere clerical misprision in the record or correct its records so as to make them speak the truth, after an appeal has been taken (Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 573, 75 Pac. 174), it cannot after such appeal amend its findings (Baggs v. Smith, 53 Cal. 88). But whether, where findings having been proposed which derive ample support from the evidence and which in turn amply support the judgment, such findings may be signed nunc pro tunc as of the date of the previous signing of the decree or judgment after an appeal therefrom has been taken, is a proposition as to which we have been furnished with no authorities directly in point. And we find no reason for considering or deciding the point herein, since the recitals of the decree in this case themselves involve a full statement of the ultimate facts or all the facts essential to support the decree, and the facts so stated may be treated as findings. In other words, the decree itself is sufficient as findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a judgment. The practice of specifically including in the judgment itself the findings of fact and conclusions of law may be irregular, but it is not such an irregularity as should or will require a reversal. Certainly, such irregularity, which is only an irregularity in procedure, cannot well be held to have caused a miscarriage of justice in this case. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

[5] A letter, signed by the president and secretary of the corporation Walter G. McCarty Company, stating that at a meeting of the board of directors thereof, previously held, authority was vested in the corporation to negotiate and make the loan and give the mortgage involved herein, and which letter was delivered to the plaintiff at the time the mortgage was executed, was admitted in evidence against the objection of the appellant for the purpose of showing authority in said corporation to borrow the money and to execute the mortgage as security for its repayment. The ruling is here assigned as prejudicial error. No prejudice could have been suffered by the defendants from the allowance of that evidence, even if it were deemed necessary to concede that it was incompetent for the purpose for which it was offered and received. Both the note and the mortgage bore the name and the seal of said corporation, and the genuineness of the signatures of the president and the secretary of the corporation was stipulated by counsel for defendants and appellant. Moreover, the fact that the defendant corporation obtained the loan secured by the mortgage to foreclose which this action was brought and used the money for its purposes is not questioned here.

[6] It is an elementary principle of the law that, where a mortgage purporting to have been given by a corporation to secure a debt or money borrowed by it is signed by the proper officers of such corporation under its corporate seal, the presumption is that the officers whose names are subscribed to the instrument and by whom for the corporation the mortgage purports to have been executed have been duly authorized to perform that act, or did not, in making the mortgage, transcend their authority as such officers, and the burden in such case is upon the adversary party to overcome that presumption by showing want of authority in such officers to execute the mortgage as that of the corporation. Schallard v. Eel River Nav. Co., 70 Cal. 144, 11 Pac. 590; Mills v. Boyle Mining Co., 132 Cal. 95, 64 Pac. 122; Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609. No evidence was offered by the appellant to show that the mortgage and the note involved in this action were not executed by authority of the corporation, and therefore the presumptive evidence referred to stands as proof of the fact that the execution of said instruments was duly authorized by the corporation.

We have now considered all the points advanced in support of this appeal. There is to our minds no force to any of them.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

PEOPLE v. HANEY. (Cr. 883.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 25, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §531(4) — Confession improperly admitted without permitting cross-examination as to voluntary character.

On a trial for homicide, it was error to permit witnesses to testify as to an alleged confession without first permitting defendant to cross-examine the witnesses as to the conditions under which the statement was made and its free and voluntary character.

2. Criminal law §531(1)—Confession not admissible until voluntary character is shown.

Before defendant's confession can be offered in evidence it must be shown by the prosecution that it was voluntary and made without any previous inducement or by reason of any intimidation or threat.

3. Criminal law §736(2) — Whether confession was voluntary is question for court.

Whether an alleged confession was voluntary and made without previous inducement or by reason of intimidation or threat is a preliminary question upon the admissibility of the testimony addressed to the court, and to be determined by it and not by the jury.

4. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Exclusion of cross-examination before admission of confession rendered harmless by subsequent cross-examination.

The refusal to permit defendant to cross-examine witnesses as to the voluntary character of an alleged confession before admitting the confession does not justify a reversal, when the cross-examination of the witnesses, after the confession was introduced, fails to show that it was involuntary, or fails to impeach the previous testimony of the witnesses in that respect.

5. Criminal law §516—False explanation of matter not a confession.

On a trial for murdering the driver of an automobile which defendant and another thereupon stole, defendant's statement when arrested that he purchased the automobile from certain parties is merely an untruthful statement and not a confession.

6. Criminal law §531(3)—Evidence held to show voluntary character of confession to police officers.

On a trial for murder, evidence held to show that a confession to police officers while in custody was voluntary, though the officers admonished defendant that he had better tell the truth and that they expected him to tell the truth.

7. Criminal law §519(9)—Confession to police officers who said they had evidence of guilt not necessarily involuntary.

That a confession was made to police officers who questioned defendant while he was under arrest, and that they told defendant that they had evidence of his guilt, did not necessarily render the confession involuntary.

8. Criminal law §717 — Refusal to permit counsel to read judicial opinions proper.

On a trial for murder, in which the prosecution introduced an alleged confession made by defendant while in custody, the court properly refused to permit defendant's counsel, in his argument, to read from judicial opinions, discussing third degree methods of obtaining confessions.

9. Criminal law §822(4) — Instruction as a whole not objectionable as telling jury evidence showed certain intent.

On a trial for homicide, an instruction that if the jury found from the evidence that defendant was at the place claimed with intent to commit robbery, and had an associate named C., and if they found at such time, "with the intention of committing this robbery, as the evidence goes to show that—if you find such to be the fact—that a blow was struck" by defendant or his associate, from which deceased died, it made no difference which party struck the blow, both being engaged in committing the robbery, if the jury so found, one was as guilty as the other, was not objectionable as telling the jury that the evidence showed an intention to commit robbery, as this impression was corrected by what followed.

10. Homicide §305—Instruction as to liability if either defendant or his associate struck fatal blow not objectionable.

On a trial for homicide claimed to have been committed in committing robbery, an instruction that it made no difference whether defendant or his companion struck the blow, if the jury believed the claim of the prosecution that there was a common design on the part of the two, was not objectionable.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

William Haney was convicted of murder, and he appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Joseph J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. Defendant was charged with the murder of Albert Reidinger. He was tried, convicted of murder in the first degree, with the punishment fixed at life imprisonment. This appeal is from said judgment of conviction and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

On the 29th of May, 1919, the defendant approached George Baldwin and offered to sell him a Ford automobile, which, he said, "was coming up from Los Angeles." Baldwin desired to purchase such a machine. The defendant and a young man by the name of Red Christiansen spent the rest of the day in the Mission district and downtown section of San Francisco looking for a Ford automobile. At the ferry building they found Reidinger driving the car they wanted.

They engaged him to take them to Daly City. When near Coppas's corner, in that vicinity, the defendant struck Reidinger over the head with a piston from a riveting machine—a short iron bar about three-fourths of an inch thick—fracturing his skull. They then drove to a lonely spot nearby, and laid the body in the bushes by the roadside, putting one of the cushions of the automobile under the head. Defendant and Christiansen then returned to San Francisco, leaving the automobile in front of Haney's home. The next morning he washed the blood out of the car, wiped off the dust, and delivered the automobile to Baldwin, who paid him for it. Reidinger died of his injuries some weeks later.

The actual commission of the crime by the defendant was established at the trial by the testimony of the police officers who arrested the defendant some days after the commission of the crime; they narrating, while on the witness stand, the details of a confession said to have been made to them by the defendant. A deputy sheriff of San Mateo county also told of a conversation he had with the defendant, in the county jail, shortly after he was taken there following his arrest and examination by the San Francisco police officers.

The defendant did not take the stand or produce any witnesses on his own behalf. No question is raised by the appellant as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. The main points made on the appeal may be summed up under one heading, to wit: The validity of the trial court's ruling with respect to the admission in evidence of the confession made by the defendant to the police officers after his arrest. Two questions present themselves: (1) Did the trial court unduly limit the defendant in his cross-examination of the officers prior to the admission of the confession? (2) Was the confession free and voluntary?

The crime with which the defendant was charged was committed on the 30th day of May, 1919. He was arrested at his home at about 1 o'clock on the morning of June 13th, following, and then taken to the hall of justice in the city of San Francisco. Before he was placed in jail three police officers, Dullea, Lindecker, and Hughes, engaged him in conversation. It was then 2:30 o'clock in the morning; the defendant and the police officers were alone in the room. At that time the defendant merely told the officers that he purchased the automobile from parties by the name of Harris for the sum of $100 and sold it to Baldwin. On the morning of June 20th, the defendant was again questioned by Officers Dullea and Lindecker and by Sergeant McQuaid. During this conversation, which lasted from 9:30 o'clock until 11 o'clock, the defendant narrated all the details of the crime, making a complete confession of his part in its commission. As he proceeded, the sergeant wrote the confession in his notebook, and read it to the defendant when he had finished. Haney then signed his name to the following indorsement on the sergeant's notes:

"This statement is made free and voluntarily without any promise of reward, or any threats, and in the presence of Charles W. Dullea, Phil. Lindecker, Arthur McQuaid, at room 14 of the hall of justice, from 9:30 a. m. to 11 a. m., June 20, 1919."

[1-3] When the case came on for trial and the corpus delicti had been proved, the prosecution called Officers Dullea and Lindecker and Sergeant McQuaid as witnesses to the details of the two conversations. The first of these, Dullea, was asked concerning the interview with the defendant on the morning of his arrest. Before Dullea was allowed to answer, counsel demanded the right, and the court permitted him, to cross-examine him as to the voluntary character of the conversation. Counsel had not proceeded far, however, when the court directed the district attorney to proceed. This he did, over the objection of the defendant's counsel, and obtained the witness' version of the defendant's statement at that time. Officers Dullea and Lindecker and Sergeant McQuaid were each, in turn, examined as to the confession obtained from the defendant on the morning of June 20th. Upon their being asked to give the statement, the counsel for the defendant, in each instance, requested permission to cross-examine the witnesses as to the conditions under which the statement was made, and as to the free and voluntary nature of the conversation. The court very peremptorily denied the request and, as before, directed the district attorney to proceed.

It is urged by the appellant that the trial court was arbitrary in his rulings in this regard. We agree that this statement is correct. Before any confession of a defendant can be offered in evidence it must be shown by the prosecution that it was voluntary, and made without any previous inducement, or by reason of any intimidation or threat. This is a preliminary question upon the admissibility of the testimony addressed to the court, and to be determined by it, and not by the jury. Upon such preliminary inquiry the court should permit a cross-examination of the witness for the purpose of showing the particular circumstances under which the confession was made before permitting the confession itself to be given in evidence. People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 71, 67 Pac. 12; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 17, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193. Unless that is done, the trial court is not in a position to rule understandingly on the question of the admission of the confession. Great injury may be done to a defendant by the admission in evidence of a confession which further examination may disclose does not possess the necessary element of being free and voluntary. The only safe, and, we may add, the only fair, method to pursue in such cases is to allow a sufficient cross-examination to determine that question before the jury is permitted to hear the evidence tending to establish the confession.

[4] A refusal to permit such cross-examination will not, however, justify a reversal of the judgment, when it appears from the record that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. If the cross-examination of the witness after the confession has been given in evidence fails to show that it was not given voluntarily, or fails to impeach his previous testimony in that respect, it is evident that the defendant was not prejudiced by being refused a prior cross-examination. People v. Miller, supra. The claim of appellant that the court unduly limited the cross-examination of the witnesses after the confession was given in evidence is not borne out by the record. His counsel examined the police officers minutely and at length as to the circumstances under which the confession was made. It only remains to carefully consider the contention that the result of such cross-examination was to show that the confession was not free and voluntary.

[5] We are satisfied that the first conversation had by the defendant with the police officers immediately following his arrest was only an untruthful statement, made in attempted explanation of his possession of the automobile sold to Baldwin. It did not amount to a confession at all, and need not be measured by the same rules governing our consideration of the circumstances surrounding the confession of June 20th.

[6, 7] The defendant had then been in jail for seven days. The cross-examination of the witnesses disclosed, in substance, the following facts: When he was brought into the consultation room, Sergeant McQuaid, who did most of the questioning, asked him if he desired to make a statement. One or the other of the officers told him that he did not have to talk unless he wanted to; that they had information about the case and knew he was guilty. He was told who "was with him on the job and how the job was done; that the truth would not hurt him and he better come out with it and tell it." He was further told by McQuaid that "if he told the truth, all right, and if he told anything else that I would write it down just what he told me;" furthermore, that they expected him to tell the truth. The defendant then stated, according to the testimony: "I might as well go ahead and tell you then. I did not want to bring Christiansen into it. I was going to save it until I got in court and tell it myself anyway." His complete confession followed.

It nowhere appears that the defendant was either frightened or unwilling to answer all questions put to him. No promises appear to have been held out to the defendant to induce him to make his statement. No coercion was used and the police officers emphatically denied the presence of any so-called "third degree" practices in securing the confession. All the officers testified that the defendant talked freely and voluntarily and that no threats or offers of reward were made. All the evidence indicates that the confession was freely and voluntarily made. A very searching cross-examination failed to confirm appellant's contention that such was not the case. The fact that the confession of the defendant was made to police officers, who questioned him while he was under arrest, does not necessarily render the confession involuntary. Neither does the fact that the police officers told him they had evidence of his guilt, which, they testified, they actually had, rob the confession of its voluntary character. People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 395, 95 Pac. 863. See, also, People v. Walker, 140 Cal. 153, 156, 73 Pac. 831; People v. Warren, 12 Cal. App. 730, 731, 108 Pac. 725; 16 Corpus Juris, p. 728, § 1494.

The admonition of the officers to the defendant that "the truth would not hurt him, and he better come out and tell it; that they expected him to tell the truth," should not, in our opinion, under all the circumstances of this case so strongly establishing a free and voluntary statement, be construed as an inducement to a confession of guilt. People v. Heivner, 13 Cal. App. 768, 114 Pac. 411; People v. Luis, 158 Cal. 185, 190, 110 Pac. 580; State v. Grover, 96 Me. 363, 52 Atl. 757; 16 Corpus Juris, p. 721, § 1476. There is nothing in the instant case to indicate in the slightest degree that this admonition was in any way coupled with a threat, or was to be, or was, regarded as a promise. It held out no inducement of any kind.

We are fully satisfied, on the whole record, that the confession of the defendant obtained by the San Francisco police officers was freely and voluntarily given. The lower court therefore properly refused to strike it out, on the motion of defendant, following the cross-examination.

Subsequently to his arrest and examination by the San Francisco police, defendant was transferred to the San Mateo county jail. The morning after his arrival there he had a conversation with Deputy Sheriff McGovern, in which he admitted striking the blow which killed Reidinger. When McGovern was called to the stand the district attorney made no effort to show that the confession was free and voluntary before asking for the conversation. Defendant's counsel objected to the questions upon the ground that the requisite free and voluntary character of the statement had not been shown. The court merely directed the witness to proceed. This was error, as we have already pointed out. However, on cross-examination of the witness, defendant's counsel developed the circumstances under which the conversation between the deputy sheriff and the defendant was had. While the proof was not along the usual lines of such questioning, it clearly established the free and voluntary character of the confession, and justified the action of the trial court in refusing to strike out the testimony on defendant's motion. The error just noted was therefore one without prejudice.

[8] During his address to the jury defendant's counsel sought to read from a volume of the California Reports, as a part of his argument, a public utterance made by Mr. Justice Sloss, when a member of the Supreme Court, relating to the "third degree" methods of obtaining confessions, and which statement Mr. Justice Melvin subsequently embodied in the decision in People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 18, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193. He was not permitted by the court to do so. Neither was he permitted, in the same connection, to read an excerpt from an opinion by Chief Justice White of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the same subject. The court's action in this regard was eminently proper. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65; People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 Pac. 502; People v. Forsythe, 65 Cal. 101, 3 Pac. 402.

"If you find from this evidence, members of the jury, which has been presented here before you that this defendant was at the place claimed by the people and at the time claimed and was there with the intent to commit robbery, as I have defined it to you from the Penal Code, and you find that he had an associate by the name of Christiansen, and if you find at this time, with the intention of committing this robbery, as the evidence goes to show, if it does show that—if you find such to be the fact—that a blow was struck either by the defendant or by his associate Christiansen and from the result of that blow that the deceased died, then, members of the jury, I instruct you that it makes no difference as to which one of these parties struck that blow, either the defendant or the person they claim to be named as Christiansen, both being there engaged in this matter, in the committing of this alleged robbery, if you so find from the evidence, one is as guilty as the other. It makes no difference which one struck the blow, if you find there was one struck, if you believe the claim made by the people that there was a common design on the part of these two persons, this defendant and this man Christiansen."

Appellant claims that by the italicized phrase the court told the jury that "the evidence went to show" that the defendant and Christiansen had the intention of committing the crime of robbery. We think, however, that the court's prompt effort to correct the impression, which the objectionable phrase, standing alone, might reasonably carry with it, was fairly accomplished by the statement immediately following, "If it does show that—if you find such to be the fact"—and by the remainder of the instruction. We find nothing objectionable in the concluding sentence of the instruction.

The order and judgment are affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; GOSBEY, Judge pro tem.

BEAL v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 2727.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, April 20, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⇨210—In suit to cancel securities persons to whom issued and persons claiming interest are proper parties.

In a suit to cancel for fraudulent issue securities issued by a corporation to its promoters, the promoters and all other persons holding or claiming any interest in such securities are proper parties.

2. Corporations ⇨30(2)—Unreasonable profits obtained by promoters recoverable, though they were the only stockholders.

Where the promoters of a corporation, organized with a view to bringing in other stockholders and placing its stocks and securities on the market for sale to the public, obtain unreasonable profits from the organization of the corporation, made possible only by concealment from those who have placed their trust in the promoters, such profits are deemed secret profits recoverable by the corporation or a stockholder on its behalf, though the promoters at the time were the only stockholders.

3. Corporations ⇨30(2) — Promoters occupy fiduciary relation to corporation and stockholders.

A promoter of a corporation occupies a fiduciary relation to the corporation and its stockholders, and cannot profit to the detriment of the stockholders without a full and fair disclosure.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨37(4), 100(7) — Suit to cancel fraudulent securities must be brought within three years from discovery.

An action to cancel securities fraudulently issued by a corporation to its promoters is an action of fraud, and must be brought within three years from the time it was committed or knowledge thereof obtained by the corporation.

5. Limitation of actions ⇨100(7) — When knowledge of fraud imputed to corporation and stockholders.

Where all the directors and stockholders of a corporation either participated in or have direct knowledge of the withdrawal by promoters of secret profits made at the time of the organization of the company, knowledge of the fraud is imputed to the company and to the stockholders as of the time of its commission.

6. Limitation of actions $\S$ 100(7)—Corporation dominated by those participating in fraud deemed under incapacity.

Where a corporation and its board of directors are wholly under the domination of those committing a fraud against it, it is deemed to be without legal capacity to know or act in relation to the fraud, and during such period of incapacity limitations do not run, at least against an innocent stockholder without knowledge of the fraud.

7. Limitation of actions $\S$ 100(7)—Stockholder may sue for secret profit within three years after discovering fraud.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 338, subd. 4, limiting actions for fraud to three years from the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, if any stockholder, becoming such before the statute has made a complete bar as to the corporation, is without knowledge of the facts respecting a fraud committed by the promoters, he may sue within three years from his discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, or facts putting a prudent man on inquiry.

8. Pleading $\S$ 8(21), 21—Allegations of discovery of fraud within three years insufficient, if entire complaint shows otherwise.

In a suit for fraud, it was not sufficient for plaintiff merely to allege that he did not discover the fraud before a certain time, and when from the whole complaint it appeared that discovery was actually made more than three years before the action was commenced, or that plaintiff was put on inquiry, equitable relief might be denied, notwithstanding his allegations that he first discovered the fraud within the statutory period.

9. Limitation of actions $\S$ 100(12)—Issuance of securities in exchange for stock held to put stockholders on inquiry.

The issuance by a corporation to its promoters of securities aggregating over $99,000,000 in exchange for stocks of unknown companies was sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, so as to start the running of limitations.

10. Compromise and settlement $\S$ 18(3) — Cannot be repudiated in part or without restoring benefits received.

Where an agreement between the U. company and others, whereby one of its promoters received back stocks in other companies delivered by him in exchange for the U. company's securities, received a release of his obligation to deliver other stocks, and returned part of the stocks and securities received from the U. company to a company whose stock it owned, constituted a compromise, the U. company could not both affirm and repudiate the agreement or repudiate the agreement without restoring the benefits received.

11. Pleading $\S$ 225(1) — Refusal to permit amendment not error.

There was no error in refusing leave to amend the complaint on the sustaining of de-murrers nearly a year and a half after suit was commenced, as plaintiff had had ample opportunity to amend.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by C. N. Beal against F. M. Smith and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fabius M. Clarke and Tirey L. Ford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, McKee & Tasheira, of Oakland, R. P. Henshall, Luther Elkins, and Lilienthal, McKinstrey & Raymond, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. On February 24, 1916, plaintiff, as a stockholder in the United Properties Company, commenced this action on behalf of the company and its stockholders to recover from certain defendants property alleged to belong to the corporation, to set aside alleged fraudulent conveyances of said properties, for the cancellation of securities alleged to have been fraudulently issued, for damages, and other incidental relief. The company was joined as a party defendant because it refused to institute the action after demand. The defendants demurred separately to the complaint upon both general and special grounds. The several demurrers were sustained without leave to amend, and thereupon judgment was entered in favor of the defendants.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that on the 25th day of October, 1910, the defendants Smith and Tevis, who owned or controlled more than three-fourths of the issued capital stock of the San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway, Oakland Traction Company, Bay Cities Water Company, and other corporations designated in the complaint as "going companies," entered into an agreement for the incorporation of the United Properties Company upon a capitalization of $200,000,000 to take over and control their interests in the said "going companies." In December, 1910, the United Properties Company was incorporated by the defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford; the latter, it is alleged, having been brought in as a partner of Tevis. The organization of the company was controlled by these three, who continued to designate and control the directors and officers during the time when the acts complained of were done. Immediately after the organization of the company Tevis and Hanford turned over to it all the stocks of the companies owned or controlled by them which were agreed to be delivered under the agreement of October 25, 1910, and received therefor securities issued by the United Properties Company on the basis of exchange provided in said agreement. Smith also received his full allotment of securities of the United Properties Company on the same basis of exchange, but failed to deliver a considerable portion of the securities theretofore held by him and included in the promotion agreement and which it was said were covered by pledges as security for money borrowed by him.

In addition to the securities in these "going companies" which were turned over by the individual defendants, the agreement of October, 1910, called for the transfer of securities of the United Properties Company to Smith and Tevis in exchange for the stocks of four other corporations, which are designated in the complaint and referred to throughout the briefs as the "fraudulent companies"; the reason for this being that they had not been incorporated at the time of the agreement and that, though subsequently incorporated, they never owned any property or had any assets of any nature. However, for the purpose of carrying out the agreement of October, 1910, four companies were organized under the names of Consolidated California Land Company, Sacramento Short Line, San Jose Short Line, and Santa Clara Land & Water Company. The San Jose Short Line was incorporated for $8,000,000; the other three for $10,000,000 each. The entire capital stock of all four corporations was issued to defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford. Then another corporation, designated the Pacific Terminal Company, was incorporated for $5,000,000. Its entire capital stock was likewise issued to defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford. Then these defendants turned the entire capital stock of these five companies, amounting to $43,000,000 on paper, into the treasury of the United Properties Company and received in payment therefor stocks of that company amounting to over $61,000,000 and convertible debentures amounting to over $31,000,000, by reason of which it is alleged the three defendants named fraudulently received secret profits from the United Properties Company while acting in the capacity of promoters thereof, and that these secret profits and fraudulent acts, as well as the fact that none of the five fraudulent companies had any assets, were concealed from all subsequent stockholders thereof until the same was discovered by plaintiff some time in the year 1913.

It is then alleged that immediately following the organization of the United Properties Company the three defendants named had issued to themselves $6,000,000 of bond certificates of that company in consideration for an option which it was pretended the defendant Tevis held for the purchase of certain other stocks or property of the "going companies," while as a matter of fact no such option existed. It is therefore alleged that this issue of $6,000,000 of certificates was a fraud upon the company, being wholly without consideration to the company, and, like the exchange for the stocks in the "fraudulent companies," constituted secret profits abstracted by the promoters and concealed from the subsequent stockholders. The stocks and securities comprising this total of secret profits, amounting to over $99,000,000, plaintiff prays to be delivered up to the United Properties Company and canceled.

Upon the theory that the defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford had entered into a general conspiracy to defraud the United Properties Company and its stockholders, it is alleged that the three named defendants, while still having full control over the affairs of the company, permitted the defendant Smith to delay the delivery of a portion of the certificates of stocks in the "going companies" which he had agreed to transfer to the United Properties Company, and for which he had been paid by that company. In May, 1913, defendant Smith, it is alleged, transferred all his interest in said pledged stocks to the Mercantile Trust Company, as trustee for the benefit of himself, his family, and his creditors. And it is alleged that the Mercantile Trust Company received said stocks, not as an innocent bona fide purchaser, but as a voluntary grantee with notice. Then, it is alleged, these stocks, though pledged, were exchanged by Smith for shares of the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, a new corporation organized for the consolidation of three of the "going companies."

The Oakland Railways was incorporated by the defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford for the purpose of holding and owning corporation stocks and securities acquired by the United Properties Company, which, in turn, owned all the stock in the Oakland Railways. On May 5, 1913, defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford conveyed all their stock in the United Properties Company to five trustees, who were empowered to control the board of directors of said company and all its constituent corporations. The three defendants named, having full control of the United Properties Company, caused it to join in this conveyance and consent to its terms. Thereafter and on January 16, 1914, these trustees, acting for the United Properties Company and the respective boards of directors of the constituent companies named by said trustees, together with the Realty Syndicate, the Mercantile Trust Company, and the trustees of the five fraudulent companies heretofore mentioned—which had, however, been dissolved in the meantime—executed an agreement, the principal features of which are as follows:

Defendant Smith took back all of the stocks theretofore delivered by him to the United Properties Company and received a release of his obligation to deliver the remainder of the stocks of the "going companies" which were held in pledge at the time of the agreement of October, 1910. He delivered to the Oakland Railways all the stocks and securities issued to him by the United Properties Company except the bonding certificates received by him for the fraudulent option. In addition to taking back all the stocks which he had delivered to the United Properties Company, he took other securities owned by this company of the par value of something over $4,000,000. As a part of the same agreement he conveyed to the Hanford Investment Company for the benefit of Tevis and Hanford, his portion of the $6,000,000 bond certificates which he had received for the fraudulent option. By this transaction the stocks and securities of the United Properties Company which Smith had received under the contract of October, 1910, were left outstanding in the hands of the Oakland Railways, and the United Properties Company received no consideration for the transfer of its assets. It is then alleged that through these transactions the defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford took from the United Properties Company all its assets except the securities of the Bay Cities Water Company, the United Light & Power Company, and the Sierra Water Supply Company, and that they left the interest of the United Properties Company in these three concerns incumbered to the extent of over $11,000,000, in addition to the $6,000,000 bond certificates which were issued to the three defendants on account of the said fraudulent option, making a total of over $17,000,000, which rendered the United Properties Company insolvent and destroyed all value of the shares of the stock and outstanding securities.

Through the agreement of January 16, 1914, it is alleged, a portion of the assets of the United Properties Company then held by the Oakland Railways, consisting of stocks in the "going companies" which Smith had delivered under the agreement of October, 1910, was conveyed to the Realty Syndicate, which in turn delivered to the Oakland Railways other securities of the United Properties Company which had originally been issued to defendant Smith. It is then alleged that in February, 1914, the Realty Syndicate conveyed all the property so acquired by it to the Realty Syndicate Company, which shortly thereafter received a deed from the Realty Syndicate for all property of the United Properties Company received by the Realty Syndicate through that agreement.

The Anglo-California Trust Company is joined as a party defendant upon the allegation that it makes some claim against some or all the properties which are involved in the suit.

The prayer of the complaint is that the defendants be required to deliver to the United Properties Company the stock which Smith agreed and failed to deliver; for the return to the United Properties Company of the property conveyed away from it on January 16, 1914; that the Mercantile Trust Company, in addition thereto, be required to surrender to the United Properties Company the stock held by it in trust; for the surrender and cancellation of the $99,500,928.50 of fraudulently issued stocks, bond certificates, and convertible debentures; and for damages against certain of the defendants in the sum of $5,000,000.

[1-3] The complaint contains a statement of facts relating to the secret profits taken by the defendants Smith, Tevis, and Hanford at the time of the organization of the company which, if properly pleaded, would constitute a good cause of action for the cancellation of the securities so alleged to have been fraudulently issued. In such an action these defendants and all other persons who hold or claim any interest in the securities so issued would be proper parties. It is argued on behalf of respondents that, inasmuch as Smith, Tevis, and Hanford were the only stockholders of the United Properties Company at the time the issue of these securities was made, they cannot be treated as secret profits. In other words, the argument is that, inasmuch as those who participated in the transactions complained of alone constituted the corporation at the time, the corporation itself must be deemed to have assented to the transactions, and that a subsequent purchaser of stock cannot sue on behalf of the corporation to recover from the incorporators the profits so made. In support of the argument Turner v. Markham, 155 Cal. 562, 102 Pac. 272, Sargent v. Palace Café Co., 175 Cal. 737, 167 Pac. 146, Old Dominion, etc., Co. v. Lewisohn, 210 U. S. 206, 28 Sup. Ct. 634, 52 L. Ed. 1025, are cited as authority. It would serve no purpose to analyze the cases cited. It is sufficient to say that they are not applicable to a case such as this, where the parties participating in the fraud are promoters of a corporation organized for the purpose of bringing in other stockholders and of placing its stocks and securities upon the market for sale to the public. A promoter occupies a fiduciary relation to the corporation and to its stockholders, and persons acting in that capacity cannot profit to the detriment of their stockholders without a full and fair disclosure. Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 194, 135 Pac. 496. Thus, when persons associate themselves together for the purpose of promoting the organization of a corporation whose stock and securities are to be placed upon the market for sale to the public, any unreasonable profits which such persons derive from the organization of the corporation, made possible only by concealment from those who have placed their trust in the promoters, are deemed secret profits, which the corporation or a stockholder on its behalf may sue to recover. Bigelow v. Old Dominion, etc., Co.,

74 N. J. Eq. 457, 496, 71 Atl. 153; Old Dominion, etc., Co. v. Bigelow, 203 Mass. 159, 89 N. E. 204, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 314; Pietsch v. Milbrath, 123 Wis. 647, 101 N. W. 388, 102 N. W. 342, 68 L. R. A. 945, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1017; Arnold v. Searing, 78 N. J. Eq. 146, 78 Atl. 762. There can be no doubt that the rule pronounced in the Old Dominion Case by the United States Supreme Court is not followed in this state, where the profits have been procured by promoters of a corporation organized for the purpose of bringing in future stockholders and offering its stock and securities for sale to the public, and the new stockholders have become such through faith in the promoters. The rule, as to profits procured under such circumstances is clearly stated in California-Calaveras Mining Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 298, 149 Pac. 595, 600, where the Supreme Court say:

"When in the promotion of a corporation to take over property for the benefit of the corporation it is contemplated by those organizing it that shares of its stock shall be offered for sale in order that others may become future stockholders in the corporation, such promoters in dealing with the corporation occupy a fiduciary relation to it for the benefit of such future stockholders, and the interests of such future stockholders are entitled to protection from concealed benefits or profits acquired by the promoters in their transactions with the corporation and to a full disclosure of the true facts of the purchase price of the property turned over to the corporation, and any advantage or benefits accruing to the promoters by failure to do so or concealment constitutes a fraud on the corporation."

Plaintiff became a stockholder in the United Properties Company through the transfer to him of stock of that company from its treasury without notice of the fraud. He is therefore a proper party plaintiff in this kind of an action.

[4-7] But his action is plainly one of fraud, and relief from fraud of this nature must be sought within three years from the time it was committed or knowledge thereof had by the corporation, which is, in fact, the real party in interest. Where all the directors and stockholders of the corporation either participated in or had direct knowledge of the withdrawal of the secret profits made at the time of the organization of the company, knowledge of the fraud is imputed to the company and to the stockholders as of the time of its commission. But where, as alleged here, the corporation and its board of directors were wholly under the domination of those who committed the original fraud, the corporation is deemed to be in the same position as an incompetent person or a minor without legal capacity either to know or to act in relation to the fraud so committed, and during such period of incapacity the statute of limitations does not run, at least against an innocent stockholder who was without knowledge of the fraud. Whitten v. Dabney, 171 Cal. 621, 154 Pac. 312. Such a stockholder suing on behalf of the corporation is in the position of a guardian ad litem. The time for beginning the action is governed by the provisions of section 338, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, which limits it to three years from the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. Where the corporation and all the stockholders have knowledge of the fraud, or of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, the action is barred if not commenced within three years from the discovery of such facts. When any one stockholder, at least if he became a stockholder before the statute had made a complete bar as to the entire corporation, is without knowledge of such facts, he may commence such an action within three years from his discovery. The word "discovery" is here used as embracing, not only knowledge of the facts constituting the fraud, but knowledge of such facts as would put a prudent man on inquiry.

[8] Without detailing the various events upon which plaintiff bases his discovery of the frauds, it is sufficient to say that plaintiff became a stockholder in the United Properties Company in April, 1911, through the exchange of stocks of certain of the subsidiary companies which, it is alleged, were controlled by Hanford and turned into the merger in February, 1911, as a part of the general conspiracy to defraud. From that time until March 4, 1913, he dealt with these "conspirators" without protest, though in October, 1912, he had become suspicious and started a personal investigation of the books and business transactions of the company. On March 4, 1913, he filed an elaborate protest with the company, complaining of Smith's failure to meet the terms of the premerger agreement and demanding that the company commence proceedings to enforce that agreement. Therein he displayed a very intimate knowledge of the transactions which he now alleges were fraudulent. Nevertheless, he was content to participate in these frauds so long as they seemed beneficial to him. This action was commenced February 24, 1916. Thus, if the discovery had been made eight days before the protest of March 4, 1913, had been filed, the action would have been barred. It is not sufficient for a party merely to allege that he did not make the discovery before a certain time. The facts upon which the fraud is based must be alleged, and when from the whole complaint it appears that discovery was actually made more than three years before the action was commenced, or that plaintiff had knowledge of sufficient facts to put a prudent man on inquiry, the trial court may properly deny equitable relief, notwithstanding plaintiff's allegations that he did not discover the fraud until within the statutory period. Lady Washington Cons. Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 486, 45 Pac. 809; Del Campo v.

Camarillo, 154 Cal. 647, 657, 98 Pac. 1049.

[9] Now, outside the general conspiracy to defraud, the main overt act of fraud is alleged to be the taking of over $99,000,000 in secret profits in the latter part of 1910. The fraud of this transaction consists mainly in the fact that these securities were issued in exchange for dummy and worthless stocks. But any prudent man willing to expose the fraud could have made the discovery with little difficulty, and the very fact that such a large issue of securities was made in exchange for stock of unknown companies was sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry. For these reasons the complaint fails to show the diligence essential to entitle plaintiff to relief in a court of equity.

[10] Plaintiff also seeks relief from the alleged dissipation of the assets of the company resulting from the agreement of January 16, 1914. Generally, the allegations on this issue are that Smith took from the treasury of the United Properties Company all the stocks which he had theretofore delivered to it or their equivalent in the consolidated company, the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, and received a release of his obligation to deliver the remainder of the stocks agreed by him to be delivered under the promotion contract of October, 1910. In return it is alleged he conveyed to the Oakland Railways, a holding company merely, a portion of the stocks and securities which he had previously received from the United Properties Company, the greater part of which were fraudulently issued to him in payment for the stocks of the five fraudulent companies. As a part of the same transaction it is alleged Smith conveyed to the Hanford Investment Company, for the benefit of Tevis and Hanford, $3,600,000 of bond certificates of the United Properties Company. The theory of this portion of the complaint is that the United Properties Company was thus prevailed upon to dispose of a large portion of its valuable assets, for which it received no compensation other than the transfer of stocks and securities of the United Properties Company to the Oakland Railways, all the stock of which was held by the former company. But the exhibits clearly indicate that the agreement of January 16, 1914, was a compromise between the United Properties Company, an insolvent concern, with some of its creditors. The company joined in the agreement and apparently accepted the benefits. No protest was made by any other creditor, and plaintiff does not sue in that capacity. The company, of course, cannot both affirm and repudiate that agreement. If it affirms it, plaintiff has no cause of action. If it repudiates it, it must restore the benefits. But this has not been and, apparently, cannot be done.

[11] Other points do not require consideration. The complaint appearing in the transcript is designated the amended and substituted complaint. The demurrers were sustained in August, 1917, nearly a year and a half after the suit was commenced. Hence plaintiff had had ample opportunity to amend if so advised. There was no error in refusing leave to amend under the circumstances.

The judgment is affirmed.

BEAL v. UNITED PROPERTIES CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2728.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 20, 1920.)

1. Corporations §482(1) — Equitable lien arising from failure to give mortgage bonds cannot be foreclosed in absence of default or insolvency.

Assuming that a corporation's oral agreement to issue first mortgage bonds, secured by a deed of trust on all of its property, in exchange for the bonds of another company, created an equitable lien on its property, the lien could not be foreclosed, where it was not shown that there had been any default in the payment of interest, or that the company was insolvent or unable to pay interest.

2. Specific performance §10(1)—Cannot be granted in part as to agreement to execute mortgage and issue bonds.

Where a corporation agreed to issue to plaintiff first mortgage bonds, secured by a deed of trust covering all of its property, and as further security to deposit the personal property with a trustee, the court could not decree enforcement of that portion only of the contract favorable to plaintiff, and unless the contract as a whole, or at least its pertinent features, could be enforced, plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance.

3. Specific performance §114(2)—Agreement to execute mortgage and issue bonds unenforceable for uncertainty.

Under Civ. Code, § 3390, subd. 6, prohibiting the specific performance of uncertain agreements, an agreement by a corporation to issue first mortgage bonds, secured by a deed of trust on all of its property, and deposit all securities of other corporations with the trustee, could not be enforced, where the complaint did not allege who the trustee was to be, or what duties he was to perform, or how the pledged property was to be sold in event of default, or what remedy the bondholders were to have in event of default of interest.

4. Specific performance §114(2)—Complaint seeking enforcement of agreement respecting property must describe it.

A complaint seeking specific performance of a contract for the conveying, mortgaging, or leasing of property should specifically define the property agreed to be covered, or state sufficient facts to establish a basis upon which such description may be made certain by extraneous evidence.

5. Specific performance ⇨114(1)—Complaint held too uncertain as to property to be subject to proposed deed of trust.

A complaint seeking specific performance of an agreement to issue corporate bonds, secured by a deed of trust covering all of the corporation's real and personal property, was insufficient, where it did not show that the corporation owned any real property, and, though showing ownership of certain corporate securities, showed that they had been converted into shares of stock without showing that the stock became the property of the company making the agreement, and where it further appeared that all of such securities would mature long prior to the maturity of the deed of trust.

6. Specific performance ⇨126(2)—Agreement to give bonds not enforceable by requiring issuance of securities payable forthwith.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract by a corporation to issue bonds payable in 50 years, secured by a deed of trust, the court cannot require the issuance of evidences of indebtedness payable forthwith and enforceable through foreclosure of a lien.

7. Torts ⇨12—Fraudulently inducing corporation to break contract supports action.

Acts of individuals interested in a corporation in inducing and enabling it by fraud to fail to perform an agreement to issue bonds to plaintiff, secured by a deed of trust, would, if properly pleaded, support a cause of action at law for fraud.

8. Action ⇨46—Action for fraud cannot be joined with action for specific performance or to foreclose lien.

An action at law for fraud in inducing and enabling a corporation to fail to perform an agreement could not be joined in a suit in equity for specific performance of the contract, or to foreclose an equitable lien.

9. Action ⇨50(9)—Representative action for corporation and action in plaintiff's own behalf cannot be joined.

Where a corporation agreed to issue bonds to plaintiff, secured by a deed of trust, an action by plaintiff in behalf of the corporation to compel the return to it of assets improperly distributed or dissipated, and which should be included in the deed of trust, cannot be joined with an action by plaintiff in his own behalf, wherein he is seeking personal relief.

10. Corporations ⇨477(1)—Agreement to issue secured bonds may be sued on as agreement to pay money and enforced by lien.

Where a corporation failed to perform its agreement to issue bonds to plaintiff, secured by a deed of trust on all of its property, plaintiff could have treated the agreement as a direct obligation to pay money, sued on it as such, and had a lien to aid in enforcing the judgment.

11. Limitation of actions ⇨167(1)—Lien under agreement to give secured bonds barred in two years.

Under Civ. Code, § 2911, providing that a lien is extinguished by the lapse of time barring an action on the principal obligation, plaintiff's right to an equitable lien growing out of an oral contract to issue corporate bonds, secured by a deed of trust, is barred in the two years during which an action on the oral contract must have been brought.

12. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2) — Complaint held insufficient to show reliance on representations and prevent running of statute.

In a suit commenced in February, 1916, on an oral agreement made in March, 1911, to issue corporate bonds, secured by a deed of trust, in exchange for bonds of another corporation, complaint held insufficient to show that plaintiff after June, 1913, relied on assurances that such bonds would be delivered, so as to prevent the running of limitations.

13. Limitation of actions ⇨172 — Party on whose property lien is asserted may plead statute.

In a suit to enforce an oral agreement by a corporation to issue bonds, secured by a deed of trust on all of its property, by establishing a lien on property, which should have been included in the deed of trust, the present owners of such property could plead the statute of limitations applicable to oral agreements, though the corporation failed to plead it.

14. Limitation of actions ⇨182(2) — Court held authorized to raise bar on its own motion.

In a suit to enforce a corporation's agreement to issue bonds, secured by a deed of trust on all of its property, by establishing a lien on property in the hands of other persons, the circumstances held to authorize a court of equity, on its own motion, to raise the bar resulting from plaintiff's acquiescence in the actions of the parties and long delay in instituting the proceedings until the time to sue had expired.

15. Pleading ⇨225(2)—Court held not to have abused discretion in denying leave to amend on sustaining demurrers.

Where the original complaint had been amended several times, the last amended complaint being filed more than a year after the filing of the original complaint, and the only cause of action stated was barred by limitations and laches, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying leave to amend on sustaining demurrers.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by C. N. Beal against the United Properties Company of California and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fabius M. Clarke and Tiley L. Ford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, McKee & Tasheira, of Oakland, R. P. Henshall, Luther Elkins, and Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This action, like that of Beal v. Smith et al., No. 2727, 189 Pac. 341, this day determined by this court, involves the transactions growing out of the organization of the United Properties Company in December, 1910. The demurrers of the several defendants to the amended complaint were all sustained without leave to amend, and judgment entered in their favor. The appeal is taken from this judgment, and the parties have stipulated that the briefs filed in both actions may be considered on each appeal.

The amended complaint alleges that on the 6th day of March, 1911, plaintiff was the owner of first mortgage bonds of the Sierra Water Supply Company and of a claim against such company of the total value of $150,000; that on said day the United Properties Company agreed to deliver to him therefor $150,000 in its first mortgage and collateral trust 5 per cent. 50-year sinking fund gold bonds, to be secured by a deed of trust to be thereafter executed covering all the real and personal property of the United Properties Company; that between the 6th and 20th days of March, 1911, in compliance with said agreement, plaintiff assigned and delivered to the United Properties Company his bonds and the claim against the Sierra Water Supply Company; that in April, 1911, the United Properties Company issued to him bond certificates, the material features of which are that the company on the surrender of the certificates promised to issue to the bearer first mortgage and collateral trust 5 per cent. 50-year sinking fund gold bonds, "to be issued under and secured by the deed of trust in preparation, dated January 1, 1911, made by said the United Properties Company of California, and to be delivered hereunder as and when the said bonds may be certified, issued, and ready for delivery." Such certificates called for the issue to plaintiff of 150 of said bonds of the par value of $150,000. It is alleged that neither the bonds nor the deed of trust were ever executed, and that from time to time covering a period at one time alleged to have ended on the 25th day of January, 1913, and at another time alleged to have ended in the month of March, 1914, the United Properties Company represented to plaintiff that said bonds and said deed of trust were in course of preparation and that they would soon be executed and the bonds delivered to him on the surrender of his bond certificates. In pursuance of a scheme and design to defraud the plaintiff and to cause him to rely upon said promises, so it is alleged, the United Properties Company paid to him on the 1st days of July, 1911, January, 1912, and July, 1912, the amounts of money that he would have been entitled to receive on said days as interest on the bonds if the same had been executed and delivered to him. Also that plaintiff fully believed and relied upon these promises until May, 1914, although in another portion of the complaint it is alleged that long prior to that time plaintiff, having made a personal investigation of the affairs of the company, had discovered a gigantic conspiracy on the part of the promoters of the concern to defraud the company and the holders of its stocks and securities, other than the said promoters. It is then alleged that plaintiff had not received any of said bonds and had not received or been paid any part of the said $150,000, and that the same is still due, owing, and unpaid. The remainder of the complaint is a long story of a conspiracy on the part of the promoters of the corporation, Smith, Tevis, and Hanford, alleging that the organization of the company was conceived in fraud and that all the transactions of the promoters and those acting under them were a fraud upon the corporation and the other holders of its stock and securities. These allegations are all made upon information and belief, with some feeble attempt to state the sources of the information and the grounds of the belief.

Treating the appeal in the same manner as would be done by a trial court in the consideration of the demurrers, as the grounds for the order sustaining them are not stated, it is first necessary to determine what are the equities of plaintiff's case.

It is strenuously argued in the briefs of the respondents that the complaint attempts to state several cases of action which it is claimed are improperly joined. Thus it is argued that the allegations of the complaint tend to support three separate causes of action personal to plaintiff and one on behalf of the United Properties Company, as follows: (1) A cause of action to declare and foreclose an equitable lien upon property formerly owned by the United Properties Company; (2) a cause of action for the specific performance of an oral contract; (3) a cause of action for damages for fraud growing out of the failure to perform the same contract; and (4) a cause of action to recover on behalf of the corporation assets of the corporation which are alleged to have been illegally disposed of. It is stated in the complaint that the suit was instituted in behalf of all other lien claimants similarly situated with plaintiff who chose to join with plaintiff, but as the record does not disclose that any others joined, this matter may be dismissed from consideration. It becomes necessary first to determine whether the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to support any cause of action.

[1] 1. Taking the first-mentioned cause of action—that to declare and foreclose an equitable lien—in so far as the foreclosure is concerned, the complaint is lacking in one of the essential features of such an action, which is an allegation of default. This complaint alleges an oral agreement to deliver to the plaintiff 150 first mortgage bonds of the par value of $1,000 each, dated January 1, 1911, to be "due and payable 50 years after the date thereof." The bond certificates issued to plaintiff in April, 1911, and which he argues are written evidences of its oral agreement, also provide for the issuance of 50-year bonds, secured by a deed of trust which was to be dated January 1, 1911. Though it is alleged that three semiannual payments of interest were received by the plaintiff, it is not alleged that this was all the interest that he received, or, in fact, that all interest payments were not made to him semiannually as called for by the original agreement. Furthermore, it is not alleged that the corporation had defaulted in any of the interest payments, or that the company was insolvent or unable to pay the interest. Thus, if plaintiff is entitled to an equitable lien in accordance with his agreement of March, 1911, he cannot foreclose on such lien unless there has been a default. There are no allegations in the complaint from which it could be inferred that such default has occurred.

[2, 3] In seeking to subject the personal property to a lien plaintiff is, in effect, asking for the specific performance of his contract of 1911. This contract, it is alleged, called for the delivery to plaintiff of 150 of its $1,000 first mortgages 50-year bonds, secured by a deed of trust "in due and legal form" covering all the real and personal property then owned or thereafter acquired by the United Properties Company, the personal property to be deposited with some trustee. Thus the complaint attempts to set up an indivisible contract—one calling for the issuance of bonds and the execution of a deed of trust with the delivery of the trust property into the hands of trustees. The court cannot decree that that portion only of such contract which is favorable to plaintiff may be enforced. Unless the contract as a whole, or at least its pertinent features, can be enforced, plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance. Section 3390, subd. 6, of the Civil Code, prohibits the specific enforcement of "an agreement, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable." All that is alleged as to the contents of the proposed deed of trust is "that said bonds should be secured by a deed of trust in due and legal form, which deed of trust should constitute a first mortgage and lien upon all real and personal property then owned or which might thereafter be acquired by said United Properties Company," and that all stocks, bonds, and securities of other corporations which said United Properties Company then owned or might thereafter acquire, in addition to being covered by said deed of trust, should be deposited with the trustee to be appointed in said deed of trust. But it is not alleged who this trustee should be or what duties it was to perform, how the pledged property should be sold in event of default, or what remedy the bondholders should have in event of default of interest. This brief statement of the contents of the proposed deed of trust would not justify any court in decreeing the execution of the deed. The objection here is, not that the complaint is uncertain in respect to these allegations, but that it fails to state sufficient facts because it fails to set forth the terms of the contract which is sought to be enforced. "A contract that is incomplete, uncertain, or indefinite in its material terms will not be specifically enforced in equity." Pomeroy's Equitable Remedies (4th Ed.) § 764; Los Angeles, etc., Co-Operative Ass'n v. Phillips, 56 Cal. 539, 546, 547; Klein v. Markarian, 175 Cal. 37, 165 Pac. 3; Wineburgh v. Gay, 27 Cal. App. 603, 150 Pac. 1003. "The requirement of certainty as to contracts, in order that they may be specifically enforced, extends, not only to the subject-matter and purpose of the contract, but to the parties, consideration, and even the place and time of performance, where these are essential." 25 R. C. L. p. 219.

[4, 5] Under this rule it is essential that a complaint seeking specific performance of a contract for the conveying, mortgaging, or leasing of property shall specifically define the property agreed to be covered, or at least that it shall state sufficient facts to establish the basis upon which such description may be made certain by extraneous evidence. Here, although it is claimed that the bonds were to be secured by a deed of trust covering both real and personal property, there is no allegation that the United Properties Company ever owned any real property. The complaint does allege on information and belief that at the time of the agreement the United Properties Company owned 75 per cent. of the total issued shares of the capital stock of the Oakland Traction Company and the San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway, respectively, and the total issued capital stock of the East Shore & Suburban Railway Company, and that thereafter and before August 12, 1912, it became the owner of the following securities and promissory notes: (a) General consolidated mortgage 5 per cent. sinking fund 28-year gold bonds of the Oakland Traction Company; (b) general consolidated mortgage 5 per cent. sinking fund 30-year gold bonds of the San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway; (c) promissory note for $2,500,000, due June 12, 1913; and (d) promissory note for $128,814, the date of maturity not given. It is then alleged:

"That afterward, by the consolidation of said Oakland Traction Company and said San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway and said East Shore & Suburban Railway Company into a corporation hereinafter described, named the San Francisco, Oakland Terminal Railways, the aforesaid capital stocks of said Oakland Traction Company and of said San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway and East Shore & Suburban Railway Company, were exchanged for and converted into shares of stock of said consolidated company."

It does not appear what became of the corporations which were thus consolidated or the stocks of said corporations upon which plaintiff claims he was entitled to a lien, nor does it appear that the stocks of the consolidated company, the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, became the property of the United Properties Company. As to the securities which it is alleged were acquired by the United Properties Company prior to August 12, 1912, those of the Oakland Traction Company matured in 1935, those of the San Francisco-Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway matured in 1938, and the promissory note for $2,500,000 matured June 12, 1913. Notwithstanding this, plaintiff claims that all these securities were to be pledged as security for bonds of the United Properties Company, payable January 1, 1961. It is manifest that if the oral agreement contemplated the execution of a deed of trust covering these securities, some provision would have to be made therein covering the loss sustained by the maturity of these securities.

[6] If plaintiff is to have judgment for specific performance of the oral contract, it is necessary that the entire contract of the parties be enforced. Thus the court must decree that the defendant United Properties Company should not only issue to plaintiff its 150 first mortgage bonds, secured by deed of trust covering the real and personal property, but that it should also execute the deed of trust to secure the bonds so issued. This, apparently, is the view taken by appellant, as he states that "plaintiff sues in a representative capacity, that is, for himself and all other bondholders, to establish an equitable lien upon certain property to secure the payment of all the lawful bonds." But, as has been pointed out, the allegations of the complaint covering the terms of the proposed deed of trust are so indefinite and uncertain that a court of equity could not possibly enforce its execution. As all the allegations of the complaint tend to support a contract calling for the issuance to plaintiff of 50-year bonds secured by a deed of trust, naturally the court cannot make a new and separate contract with the parties whereby the plaintiff may receive evidences of indebtedness which would be payable forthwith and enforceable through the foreclosure of a lien upon the personal property in direct opposition to the rights of the parties as they would have been fixed under the terms of the proposed deed of trust. For these reasons the complaint fails to state a cause of action for the declaration of a lien upon the personal property described in the complaint.

2. What has heretofore been said covers the allegations which tend to support the cause of action for the specific performance of the oral contract of March, 1911. It is unnecessary to consider the effect of the writing contained in the bond certificates issued to plaintiff in April, 1911, because plaintiff does not sue upon the certificates, but bases his right of action upon the oral agreement. It should be said, however, that the language of the writing supports the argument that the conversations alleged to have taken place in March, 1911, did not constitute a contract to subject any particular property to a lien or to execute any particular form of a deed of trust, and that such conversations were merely the basis of a contract to be thereafter made and not a contract in themselves. In this writing it was agreed that the bonds which were to be issued to plaintiff would be secured by "the deed of trust in preparation." It seems almost incredible that any man secured as plaintiff is alleged to have been, would part with his property merely upon the promise of some one connected with the corporation that its equivalent would be delivered to him in exchange, and then, when written evidence of the oral promise is made, would fail to insist that such written evidence should contain the most essential feature of the oral agreement—that is, that the written evidences should recite that the bonds to be delivered to him by the corporation would constitute an enforceable lien upon all the property of the corporation. But appellant says: "We are not seeking a specific performance of this agreement, but an equitable lien, and the enforcement thereof."

[7, 8] 3. Plaintiff alleges that by reason of the various acts of which he complains he has been damaged in the sum of $300,000, and prays judgment for that amount. The theory upon which such damages are sought is that certain defendants by fraud induced and enabled the United Properties Company to fail to perform its agreement to deliver to plaintiff his bonds. The allegations in this connection would, if properly pleaded, support a cause of action at law for fraud. No attempt was made to rescind or disaffirm the contract by which plaintiff parted with his property; but, on the other hand, the contract is fully affirmed, and plaintiff seeks damages for its nonperformance. Assuming that sufficient facts are alleged to sustain such a cause of action, it is evident that an action at law for fraud, growing out of the breach or nonperformance of a contract cannot be joined in a suit in equity for specific performance of the contract or to foreclose an equitable lien. This is especially true where plaintiff has first availed himself of his equitable remedy. Abbott v. 76 Land & Water Co., 161 Cal. 42, 51, 118 Pac. 425; Thresher v. Clark, 188 Pac. 55. The same rule should apply here. If plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of his contract or to the declaration and foreclosure of an equitable lien, the decree in equity made for that purpose must necessarily adjudicate the rights of the respective parties and would foreclose the plaintiff from an action for damages upon the contract, which is purely an action at law. He has elected to seek the aid of a court of equity and cannot join in such suit an action for damages for fraud.

[9] 4. The other phase of the complaint is that plaintiff seeks indirectly the return to the corporation of assets which he alleges were improperly distributed or dissipated by those in control of the corporate affairs. Though he does not allege directly that he is suing on behalf of the corporation for this purpose, he does allege that he is suing on behalf of all the other bondholders similarly situated with him who might choose to join with him, and demands that the assets of the corporation be returned so that they may be subjected to the equitable lien. And of course, if it is true, as alleged in his complaint, that the terms of the oral contract called for a deed of trust covering all the real and personal property of the corporation then owned or thereafter acquired by it, then it would be proper that all these assets which it is alleged were improperly and illegally dissipated should be returned to the corporation so that they might be included within the deed of trust. It is manifest, however, that he cannot join such an action (wherein he is suing as a trustee of the corporation and in the nature of a guardian) with an action in his own behalf wherein he is seeking personal relief. James v. Steifer Mining Co., 35 Cal. App. 778, 787, 171 Pac. 117. The complaint is not framed upon this cause of action, and in answer to defendants' argument that it is improperly joined with an action for personal relief plaintiff denies the intention of making it the basis of a cause of action. A further consideration of the allegations relating to it is therefore unnecessary.

[10, 11] There is another phase of the case which has been purposely omitted from the foregoing discussion because it is not presented in any of the voluminous briefs which have been filed on this appeal, and that is that plaintiff, without seeking specific performance, could have treated the oral contract as a direct obligation to pay money, sued on it as such, and had his lien to aid in enforcing the judgment. Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 65, 69; Cummings v. Dudley, 60 Cal. 383, 385, 44 Am. Rep. 58; Beckwith v. Sheldon, 168 Cal. 742, 746, 145 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 963. And "where a party agrees to give a mortgage or lien on property, or imperfectly attempts to execute such mortgage or lien, upon a valuable consideration received, a court of equity, upon a proper showing, will create a specific lien on the property intended to be hypothecated, and enforce the same." Beckwith v. Sheldon, supra, 168 Cal. 747, 145 Pac. 99, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 963. But equity will grant such relief only as incidental to the enforcement of the original obligation. "A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which * * * an action can be brought upon the principal obligation." Civ. Code, § 2911. Thus, where the principal obligation is unenforceable because barred by the statute of limitations, and the facts alleged do not support the conclusion that a resulting trust has arisen, equity cannot declare or enforce a lien. The principal obligation was the oral contract for the exchange of the securities, action upon which was barred in two years after it accrued, and this being so, whatever right plaintiff had to an equitable lien growing out of the oral contract was lost before this action was commenced. San Jose, etc., Bank v. Bank of Madera, 144 Cal. 574, 577, 78 Pac. 5; Newhall v. Sherman, Clay & Co., 124 Cal. 509, 512, 57 Pac. 387.

[12] The complaint alleges that the agreement was made in March, 1911. The suit was commenced February 24, 1916. Plaintiff excuses his delay by allegations that from time to time he was assured by the United Properties Company that the bonds would be delivered soon and that the deed of trust was in course of preparation. In one portion of his complaint he alleges that these assurances continued down to May, 1914, but the last definite assurance is alleged to have been on January 25, 1913. Then it is alleged that in October, 1912, he commenced a personal investigation of the books of the company which was completed March 1, 1913; that between March 1, 1913, and June 1, 1913, he discovered the scheme to defraud him. In appellant's reply brief it is said:

"Plaintiff's first discovery of frauds occurred thereafter when he looked into the resources of the 'fraudulent companies,' concerning which nothing definite was discovered until about the month of May or June, 1913."

And again:

"That plaintiff knew of no fraudulent scheme or intent, and suspected none, prior to his discoveries of May or June, 1913."

On March 4, 1913, he filed a written protest with the United Properties Company and the trustees under the deed of trust executed January 25, 1913, wherein the United Properties Company joined with Smith, Tevis, and Hanford in an assignment of all their interests in the securities of the United Properties Company to the trustees. In this protest he demanded that the company commence suit against Smith to compel him to deliver to the company stocks and securities which he claimed belonged to the company. At that time he knew Smith, Tevis, and Hanford had conveyed all their interest in the United Properties Company to trustees with "full power and authority to deal with the properties and interests so assigned and transferred, as fully as if they were the sole and exclusive owners thereof in their own right." Again, on May 14, 1913, he filed a protest with the trustees against the assignment of Smith to the Mercantile Trust Company of all his securities including those which it was claimed should have been delivered to the United Properties Company under the promotion agreement. As these securities were a part of the properties which were alleged to have been owned by the corporation in March, 1911, and upon which the equitable lien is sought, it is evident that plaintiff had notice in May, 1913, at least, of the intention of the parties not to perform the alleged oral contract. The semiannual payments of interest were made to him, it is alleged, to induce him to rely on the promises that the company would issue the bonds. But the last of these payments made for that purpose was in July, 1912. In October of that year he became suspicious and started a personal investigation of the affairs of the company.

The foregoing presents the admitted facts evidencing the intention of the company not to perform the alleged oral agreement. But it is alleged that in August, 1911, the United Properties Company conveyed to the Oakland Railways all the stocks of the Oakland Traction Company, San Francisco, Oakland & San Jose Consolidated Railway, and the East Shore & Suburban Railway Company, which plaintiff claims were to be subjected to his lien as security for his bonds. He fails to allege that he did not then have knowledge of this transfer, which was a clear breach of the alleged oral agreement, and, construing the complaint as stating plaintiff's case in the manner most favorable to himself, it must be assumed that he had knowledge of the breach at the time of the transfer. And if he had knowledge of this transfer, it is of little importance that the Oakland Railways was controlled by the United Properties Company. They were separate corporate entities, and the transfer of the stock to the Oakland Railways transferred the title and made it impossible for the United Properties Company to either cover them by a deed of trust or deliver them into the possession of a trustee for the benefit of its bondholders.

[13] In view of all these facts, the allegations that "plaintiff believed said representations were true, and relied upon said promises and assurances," can have no weight. Assuming that the limitation of the statute began to run within a few months after March, 1911, unless tolled by representations made to plaintiff to induce him not to commence suit, the complaint fails to state any facts from which the court could reasonably believe that any such assurances were given credit after June, 1913, as conceded by appellant in his briefs. For these reasons the trial court was justified in sustaining the demurrers on the ground that the suit was barred by the statute of limitations. What has been said regarding the statute of limitations applies to all parties but the United Properties Company, which failed to plead it. The right of the other parties to plead the statute, especially against a complaint which seeks a lien upon property they have acquired, cannot be doubted.

[14] The fact that the time to sue had so expired justified all parties, including the United Properties Company, in assuming that no action would be taken by plaintiff. His acquiescence in the actions of the parties and his long delay in instituting these proceedings are a complete bar—one which under circumstances such as these a court of equity may raise of its own motion.

[15] It appears from the judgment of the trial court that the original complaint was filed on February 24, 1916; that amendments thereto were filed on the 28th day of July, 1916; that an amended complaint was thereafter filed on the 17th day of November, 1916; that demurrers to this amended complaint were sustained on the 5th day of March, 1916; and that the amended and substituted complaint which is involved in this appeal was filed on the 12th day of April, 1917. On this state of the record it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion in denying to plaintiff leave to amend the amended complaint, because, as has been pointed out, the only cause of action stated under any theory of the case is barred by the statute of limitations and the laches of plaintiff.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ney, expressed exactly his conclusions thereon, would be improper, and would constitute an irregularity in court proceedings, under section 657, subd. 1, relating to grounds for a new trial.

2. Exceptions, bill of $\S$ 55(1)—Irregularity in signing judgment without reading available only on motion for new trial.

An objection that a trial judge signed a decision on controverted facts without knowledge that the same expressed exactly his conclusions thereon could be urged only on motion for new trial on such ground, and only on affidavit setting forth alleged facts, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 658, and, the error not being evidenced by a ruling or order subject to an exception, the insertion of a statement of such error is not within the proper scope of a bill of exceptions, allowable on motion to Supreme Court to establish exceptions.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an unverified application, under section 652, Code of Civil Procedure; the object being to obtain the insertion, in a bill of exceptions to be used on an appeal from a judgment, of a statement going to show that the trial judge, in the matter of signing the findings of fact and conclusions of law constituting the written decision required by law, left the matter of the contents of such findings entirely to the attorney for the prevailing party, and signed the same without reading. We can hardly conceive that a trial judge would sign a decision on controverted facts without knowledge that the same expressed exactly his conclusions thereon. Certainly he could not properly do so, and we have no doubt that for him to do so would constitute an irregularity in the proceedings of the court under subdivision 1 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, relative to motions for new trial. Of course, the party is entitled to the decision of the judge.

[2] But we are satisfied that, upon the matters alleged, the claim of the applicant in this behalf could be urged only on motion for new trial on this ground, and only on affidavits setting forth the alleged facts. Section 658, Code Civ. Proc. As said in Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 205, 62 Pac. 474:

"It is quite evident that this ground for a new trial is intended to refer to matters which an appellant cannot fully present by exceptions taken during the progress of the trial, and which, therefore, must appear by affidavit."

PEOPLE v. ROUTH. (Cr. 2260.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1920.
Rehearing Denied April 29, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1037(2) — District attorney's misconduct not considered without assignment and request to have jury disregard.

That the misconduct of the district attorney in a criminal case may be considered by the Supreme Court on appeal, the misconduct must be assigned and request made that the trial court admonish the jury to disregard it.

2. Criminal law §720(1) — Statement of district attorney as to identity of person whose check was forged held not misconduct.

In a prosecution for passing a fictitious check where it was claimed that the funds upon which it was drawn were created by the deposit of a forged check of an attorney in another city, a statement of the district attorney that the purported signer subpoenaed as a witness was an attorney and the only one of that name in such city held not misconduct; it being coupled with the statement of his intention to produce such attorney as a witness.

3. Criminal law §900 — Agreement to submit case held to waive district attorney's misconduct.

Where, in a prosecution for passing a fictitious check, counsel agreed that an absent witness might be introduced after the defense had put in its case, but defendant rested after the conclusion of the state's case, an agreement by counsel to submit the case held to amount to a waiver of any claim of misconduct by reason of the district attorney's assertion of what he intended to prove by the absent witness.

4. Criminal law §722½ — Argument of district attorney held not misconduct.

In a prosecution for passing a fictitious check where it was claimed that the funds on which the check was drawn were created by the deposit of a forged check, a statement of the district attorney in his closing argument referring to the forgery of the check held not misconduct.

5. False pretenses §49(4) — Evidence held to show person passing fictitious check knew it was worthless.

In a prosecution for passing a fictitious check drawn upon a fund created by the deposit of an alleged forged check, evidence held to support a finding that defendant knew he had no funds in the bank.

6. False pretenses §52 — Instruction held not erroneous as authorizing conviction if defendant charged with passing fictitious check intended to defraud payee.

In prosecution for passing a fictitious check, an instruction that even if there were not sufficient funds in the bank to meet the check when presented defendant should be found not guilty if he had no intention to defraud, held not erroneous as authorizing a conviction if there was an intention to defraud the payee.

7. False pretenses §41 — Evidence as to understanding not to honor checks till information was obtained held not error.

In a prosecution for passing a fictitious check, admission of evidence as to the bank's understanding with defendant that checks would not be honored until certain information had been obtained held not error.

Angellotti, C. J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

W. B. Routh was convicted of drawing a fictitious check, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Eric J. Rosenstirn, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, John H. Riordan, and R. L. Chamberlain, all of San Francisco, for the People.

WILBUR, J. Defendant was convicted of the violation of section 476a of the Penal Code, which makes it a felony, willfully with intent to defraud, to draw a check upon a bank, knowing at the time that there was not sufficient funds in, or that there is not credit with, such bank to meet such check upon presentation. On September 24, 1917, the defendant deposited with the Security Bank of Oakland a check for $1,500, signed "Ingall W. Bull," drawn on the Security Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, and a passbook was given to the defendant showing a credit in his favor of $1,500. September 25, 1917, the defendant drew a check on the Security Bank of Oakland, payable to the order of Normandin-Campen Company in payment for an automobile, which check, upon presentation, was refused payment, and is made the basis of this charge.

Appellant's claim for reversal is based upon the proposition that there is not sufficient evidence to justify a conviction, that the jury was erroneously instructed, and that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct. The conduct of the district attorney, of which defendant complains, consisted largely in statements on the trial to the effect that the Bull check was a forgery. In view of the failure to prove or offer evidence in support of that charge, defendant not only complains thereof as misconduct, but earnestly contends that in the absence thereof the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of conviction. In view of this claim of misconduct, the submission of the case, under the circumstances hereinafter stated, makes defendant's contention of the insufficiency of the evidence peculiarly significant, and for that reason such contention, as now made, will be first stated and considered, more in detail than would otherwise be necessary.

The defendant, in support of his claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction, states:

"* * * There is not a word in the evidence that the Los Angeles check was not entirely good, nor does any reason appear why the Oakland bank closed the account of the defendant."

Appellant states that in presenting his argument the first four points "will be grouped under a heading discussing the entire absence of legal or any evidence to either support or justify the judgment or the allegations of the information. We will then argue that there is no legal or any evidence establishing the corpus delicti or connecting the defendant with the commission of any offense." Again appellant states:

"Nor is there a word of evidence that the defendant knew the check he deposited to be worthless or that it was a forgery or that the bank had refused to cash it. * * * There is not a word of evidence in the entire record that the Los Angeles check marked 'People's Exhibit No. 1' was not worth its face value of $1,500, or that the Los Angeles bank ever refused to cash it upon presentation, or that there was not sufficient funds to meet it upon its presentation to the Los Angeles bank, or that it was a forgery or that defendant knew it to be a forgery. The original credit was given by the Oakland bank upon the deposit of this check, they issued a check book and a passbook for the full amount of the check and credited the defendant with the amount on their books, and for some reason unknown that credit given to the defendant was by the Oakland bank itself and unknown to the appellant struck off his account in the bank. * * * We believe that the conclusion is irresistible that at the time the appellant drew and delivered the check marked 'People's Exhibit 2' he had no knowledge at the time of such drawing and delivery that he did not have sufficient funds in or credit with the Oakland bank to meet such check in full upon its presentation."

This point is again reiterated:

"But in this case there is absolutely no evidence that the defendant was without funds or credit in the Oakland bank, or that he knew at the time of making and delivering the check that he had no funds in the bank. * * * Therefore under the above authorities it is earnestly contended that none of the essential elements denounced by the statute were established by legal or any evidence, nor was the evidence sufficient to support either the allegations of the information or the judgment. We believe that the evidence shows the defendant to be innocent of violating section 476a of the Penal Code. * * * There was an entire failure of proof. * * * There is in the evidence a total failure of proof of the essential elements constituting the crime, namely, knowledge that he had no funds in the bank. * * * The transaction in this cause is clothed entirely in innocence and it is one that occurs frequently in the commercial world. * * * We submit that not only is there no evidence to support the judgment or order or to sustain the allegations of the information, but the evidence shows the appellant to be innocent of violating the provisions of section 476a of the Penal Code. * * * All that was established in the instant case is the drawing of the check and the refusal of the bank to cash it, and that does not establish the corpus delicti. Nor was there any evidence that the appellant knew the check was worthless when he deposited it with the Oakland bank, and likewise there was no evidence that it was a forgery, or that the defendant knew it to be a forgery or that he perpetrated a forgery or that it was for any reason invalid despite the misconduct of the district attorney in this regard. It is therefore urged that there is no evidence establishing the corpus delicti. * * * He performed an act in the regular course of business that any human being was permitted legally to perform. It was, as the evidence discloses, entirely innocent in character. * * *"

Before discussing the contention of appellant concerning the insufficiency of the evidence to justify a conviction, we will examine the assignment of misconduct on the part of the district attorney in the light of the contention of counsel.

In the opening statement to the jury the district attorney made the following statement with reference to the check deposited by the defendant in the Security Bank of Oakland:

"I think we will also show that this check was a forgery, and it was never honored. We will produce Mr. Bull to show that he never authorized the signature, and that the entire transaction from start to finish was a rank fraud perpetrated by the defendant for the purpose of securing the automobile."

On redirect examination the witness Charles A. Smith, cashier of the Security Bank, the following occurred:

"Q. Mr. Smith, the only thing that would be gained by telegraphing to Los Angeles, and the only information your telegram would elicit, would be this: You would find that a man by the name of Ingall W. Bull had an account which was worth $1,500 with the Security Trust & Savings Bank? That is all you would get from the wire, isn't it? A. That is all.

"Q. Whether or not the thing was a forgery could not be ascertained until the check was sent down there, which is obvious; and if this defendant, or the person who passed this check, gave you the check of a prominent man, he might have $1,500 on deposit, but nothing of practical value would be gained by telegraphing?"

This was objected to, objection sustained, and question withdrawn. While the district attorney was introducing exemplars as a basis for expert testimony on handwriting, an objection was interposed to one exhibit offered. In response to the objection and in explanation of the purpose of the testimony, the district attorney said: "I intend to call a handwriting expert to show that he wrote the check that is a forgery." The objection was thereupon overruled. Thereupon the district attorney announced: "We will call Mr. Eisenschmel. Well, he is testifying in another case, they tell me, in another department." Thereafter the following occurred:

"The Court: Have you some other witnesses for the people?"

"Mr. Wittschen: No. I didn't expect we would make the time we did, and I also expected to call Prof. Eisenschmel, who is in Judge Donahue's department, and they tell me he is on the witness stand, and also Mr. Bull. Unfortunately I had him subpoenaed for Thursday, and telegraphed him to come Friday, and then it was changed, and it went over on account of Mr. Mulcahy's dereliction in not being here Thursday. Will you agree that he may be put on out of order, that is, that you may proceed and put in your case?"

"Mr. Cunha: Yes, that is all right.

"The Court: Who is this Mr. Bull?"

"Mr. Wittschen: He is an attorney in Los Angeles who has an account with the bank that is mentioned here—the only Ingall W. Bull in Los Angeles.

"Mr. Cunha: I object to that statement of the district attorney and assign it as misconduct.

"Mr. Wittschen: Well, if there is any other Ingall W. Bull, you can produce him. Anyway, I intend to call him to show that he did not sign this check, and that this is not his handwriting, and some other things which probably would be a matter of rebuttal."

Thereupon the district attorney called Sadie Benson, and at the conclusion of her testimony stated:

"That is all. We rest.

"Mr. Cunha: So do we.

"Mr. Wittschen: No defense that you wish to offer?"

"Mr. Cunha: We rest at this time.

"Mr. Wittschen: Well, I was going to call Mr. Bull. Mr. Bull would be in rebuttal. So there will be no misunderstanding, you rest completely, do you, if I withdraw Mr. Bull from the list? I don't want any resting and then coming back again. If the case is going to go to the jury, let it go to the jury right now.

"Mr. Cunha: I am willing that it should go to the jury right now.

"Mr. Wittschen: Very well, we rest.

"Mr. Cunha: All right.

"Mr. Wittschen: Shall I proceed with the opening argument?"

"The Court: Proceed."

[1-3] In the first place, it will be observed that there was no assignment of misconduct of the district attorney in these repeated statements and no request that the trial court admonish the jury to disregard the statements of the district attorney. Such assignments and requests were necessary as a foundation for a complaint to this court of misconduct. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 Pac. 295; People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 545, 117 Pac. 549; People v. Yee Foo, 4 Cal. App. 743, 89 Pac. 450; People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 143, 96 Pac. 401; Grossetti v. Sweasey, 176 Cal. 793, 169 Pac. 687; Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 184 Pac. 672. The only misconduct assigned was a statement of the district attorney that there was only one Mr. Bull in Los Angeles. This was coupled with his statement of an intention to produce Mr. Bull, and we think it is entirely without prejudice to the defendant. This case furnishes an excellent illustration of the necessity for proper assignments of error and request for an instruction to the jury. There is no suggestion that the district attorney did not enter upon the case with the bona fide intention of showing that the check in question was a forgery, and for that purpose intended to call handwriting experts, and Ingall W. Bull, the purported maker thereof. It was agreed between the counsel that Mr. Bull should be called at the conclusion of the defendant's evidence. When the people rested and called upon the defendant to present his case, he also rested. In accordance with the agreement of counsel, Mr. Bull should have been thereupon called as a witness. Counsel for the defendant was confronted with this dilemma: If he rested the case there was a chance that the district attorney, for the purpose of expediting the business of the court, might also rest, and thus give him an opportunity of arguing to the jury, as he has to this court, the innocence of the defendant and the absolute failure of proof of guilt, and, if he can so strenuously insist here that there was a complete failure of proof, the argument to the jury must have been much more persuasive. If the defendant, however, at that time had assigned the conduct of the district attorney throughout the trial in predicting the presence and nature of the testimony of Mr. Bull as misconduct, the district attorney no doubt would have arranged for the presence of Mr. Bull, who apparently at that very time was under subpoena and on the way to Oakland from Los Angeles. Under these circumstances, the agreement to submit the case amounted to a waiver of any claim of misconduct by reason of the assertion of the district attorney of what he intended to prove. We therefore conclude that the de-defendant cannot here complain of the alleged misconduct of the district attorney, nor do we hold that such conduct was wrong. It would no doubt have been better for the district attorney to have delayed the case for the prospective witnesses, and thus, perhaps, have obviated the longer delay caused by this appeal and the necessary attention devoted to the case by the courts of appeal.

[4] Appellant also claims as misconduct a statement in the closing argument of the district attorney to the jury. But this statement was not objected to at the time, nor was it assigned as error, nor was a request made that the jury be instructed to disregard it, nor did it constitute misconduct. The statement was as follows:

"Now, we are not required, as I said before, to show that this check was a forgery. You can draw your own conclusions. I don't care what they are. All we are required to prove, and I want you to stick to the evidence—I want you to take the case for which the defendant is on trial—is that he passed a check on a bank with the intent to defraud Normandin-Campen Company, or the copartners doing business under that name, as it is alleged in the information, and when he drew that check he had no credit with the bank. Did he have any? Answer me, what credit did he have there? He had the credit that came from this transaction and nothing else."

There was no secret about the fact that the district attorney charged that this check was a forgery, and in view of that fact it was perfectly proper for him to argue to the jury that his failure to make that proof did not necessitate an acquittal. It was, under the circumstances, a necessary and important explanation which might have been made in the instructions to be given by the court, but was nevertheless a correct statement. Furthermore, no reference to the forgery was made in the opening argument of the district attorney, and he states in his closing argument that the only reason he referred to it at all was because of the argument of the defendant's counsel. In his closing argument the district attorney said:

"I don't care whether the Ingall W. Bull check is a forgery or not. * * * The fact remains that we have no evidence before the court, other than that produced by the prosecution, that this check is good or not good."

[5] In considering the claim that there was no substantial evidence to sustain the conviction it will be necessary to state other facts in evidence. When the defendant brought the $1,500 check purporting to be signed by Ingall W. Bull to the Security Bank of Oakland for deposit, he attempted to secure an advance of $100, which was refused. The cashier instructed the receiving teller to take the check subject to confirmation by the Los Angeles bank. He was also instructed, in the presence of the defendant, not to pay the defendant any money until the Los Angeles bank reported on the check. The cashier stated to the defendant that the bank would not permit him any credit to draw against the account until the bank had a report from Los Angeles "which would take a couple of days or something of that kind." On the same day the Oakland bank sent the check to Los Angeles with a request for immediate telegraphic report thereon, and on the following day it received a telegram, as a result of which the Security Bank of Oakland charged off the amount of $1,500 on defendant's account and refused to pay checks drawn by the defendant. On the same day that such notice was received and one day before the time fixed by the bank for a report from Los Angeles on the Bull check, the defendant went to San Jose and purchased the automobile, obtaining credit by showing his passbook with the bank with the entry of $1,500, and gave the check at such time and place that it was not likely to be presented immediately. This check reached the bank in Oakland two days later and was refused payment. From this evidence it is clear that the jury was justified in concluding that the defendant drew a check on the Oakland bank knowing that he had no funds in the bank and no credit with the bank. The defendant's check was drawn before the time fixed by the bank when it would either accept or reject checks. On the same day that the defendant gave his check for the automobile, he left Oakland with a woman whom he had introduced as his wife, and that night camped out in the suburbs of Sacramento. Four days later he was arrested at Drain, Or. The evidence was clearly sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Defendant complains of the following instruction:

"One of the essential elements in the commission of the crime charged in this information is that there should be an attempt to defraud the party to whom this check might be given. If you believe in the present case, even though there were not sufficient funds in the bank to meet the check concerned here when the same was presented to the bank, that the defendant had no intention to defraud Normandin-Campen Company, you are instructed to find the defendant not guilty."

[6] Appellant contends that this instruction authorized a conviction if there "was an intention to defraud the payee." We do not so understand the instruction. It required an acquittal in the absence of such proof, but left to the other instructions the statement of other facts essential to a conviction.

[7] Appellant complains of the overruling of his objection to the following question:

"Q. The only agreement or understanding you had with the defendant was, as you have stated, that no check would be honored against this deposit until you would hear from Los Angeles?"

This was objected to. The court remarked:

"What was or was not the understanding will be established by their actions and their conversations.

"Mr. Wittschen: Have I not the right to put this direct question, 'Did he have any credit at the bank so that you would honor checks?'"

"Mr. Cunha: Oh, I have no objection to that.

"The Court: Yes, go ahead and answer that question.

"A. What was the question?"

The question then was repeated.

"Mr. Cunha: Did your honor rule upon that question?"

"The Court: Yes, the objection is overruled.

"Mr. Wittschen: Q. And he had no other credit save that with the Security Bank, a banking corporation, that would honor any checks? A. No. He had no other agreement.

"Q. There was no other agreement or understanding with the bank? A. No other agreement."

It is not clear that the defendant intended to object to the question finally asked, and under the circumstances as detailed by the witnesses the answer amounted to nothing more than a statement that there was nothing said other than what had already been testified to.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; OLNEY, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I concur.

I have concluded that the proof was sufficient to sustain the verdict, though by no means as clear as doubtless it could have been made by direct evidence that the check on the Los Angeles bank was worthless. Unquestionably the state should have produced such testimony, if it was available, instead of leaving the matter to so great an extent a matter of inference. But consideration of the evidence in fact introduced, including, of course, the whole conduct of the defendant in the matter, leaves one practically without substantial doubt that the Los Angeles check was worthless, and that defendant drew his check on the Oakland bank knowing this and knowing it would be refused payment when presented in due course because of an adverse report from the Los Angeles bank.

I can see absolutely nothing in the conduct of the defendant's attorney at the time of the submission of the cause to the jury, as that matter is set forth in the opinion, to fairly warrant a conclusion that any claim of prior misconduct on the part of the district attorney was thereby waived. It was the district attorney's suggestion uninspired in any degree by any suggestion of the defendant's attorney, that the case go to the jury "right now," and he simply assented. I do not see very well what else he could have done. If the district attorney chose to thus close his case without waiting for further testimony, there was nothing else to do. I do not understand that it was incumbent on him to then formally warn the district attorney that he proposed to insist on all objections and assignments of error he had previously made. But if there had been misconduct on the part of the district attorney in suggesting that the check was a forgery, the claim here is sufficiently answered by what is said in the opinion as to the effect of failure of the defendant at the time to formally assign the same as misconduct and to request an admonitory instruction. Except as regards the matter of waiver of alleged misconduct by assenting to the submission to the jury, I concur in the opinion.

HERDAN v. HANSON. (L. A. 4379.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1920.

1. Election of remedies ⇨11—No estoppel where mistake in election.

While the fact that a party having two inconsistent, concurrent remedies by electing to proceed upon one will estop him from invoking the other, where a party makes a mistake in election of remedies, he is not estopped by his abortive election from subsequently resorting to a remedy to which he was really entitled.

2. Election of remedies ⇨7(1)—Plaintiff held not estopped to sue for damages by prior abortive suit for rescission.

Where plaintiff sued to rescind a contract for exchange of land for his stock of merchandise, but was nonsuited for failing to tender a deed to the land taken in exchange, such attempted election of remedies did not preclude him from subsequently maintaining an action for damages for fraudulent representations; the prior attempted election having been rendered abortive before plaintiff had proceeded to a point incompatible with the institution of the damage suit.

3. Fraud ⇨55, 57—Evidence as to value of merchandise exchanged for realty held admissible.

In an action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange merchandise for realty, evidence as to the value of the merchandise was admissible under the issue of fraud for the purpose of showing the circumstances as provided in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856, 1860, and also as to the issue raised by defendant's answer as to the true value of the stock.

4. Evidence $\S$ 113(2)—Evidence as to value of merchandise exchanged held admissible, though referring to value some months before.

In action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange merchandise for realty; evidence as to the value of the merchandise was not incompetent, though it referred to such value at the time some months prior to the execution of the exchange contract; its admissibility being within the discretion of the court.

5. Principal and agent $\S$ 180—Knowledge of interested agent as to value of property exchanged held not imputable to principal.

In an action for damages for false representations inducing plaintiff to exchange his stock of merchandise for defendant's realty where it appeared that plaintiff's agent was defendant's partner, plaintiff could not be charged with the agent's uncommunicated knowledge of actual conditions as to the value of defendant's realty, he being adversely interested, although ordinarily the knowledge of an agent is imputed to his principal in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 2332.

6. Principal and agent $\S$ 171(4) — Principal having profited by representations of agent is bound thereby.

In action for damages for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange his stock of merchandise for defendant's realty through the medium of his agent who was defendant's partner, defendant, having obtained the benefit of the agent's acts, was bound by the representations and concealments of such agent; he being in reality defendant's agent within Civ. Code, $\S$ 2330.

7. Fraud $\S$ 11(1)—Expressions of opinion becoming affirmation of fact defined.

A statement concerning the subject-matter of the transaction, which might otherwise be only an expression of opinion if affirmed as an existing fact material to the transaction and reasonably inducing the other party to consider and rely upon it as a fact, becomes an affirmation of fact within the general rule as to fraudulent representations.

8. Appeal and error $\S$ 1008(1)—Whether representations as to value were of fact held question for trial court.

In an action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange merchandise for realty, whether defendant's statements as to the value of the lands were affirmed so as to permit reliance upon them by plaintiff as statements of actual facts within defendant's knowledge held questions of fact for the trial court.

9. Fraud $\S$ 58(1)—Degree of proof stated.

While fraud must be clearly proved, direct evidence is not necessary, but the indirect evidence and the inferences to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy the trial court and jury that fraud was designed and accomplished.

10. Fraud $\S$ 58(1) — Representations as to value of property exchanged shown to be affirmation of fact.

In an action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange merchandise for realty, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that fraudulent representations were made by defendant as to the value of the land, which were tantamount to an affirmation of an existing fact rather than a mere expression of opinion, and were the inducing cause of the contract.

11. Appeal and error $\S$ 1047(3)—Refusal to strike statements as to value in suit for false representations, if error, held harmless.

In an action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange his stock of merchandise for defendant's realty, refusal to strike testimony that defendant, while the contract was being executed, made statements to plaintiff's daughter relative to the value of the land, if error because statements were made out of plaintiff's hearing, was harmless; the evidence whether plaintiff heard the statements being conflicting.

12. Fraud $\S$ 35—Action maintainable against party inducing exchange and unable to restore status quo by selling property received before attempting rescission.

The dismissal of an action for fraudulent representations inducing plaintiff to exchange merchandise for realty was not necessitated by defendant's attempted rescission of the contract prior to suit, it appearing that he had sold the merchandise and was unable to restore plaintiff to his original position.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by A. Herdan against E. O. Hanson for damages for fraudulent representations. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Barstow, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Action for damages for fraudulent representations whereby defendant procured an exchange of property between himself and plaintiff. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

On May 22, 1913, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff was to transfer to defendant a stock of merchandise in exchange for two parcels of real property belonging to defendant, one of which was in the city of Los Angeles and subject to a mortgage of $3,000, and the other situated in Flathead county, Mont., and subject to a mortgage of $1,400. The transfers thus agreed upon were consummated the following June. Plaintiff alleges that in August, 1913, he first discovered the true value of the Montana property, which he claims had been misrepresented to him by the defendant. On September 10, 1913, plaintiff commenced an action against said defendant, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, wherein plaintiff sought to have the above-described contract rescinded. The trial court in that case granted defendant's motion for a judgment of nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff had failed to tender defendant a deed to said Montana property prior to bringing the action for rescission. The judgment, which was entered accordingly, has become final. Plaintiff then instituted the present action for damages resulting from the alleged fraudulent representations. In this action the trial court found, among other things, that the merchandise transferred by plaintiff was of the reasonable value of $10,000; that defendant, fraudulently and with intent to deceive plaintiff, represented to said plaintiff that the Montana property was of the fair and reasonable value of $6,000 and also represented to the plaintiff that the property in Los Angeles was of the reasonable value of $8,000, and that the equities in both parcels of real property were reasonably worth $9,500; that the true value of said property in Los Angeles was $8,000, "but said Montana property was not on said 22d day of May, 1913, or at any other time, of any greater value than the sum of $200"; that there was a mortgage on the Los Angeles property amounting to $3,000 and on the Montana property amounting to $1,400; and that the equities in both said parcels of real property were not at the time of making said contract, or at any other time, worth over $5,000. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $4,600.

[1, 2] The main contention in support of the appeal is that the plaintiff, having elected to proceed in an action for rescission, is now precluded from resorting to an action for damages. It is insisted, upon behalf of appellant, that a party having two inconsistent, concurrent remedies may not pursue both, but must choose between them and, having clearly elected to proceed upon one, is thereby bound and will be estopped from invoking the other. Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 115, 53 Pac. 427. It is, however, equally true that, where a party makes a mistake in election of remedies, he is not estopped by his abortive election from subsequently resorting to and pursuing a remedy to which he was really entitled. Agar v. Winslow, 123 Cal. 587, 56 Pac. 422, 69 Am. St. Rep. 84. It is insisted, however, upon behalf of appellant, that plaintiff's cause of action should be barred in the present case by his prior election of remedies for the reason that the action for rescission failed, not because plaintiff attempted to select a remedy to which he was not entitled, but because of his own neglect in omitting to comply with the conditions prerequisite to the granting of the relief prayed for by him. The answer to this contention is that the principle of election is founded upon the theory that a party should not be allowed to occupy inconsistent positions (Bigelow on Es- toppel [6th Ed.] p. 732), whereas, the effect of the judgment of nonsuit in the prior action was merely to leave the plaintiff and defendant in the same relative position as before the action was commenced, namely, with a subsisting contract through which plaintiff claims to have been defrauded. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 Pac. 460. The instant case is indistinguishable from the case cited. In that case the plaintiff, who had entered into an agreement for the purchase of certain real property, claimed a breach of the contract and instituted an action for recovery of the money paid on the purchase price in which a judgment of nonsuit was entered. Plaintiff thereafter prosecuted an action of specific performance of the contract, and it was held that she was not estopped, by reason of bringing the former action for money had and received, from insisting, in the subsequent action, upon specific performance. The ground upon which the nonsuit was granted in the first action does not appear, but the reasoning of the case is not thereby rendered inapplicable to the case at bar. The court there said (172 Cal. 75, 155 Pac. 463):

"It [the action to recover the purchase money] could not have been successfully maintained except by proof that the contract had been rescinded, or that defendant had been guilty of a breach thereof. The judgment of nonsuit was, therefore, * * * based upon the fact that no rescission, termination, or breach of the contract had been proven and that it was still in force; that the plaintiff had no such remedy as she sought to enforce by that action. * * * The defendant is placed in no worse position by reason of the unsuccessful prosecution of that action. There is, consequently, no estoppel."

It follows that, inasmuch as the attempted prior election of the plaintiff was arrested and rendered abortive before he had proceeded to a point absolutely incompatible with the institution and maintenance of the present action, the principle of estoppel arising from an election of inconsistent remedies cannot be invoked and applied.

[3] Error is claimed in the admission, over defendant's objection, of testimony as to the value of plaintiff's stock of goods. The objection was made upon the theory that, while the value of the property transferred to plaintiff was material for the reason that his cause of action depended upon the existence of misrepresentations as to the true value of said property, still the value of the property transferred by plaintiff could not be considered for the reason that the contract related to the exchange of property only and did not purport to establish or refer to a pecuniary standard of value as the basis of the deal. Not only was evidence of the value of the properties exchanged admissible under the issue of fraud for the purpose of showing the circumstances surrounding and attending the making of the contract (Beverly v. Blackwood, 102 Cal. 83, 92, 36 Pac. 378; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856 and 1860), but it was relevant and material to the issue raised by the defendant's answer as to the true value of plaintiff's stock of merchandise (Norris v. Crandall, 6 Cal. Unrep. 706, 65 Pac. 568).

[4] The testimony of the witness Sugarman as to the value of the merchandise was not necessarily incompetent, even though it referred to such value at a time some months prior to the date of the execution of the contract in suit. While such value on the date in question was the precise thing to be determined, nevertheless the admission of evidence of such value at times shortly prior or subsequent to the date in question was largely within the discretion of the trial court, and we are not prepared to say that, under the circumstances, the discretion was abused. (Montgomery v. Sayre, 100 Cal. 182, 187, 34 Pac. 646, 38 Am. St. Rep. 271.)

Several assignments of error and specifications of insufficiency of evidence to support the findings of fact are made and based upon the claim that plaintiff failed to prove any fraudulent representations by defendant by which plaintiff was induced to enter into the agreement. The testimony upon this phase of the case is, in substance, as follows: Plaintiff, being desirous of disposing of his stock of merchandise, placed it in the hands of Morris Reiss, his wife's nephew, for sale at the price of $10,000. Reiss was in the real estate business for himself, but having his office with the defendant, and an understanding with the defendant that all commissions earned by him were to be shared equally with defendant, Reiss and defendant discussed the possibility of trading defendant's Los Angeles and Montana land for plaintiff's stock and agreed, in effect, that, if the exchange could be brought about, Reiss was to receive from the defendant the sum of $200 as commission for his services. At that time defendant told Reiss that he had never seen the Montana land; that he had bought it about two years before from a man named Fisher for $2,200, paying $800 in cash and giving a mortgage for the balance of the purchase price; that Fisher told him the land was worth $150 an acre, and was good land for subdividing, in which case $250 an acre might be realized; that some Norwegian friends of the defendant, who were familiar with the land, said it was good apple land because of the elevation and soil. Defendant further stated, "I'll stake my life on it that Fisher tells me the truth," and referred Reiss to Fisher, who was at that time living in Southern California. Reiss reported to plaintiff, in substance and effect, what defendant had told him about the land, but did not inform plaintiff that defendant had never seen the Montana land. Plaintiff objected to taking land which he himself had never seen and, upon Reiss so reporting, the defendant then said to Reiss that, if plaintiff took the land, he would later trade it off for plaintiff for "local holdings." This was reported by Reiss to plaintiff. The night before the contract was signed, Reiss's wife received a letter from Montana, in response to inquiries made by her concerning the value of the Montana land. This letter stated that the 40 acres of land in question were valueless by themselves, for the reason that they consisted entirely of a very high hill, which was too steep for farming and not good for pasture because of a large ledge of rock running through it. The letter further stated that if the owner purchased the balance of the quarter section the land in question would be worth something. Reiss and his wife took this letter to the defendant, who informed himself of its contents. Defendant thereupon stated that the writer must have had the wrong description "or else someone was knocking," and again said to Reiss that the land was worth $150 an acre and that he would positively guarantee that everything was just as he had said. Reiss and his wife both testified that defendant requested them not to show the letter to plaintiff as it would spoil the deal. There is testimony that defendant stated to Reiss that he had refused an offer of $100 an acre for the land. The letter in question was not called to the attention of plaintiff, and the following morning the contract was signed. While Reiss was drawing up the contract, the defendant stated to plaintiff's daughter, in the presence of plaintiff:

"Your father is making a good trade. That Montana land is worth $150 an acre and will soon be worth $250 an acre. It is fine apple land. If you were to take the mortgage of $3,000 off the University property and put it on the Montana land and take the mortgage of $1,400 off the Montana land and put it on the University property, I would take the Montana land every time."

[5, 6] In contending that the evidence as thus outlined does not support the findings complained of, it is argued that Reiss was the agent of the plaintiff, and that therefore the knowledge of Reiss, obtained from the defendant, was that of the plaintiff. Ordinarily the knowledge of an agent is imputed to his principal. Civ. Code, § 2332. But, assuming that Reiss was the agent of the plaintiff, it is the rule that, where an agent is interested in the result of a transaction adversely to the interest of his principal, the rule of imputed knowledge on the part of the principal no longer obtains. 31 Cyc. 1595. In the present case, there was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court that Reiss was acting as agent for defendant in securing the exchange in question. Since he was acting for defendant, upon a commission.

basis, his interest was adverse to plaintiff, and plaintiff cannot be charged with his uncommunicated knowledge of the actual conditions. On the other hand, having accepted the advantages obtained thereby, defendant was bound by the representations and concealments of Reiss, his agent. Bonnarjee v. Pike, 185 Pac. 479; Civ. Code, § 2330.

[7-10] With reference to the contention that the evidence does not support the findings in question because the alleged and found fraudulent misrepresentations were but mere expressions of opinion, it will suffice to say that, when a statement concerning a subject-matter of a transaction, which might otherwise be only an expression of opinion, is affirmed as an existing fact material to the transaction and reasonably induces the other party to consider and rely upon it as a fact, the statement then becomes an affirmation of fact within the meaning of the general rule as to fraudulent representations. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 878. This rule is frequently, and properly, applied to statements concerning the value of land at a distance when the party to whom the statements are made possesses no other information and is not in a position to investigate. Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 Pac. 1018; Nichols v. Moore, 183 Pac. 531; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 878, note h. Whether the statements as to value in this case were affirmed in such a manner as to permit reliance upon them by plaintiff as statements of actual facts within the knowledge of defendant, and whether the suppression of the information contained in the letter received from Montana amounted to fraud, were questions of fact for the determination of the trial court. Fulton v. Fisher, 151 Iowa, 429, 131 N. W. 662. While fraud must be clearly proved, direct evidence is not necessary for this purpose, but the "indirect evidence and the inference to be drawn from the proved facts must be so convincing as to satisfy trial court or trial jury that fraud was designed and accomplished." Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 800, 158 Pac. 753, 757. We are not prepared to say that the evidence in this case was insufficient to have satisfied the trial court that the alleged and found fraudulent representations were made by defendant and that they were tantamount to an affirmation of an existing fact, rather than a mere expression of opinion, and were the inducing cause of the plaintiff's entering into the contract.

[11] It is claimed that defendant's statements made, while the contract was being drafted, to plaintiff's daughter, were inadmissible because it was not shown that plaintiff heard them and that, in any event, it cannot be fairly said that they formed any part of the inducements to the making of the contract since the terms of the contract had been previously agreed upon and were actually being reduced to writing at the time the statements were made. No objection was made to the questions which upon direct examination elicited the testimony concerning the statements complained of; but, upon cross-examination, the witness, plaintiff's daughter, declared that nobody else but she and a Mrs. Orlejan heard the statements. Thereupon counsel for appellant moved to strike out the daughter's testimony concerning the statements of the defendant made at the time the contract was being drafted, upon the ground that they were immaterial and irrelevant. The ruling of the trial court denying the motion is assigned as error. Of course, if the plaintiff did not hear the statements complained of, they were not material and relevant as a part of the misrepresentations which, it was claimed, induced the plaintiff to enter into the agreement in controversy. Strictly speaking, the motion to strike out should have been preceded by a previously stated and sufficient objection made at the time of the introduction in evidence of the statements complained of, but, assuming, as may perhaps be properly done, that the nature of the testimony of the witness upon direct examination was not such as to put counsel for appellant upon notice of its irrelevancy and immateriality, and that therefore he was not required to interpose an objection upon those grounds before he could avail himself of a motion to strike out, still the record shows that, in addition to his daughter's testimony, the plaintiff testified concerning the making of the statements, in effect and without objection, that they were made in his presence, and the fair import of his testimony in this particular, as shown by the record, is that he heard the statements. It is apparent, therefore, that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the plaintiff heard the statements in question and this being so the error, if any, in the ruling of the trial court refusing to strike out the testimony of the daughter in the particulars stated was harmless. Even though the statements in question were made after the terms of the agreement had been arrived at, we think it cannot be fairly said that they formed no part of the cause which ultimately induced the plaintiff to finally execute the contract. This being so, the statements in question had a material and relevant bearing, to some extent at least, upon the issue of whether or not the plaintiff's participation in the agreement was procured as the result of fraudulent misrepresentations.

[12] There is no merit in the contention that the action should have been dismissed because of defendant's attempted rescission of the contract prior to the commencement of the present action. Defendant had sold the stock of merchandise before making the offer to rescind, and therefore the trial court did not err in concluding that, even if dependant were able to obtain the merchandise from his vendee, he was not able to restore plaintiff to his original position.

The judgment is affirmed.

DYER BROS. GOLDEN WEST IRON WORKS et al. v. CENTRAL IRON WORKS et al. (S. F. 8797.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 3, 1920.)

1. Damages ⇐81—Inquiry into original transaction permissible to show that notes deposited to insure performance were penalty.

Where contract provided for payment by each of the parties of certain sum into a common fund, to be distributed, on breach of the contract by one or more of the parties, to the other parties damaged thereby, provision of contract that notes could be executed in lieu of the cash payment did not, in action on the notes following a breach, preclude an investigation into the original transaction to determine sufficiency of notes as a basis for recovery of liquidated damages, under Civ. Code, § 1531; the obligation on notes not extinguishing the obligation under the contract, but merely covering damage in case of breach.

2. Damages ⇐78(2)—Designation of sum not controlling on question of whether a "penalty" or liquidated damages.

Though designation of the sum is to be considered in ascertaining whether a penalty or a provision for liquidated damages, it is not controlling, even though the word "penalty" is used, the question depending upon whether from a consideration of the nature of the agreement there was an actual intent to prescribe a penalty, that is, an intent to determine and define the liability in the case of a breach of the contract without any reference to the actual damage likely to be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Penalty.]

3. Damages ⇐80(1)—Amount depending upon gross business upon breach held liquidated damages.

Where a number of iron manufacturing concerns entered into a contract to protect themselves against demands of their employes which provided for a common fund to which each of the parties contributed, to be distributed, upon breach of the contract by any of the parties, to the others as damages in proportion to the gross business done by them, the amount to be so paid was liquidated damages, and not a penalty.

4. Damages ⇐79(1)—Amount fixed recoverable only if actual damages could not be ascertained.

A party seeking to recover, under a contract, the amount specified as damages in anticipation of a breach, must plead and prove that it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage, under Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671.

5. Damages ⇐150—Pleading of impossibility of ascertaining actual damages held sufficient.

In action to recover amount of damages fixed by contract prior to breach, allegation that actual damages could not be ascertained held sufficient.

6. Corporations ⇐447—Contract delegating to committee of an organization negotiations with employes held not beyond corporate powers.

Contract entered into by a number of manufacturing corporations to protect themselves against demands of their employes, whereby an executive committee was created to represent the parties in negotiations with the employes held not beyond the powers of the corporation as against objection that it attempted to delegate discretionary corporate functions.

7. Account ⇐1—Equity held to have jurisdiction of action on note involving accounting.

Where contract provided for payment by each party of certain amount to a common fund, to be distributed, on breach by any of the parties, to the other parties as their damages, an action on the notes given in lieu of the cash payments to common fund by defendant parties who had breached contract and for distribution of money to those entitled thereto under the contract, making their share dependent upon gross business, held within jurisdiction of equity, in that it involves accounting and will avoid a multiplicity of suits.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the Dyer Bros. Golden West Iron Works and others against the Central Iron Works and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco (Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Nathan C. Coghlan, William F. Herron, Myrick & Deering, and Edwin V. McKenzie, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants after an order sustaining demurrers to plaintiffs' amended complaint without leave to amend. The contract sued upon was entered into by plaintiffs and defendants for the alleged mutual protection and advancement of the business interests and conditions of plaintiffs and defendants, some of whom were incorporated and others of whom were copartnerships or doing business as individuals. All of the parties to the contract were structural steel and iron manufacturers of San Fran-disco, and among the objects and purposes sought to be attained by the contract were the promotion of settlements of industrial disputes between the parties to the contract, as employers, and their employes, by conciliation and arbitration, and the effecting of a more thorough organization of employers with the view to improving the conditions of the industry in which the several respective employers were engaged. To be more precise, the contract recites that the parties thereto were desirous of protecting themselves against various and sundry demands of their employes; that the parties were unable to resist, settle, or arbitrate said demands singly and severally without great loss to themselves and injury to their business; that, in the event of any parties withdrawing from the agreement and ceasing to act in concert with the remaining parties, great damage and loss would result which might not be recoverable under the law of damages, and which damage would be impracticable of ascertainment or proof under the rules of evidence. After providing for certain uniform regulations and restrictions to govern the conduct of the parties to the contract and for an executive committee to represent them in specified dealings and negotiations, the contract requires that each party pay into a common fund a sum of money in cash, or promissory notes given in lieu thereof, the amount thereof to be determined by the gross annual business of the party making such payment. This fund was to be kept intact until the termination of the agreement, by lapse of time or otherwise, and then be distributed among the parties who had kept the covenants and conditions of the contract in the proportion which the amount of their respective payments into the fund bore to the whole of said fund. All of the parties elected to make the required payments by means of promissory notes. The complaint alleges failure on the part of defendants to observe and abide by the terms of the agreement, thereby causing great loss to plaintiffs and necessitating the termination of the agreement, and prays that all the parties to said contract be directed to pay into the common fund contemplated by the contract the respective sums represented by their several promissory notes, and that such common fund be distributed among plaintiffs, or those determined by the court to be entitled to participate in the distribution under the terms of the contract.

The following grounds are urged in support of the demurrers:

(1) That the sums represented by the promissory notes constituted penalties, and not liquidated damages, and that therefore the complaint should have alleged the actual damage sustained by the breach.

(2) That the contract was void in that, by the creation of the executive committee to act as the agent of the parties, it attempted to delegate discretionary corporate functions in so far as the contract related to the corporations who were parties thereto.

(3) That the action is for the specific performance of a contract for the payment of money, and therefore not maintainable.

[1] The mere recital in the contract that the notes are to be taken in discharge of the obligation of the contract will not, in and of itself, suffice to prevent, as appellant contends, an investigation into the preliminary matters touching the original transaction out of which the notes emanated. To eliminate an inquiry into the original transaction by a novation, there must be a clear intent to extinguish the old obligation and supplant it with a new one. Civ. Code, § 1531. The terms of the contract in controversy in accordance with which the notes in question were executed did not provide for the extinguishment of an existing obligation, but were expressly designed to cover the damage which might be occasioned by a breach of the contract in the future. Consequently the covenant of the contract calling for the notes necessitates, proprio vigore, a consideration of the sufficiency of the notes as a basis for the recovery of liquidated damages.

Counsel for respondents contend that the provisions of the contract relating to the distribution of the common fund among those parties who had complied with the terms of the contract were intended to fix a penalty or forfeiture, and that therefore plaintiffs cannot recover on the notes, but are limited to the recovery of the actual damages proved to have been sustained. Muldoon v. Lynch, 66 Cal. 536, 6 Pac. 417; Wilmington Trans. Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 1, 5, 32 Pac. 705; Nakagawa v. Okamoto, 164 Cal. 718, 130 Pac. 707.

The contract, after reciting the impracticability of ascertaining the amount of the damage and loss under the rules of evidence in the event of a breach, proceeds as follows:

"Whereas, the parties hereto nevertheless desire to insure each other against such loss or damage and to induce each other to execute this agreement, assure and make each other safe in the keeping thereof, * * * and to provide a penalty [italics are ours] for the violation of this agreement. * * *"

[2] While the terms by which the parties designate the sum decided upon are to be considered in ascertaining the purpose and intent in stipulating the amount to be paid in case of a breach, such terms are by no means controlling, and, even though the term "penalty" is used, it must be ascertained from a consideration of the nature of the agreement whether there was an actual intent to prescribe a penalty; that is, an intent to determine and define the liability in the case of a breach of the contract without any reference to the actual damage likely to be sustained. The agreement in question provides a complicated arrangement for the purpose of meeting various conditions incapable of being satisfactorily dealt with by individual action, and sets forth at length the peculiar facts surrounding the subject-matter of the contract. The securing and maintaining of united action in certain contingencies by the parties thereto was the gist of the contract, and from the terms of the contract it is apparent that the parties thereto considered that any independent action in regard to the matters within the scope of the contract was likely to produce serious losses and defeat the aims and purposes contemplated by the parties. The sums to be paid for a noncompliance in this regard were not uniform amounts arbitrarily determined, but were to be based upon the gross business transacted by the respective parties, evidently upon the theory that the loss to those continuing to observe the terms of the contract depended in a considerable measure upon the volume of business of the party ceasing to act in unison with the remaining parties. The contract is thus clearly distinguishable from that class of contracts in which an arbitrary sum is to be paid for each day during which the violation of the contract continues. Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. 890; Hansen v. Vallejo Electric, etc., Co., 188 Pac. 999. Nor can it be said of the provisions under consideration, as was said in the case of Nakagawa v. Okamoto, supra, that "the sole design of these provisions was apparently to furnish a club to be used to prevent" a violation of the contract. It is true that in the case of McCord v. Thompson-Starrett Co., 129 App. Div. 130, 113 N. Y. Supp. 385, the sums to be paid in the case of a breach of a contract similar to the one here presented were held to be penalties, and not liquidated damages, but the reason for so holding was that the money was not to be apportioned among the parties to the contract, as here, but was the property of the association created by the contract, which, as such, could suffer no pecuniary loss from the violation of the agreement. Furthermore, provisions in contracts indistinguishable in purport and purpose from that here presented have been held to provide for liquidated damages, and not penalties. Associated Hat Manufacturers v. Baird-Unteidt Co., 88 Conn. 332, 91 Atl. 373; Schrader v. Lillis, 10 Ont. Rep. 358.

[3] Looking to the entire agreement, its scope, purpose, and subject-matter, and considering the result of a breach and the reasonableness of the sums agreed to be paid therefor, it is clear that there was an intent to estimate a just compensation for the loss sustainable in the event of a failure to comply with the agreement.

[4] In this state a contract which attempts to fix the amount of damages in anticipation of a breach of an obligation is void to that extent (Civ. Code, § 1670), except "when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage" (Civ. Code, § 1671). Whether or not the damage would be impracticable or extremely difficult of precise appraisal is largely a question of fact. A provision in a contract which fixes the amount of the damage in advance of a breach is void unless the party seeking to recover the sum agreed upon shows, by pleading and proof, that the provision is within the single exception to the general rule. Long Beach, etc., v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 67 Pac. 499; Los Angeles, etc., Ass'n v. Pacific Surety Co., 24 Cal. App. 95, 140 Pac. 295. The complaint in the case at bar, after enumerating the circumstances wherein plaintiffs sustained loss occasioned by defendants' breach, alleges:

"That at all times, it was, and is impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the amount of damage or loss to plaintiffs or to prove the same."

[5] This allegation, which, of course, is admitted by the demurrer, renders the complaint sufficient for the purpose of bringing the case within the exception provided by section 1671 of the Civil Code. Los Angeles, etc., Ass'n v. Pacific Surety Co., supra. Whether plaintiffs will be able to sustain this allegation by proof is immaterial upon a consideration of the merits of the demurrers.

[6] The appointment of the executive committee to exclusively represent the parties in certain negotiations was not a delegation of the discretionary functions of the directors of each of the corporations so represented, and the execution of the contract was not, therefore, beyond the powers of the respective corporations who were parties thereto. The clause in the contract which creates the executive committee makes this committee, consisting of certain named persons, the agents of the parties to the contract for a period of three years, and gives said committee the full and exclusive power to represent the parties in negotiations involving the subject-matter of the contract. The committee is to act, and the complaint alleges that it did act, "by and with the advice of the parties to the contract," and such advice was to be controlling and conclusive upon the committee when concurred in by three-fourths of the parties to the contract. The modern method of transacting corporate business requires that agents frequently, in cases where action by the board of directors would be impracticable or unfeasible, represent the corporation in dealings requiring the exercise of a great degree of discretion. Fletcher on Corporations, vol. 3, § 1952. In the present case it is not contended that the act which the agent was authorized to perform was beyond the powers of the corporations attempting to delegate the authority. The power delegated was merely the full authority to handle a branch of the corporations' affairs; i. e., the regulation of the conditions of employment. If it was deemed necessary, in order to successfully carry on the business of the corporations, to segregate this subject-matter and place it under the control of a duly authorized agent, there is no material difference between appointing an agent for such a purpose and for other purposes requiring the exercise of discretion. The fact that the committee appointed as agent was composed of representatives of a number of firms, corporations, and individuals does not render the contract unenforceable by reason of attempting a delegation of discretionary powers to a committee of persons not responsible to the stockholders or members. A similar arrangement was held not beyond the power of the corporations participating therein in McCord v. Thompson-Starrett Co. (Sup.) 112 N. Y. Supp. 902. In discussing the question the court there said:

"The plea that it was beyond the corporate power of the Thompson-Starrett Company to vest in any outside body the right to bind it by the regulations adopted by the board of governors merits scant recognition. The agreement with the plaintiff association had reference to the business which, by its charter, the defendant was authorized to conduct. It was designed to facilitate it in its business operations, and to prevent a repetition of the ruinous and hazardous situations with which it had been confronted just prior to the time that it became a member of the association. The act of becoming a member being in itself a lawful one and directly related to its corporate purposes, it seems clear that it did not transcend its powers when it subscribed to the constitution of the association."

Upon appeal the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York recognized as beyond question the power of the corporation to enter into such an agreement and thereby place the control of a part of its business in the hands of a common agent, but reversed the decision upon the ground that the order of the board of governors which had been violated was, in that particular instance, an order against public policy. McCord v. Thompson-Starrett Co., 129 App. Div. 130, 113 N. Y. Supp. 385, affirmed 198 N. Y. 587, 92 N. E. 1090.

[7] The complaint alleges the execution and delivery of the notes, demand for payment, failure and refusal to pay the same, and contains a prayer for judgment thereon. It therefore states a cause of action upon the notes. The complaint also sets forth the contract between the parties and asks the court, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, to distribute the money, after payment, among those to whom the court finds it should go under the contract. While the satisfaction of a legal demand is the basis of the action, and there is, doubtless, a remedy at law by an action upon the notes, the steps necessary to a final and complete adjustment of the rights of the parties include the collection, by the officer designated by the contract, of various sums of money from a number of persons and the disbursement thereof after the respective rights of the several parties in and to the common fund have been determined. The relief, if it is to be effective and complete, may thus involve and include an adjudication of the obligations and duties imposed upon this officer by the contract, as well as an accounting among the parties to the contract. The grounds for the jurisdiction of equity in this case are further strengthened by the fact that a multiplicity of suits would be required if a purely legal remedy were sought, whereas the rights of the parties can be more readily determined in a single action. The reasons for upholding the jurisdiction of equity in this case are similar to those prevailing in the case of Warfield-Howell Co. v. Williamson, 233 Ill. 487, 498, 84 N. E. 706, 710, where the court said:

"There is a legal obligation at the foundation of the suit, but difficulties may arise out of the manner in which the obligation rests upon the persons or property of plaintiffs in error or in the efficiency of the process belonging to the law court which makes the legal remedy inadequate."

An action seeking a judgment for the payment of sums of money into a common fund, together with a decree distributing the fund among the parties entitled thereto, is not an action for the specific performance of the payment of money, and an action of this nature has been upheld in this state. California Raisin Growers' Ass'n v. Abbott, 160 Cal. 601, 117 Pac. 767.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrers with permission to the defendants to answer, if they be so advised, within a designated time.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. SAN PEDRO, L. A. & S. L. R. CO. (L. A. 5254, 5255.)(Supreme Court of California. April 8, 1920.
Rehearing Denied May 6, 1920.)1. Boundaries ☞13—Where lines are intended as meander, the stream or shore is the boundary.

Where the boundary lines as described in the patent were intended as the meander lines of a stream or shore, the actual stream or shore line is the boundary, not the meander line if it departs therefrom.

2. Boundaries ☞14—Where two corners are on stream, boundary is presumed to be the stream.

Where two corners of the tract described are located on a stream and a line is called for extending from one such corner to the other, the stream is the boundary unless there is something which shows the contrary intention of the parties.

3. Navigable waters ☞37(4)—Patent should be construed to exclude lands below high tide.

A patent to shore lands should ordinarily be construed as excluding therefrom the land below the high-tide line which belongs to the state by virtue of its sovereignty in the absence of an express showing to the contrary.

4. Public lands ☞114(1)—Patent construed in favor of government.

A patent to public lands, like every other grant by the sovereign, is construed strongly in favor of the grantor under the rule embodied in Civ. Code, § 1069.

5. Navigable waters ☞37(4)—Patent held to intend conveyance to high-water line, not meandered line.

A patent which described the tract so as to include a bay, but excepted therefrom the portion covered by the navigable waters of the bay "and which are included within the following described lines," was intended to except from the grant all of the bay up to the mean high-tide line, though the lines described did not include within the exception a portion of the bay.

6. Public lands ☞222—Patent, not decree confirming Mexican grant, controls.

A patent excluding from the land described the portion thereof covered by the waters of a bay determines the rights of the parties, though it was issued in pursuance of a decree confirming a Mexican grant which did not mention the exception.

7. Navigable waters ☞37(4)—Patent intending conveyance to water lines controls notwithstanding surveyor's intention to include tidelands.

Where the language of the patent clearly expresses an intention to except from the grant a bay included in the description up to the high-tide line, that intention controls, though the surveyor who ran the lines to describe the exception may have intended not to follow the high-tide line.

8. Navigable waters ☞36(7)—Evidence held to sustain court's findings as to boundaries across tidal estuaries.

In a suit to quiet title to tidelands against the owner of the uplands, evidence held to sustain the trial court's findings as to the location of the headlands at the mouth of tidal estuaries so that its judgment defining the boundary line as that drawn from headland to headland was correct.

Olney, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the City of Los Angeles against the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Halstead J. El. Kelby and Oscar Lawler, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., Clyde M. Leach, Deputy City Atty., and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. These actions were brought by the city of Los Angeles to quiet title to certain tidelands at San Pedro. The state of California, by an act of the state Legislature in 1911, ceded to the city of Los Angeles certain lands held by the state by virtue of its sovereignty in and around the bay of San Pedro. Defendant predicates its right to the lands involved herein upon a United States patent of the San Pedro Rancho. This patent was issued in 1858 and was in confirmation of a Mexican grant prior to the year 1809. The patent contains a description by metes and bounds and has attached thereto a plat. We are concerned in this case only with the proper interpretation of such description and plat. The description in the patent first delimits the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Pedro; such boundaries cross the inner bay of San Pedro and the entrance thereto, thus including within such exterior boundaries a large portion of the inner bay of San Pedro, the balance being contained in the Rancho Palo Verde to the west. The "inner bay of San Pedro" is, however, excepted by a description, the interpretation of which forms the basis of this controversy. All the parcels of the tidelands to which the city seeks to quiet its title lie outside of the lines of the inner bay exception and within the Rancho San Pedro as described in the patent, if the courses and distances of the inner bay exception are treated as boundary lines of such exception and rancho. If, however, the shore line of the bay at mean high tide is the boundary, then the lands are excluded by the inner bay exception, and were therefore reserved to the state, and now belong to the city as trustee for the public.

[1] The sole question, then, for determination by this court is whether or not the lines of the patent defining the inner bay exception are meander lines of the inner bay within the meaning of the rule which makes the shore line of that bay the actual boundary line where the intent is to meander such shore. The law is thus stated in the syllabus to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Jeffries v. East Omaha Land Co., 134 U. S. 178-198, 10 Sup. Ct. 518, 523 (33 L. Ed. 872):

"Meander lines are run in surveying public lands bordering upon navigable rivers, not as boundaries of the tract, but to ascertain the quantity of the land subject to sale; and the water course, and not the meander line, as actually run on the land, is the boundary."

[2] In St. Clair County v. Lovington, 23 Wall. 46-69 (23 L. Ed. 59), it is said:

"It may be considered a canon in American jurisprudence, that where the calls in a conveyance of land are for two corners at, in, or on a stream or its bank, and there is an intermediate line extending from one such corner to the other, the stream is the boundary, unless there is something which excludes the operation of this rule by showing that the intention of the parties was otherwise."

See, also, City of St. Louis v. Rutz, 138 U. S. 226-251, 11 Sup. Ct. 337, 34 L. Ed. 941; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428; Producers Oil Co. v. Hanzen, 238 U. S. 325, 35 Sup. Ct. 755, 59 L. Ed. 1330.

In addition to this rule of interpretation, there are two others which bear upon the situation now under consideration.

[3] The first is that a patent should ordinarily be construed as excluding therefrom land below the high-tide line. The rule is thus stated in Wright v. Seymour, 69 Cal. 122, 10 Pac. 323:

"The lands under water where the tide ebbs and flows belong to the state by virtue of her sovereignty, and in the absence of an express showing to the contrary, it will not be presumed that the government of the United States intended to convey it. * * * We must assume that the government discharged its obligation to the holder of the Mexican title by receiving proof of its character and the land to which it related, and that upon confirmation the patent issued to the claimant is the evidence and only evidence of the extent of the grant, and the terms used in such patent relating to extent and boundaries are subject to like rules of construction with other grants from the government. Had the government found the claimant entitled to the bed and banks of a tidewater stream, we must suppose it would have used in the patent apt words for its conveyance. Not having done so, the presumption is, that it was not intended to convey the bed of the stream."

In Carver v. S. P., L. A. & S. L. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 151 Fed. 334, it is held that a grant from the sovereign of land bounded by the sea or by any navigable tidewater does not pass any title below high-water mark unless the language of the grant or long usage under it clearly indicates that such was the intention.

[4] The other rule of interpretation is a corollary thereto, namely, that every grant by the sovereign is construed strongly in favor of the grantor. The rule is thus stated in our Code, section 1069, Civil Code:

"A grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, except that a reservation in any grant, and every grant by a public officer or body, as such, to a private party, is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor."

This rule of construction was applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 38 L. Ed. 331, where it was said:

"It was argued for the defendants in error that the question presented was a mere question of construction of a grant bounded by tidewater, and would have been the same as it is if the grantor had been a private person. But this is not so. The rule of construction in the case of such a grant from the sovereign is quite different from that which governs private grants. The familiar rule and its chief foundation were felicitously expressed by Sir William Scott: 'All grants of the crown are to be strictly construed against the grantee, contrary to the usual policy of the law in the consideration of grants; and upon this just ground, that the prerogatives and rights and emoluments of the crown being conferred upon it for great purposes, and for the public use, it shall not be intended that such prerogatives, rights and emoluments are diminished by any grant, beyond what such grant by necessary and unavoidable construction shall take away.'"

The controversy here must be determined by the application of these well-established rules of construction to the patent in question. The patent and the accompanying plat are to be construed together. The plat showed the exterior boundaries of the rancho, and within the boundaries of the rancho a body of water marked "Inner Bay of San Pedro (Exception)." Every one of the fifteen stations of the line delimiting this bay appears from the map thereof to be upon the shore line of the bay as such line is drawn upon the plat. The stations of the inner bay exceptions are marked "I. B." Between stations I.B.12 and I.B.16 of the inner bay exception survey the plat shows some land lying within the bay between the shore line and the surveyed lines. The plat not only shows that all the water of the bay is within the excepted area but some of the high land also; whereas, this controversy is based upon the fact, now ascertained and admitted, that the shore line at the places here in controversy lies entirely outside these meander or survey lines. In other words, while the meander lines purport to include the whole of the bay and, in addition, some of the upland; the fact is that the shore line lies outside of the meander lines and the exception lines do not include all the water. The plat under the head of "Traverse of the inner bay of San Pedro to be excluded from survey of the claim" gives a table of the same courses and distances which are used in the description thereof in the patent. Upon the plat is the following statement:

"Area within the exterior lines of the confirmed grant 44,219.72 acres; area within the lines '1' to '16' being the lands covered by the navigable waters of the 'inner bay of San Pedro' connected with the ocean and therefore to be excluded 1,100.59 acres; included in the boundaries specified by the confirmatory decree exclusive of the bay 43,119.13 acres."

Thus the plat, by delineation of the boundaries, and by express exception of the "navigable waters of the inner bay," which because connected with the ocean are "therefore to be excluded," indicates the intention of the government, to exclude from the lands granted the "navigable waters of the inner bay." It would thus appear that it was the intention to except from the patented lands the entire surface of the inner bay. The uncertainty in the case arises from the fact that the plat accompanying the survey does not correctly delineate the shore line of the bay at mean high tide. The description contained in the patent, so far as it relates to the controversy, is as follows:

"Excepting, reserving and excluding from the tract as thus surveyed that portion thereof covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro, and which are included within the following described lines, to wit:

"Beginning at the stake on the high-water line of the inner bay of San Pedro on the line between stations 23 and 24 of the survey of the rancho, and which stake is 212 chains south 7° 32' east from said station number 23."

(1) "Thence according to the true meridian (the variation of magnetic needle being 13° 30' east) along the high-water line of the inner bay of San Pedro, south 80° 45' east 10 chains and 84 links to station."

(2) "Thence south 89° 45' east 9 chains to station."

(3) "Thence north 76° 45' east and 25 chains to station."

(4) "Thence south 77° (and) 45' 8 chains and 90 links to station."

(5) "Thence south 15' west 6 chains and 50 links to station."

(6) "Thence south 72° 15' east 15 chains to station."

(7) "Thence south 68° 15' east 16 chains to station."

(8) "Thence north 24° 45' east 14 chains and 13 links to station."

(9) "Thence north 46° 45' east 11 chains and 50 links to station."

(10) "Thence north 69° 45' east 11 chains 50 links to station."

(11) "Thence north 58° 15' east 16 chains to station."

(12) "Thence south 34° east at 9 chains crosses a slough 4 chains wide, course northeast; 59 chains crosses a slough 3 chains wide, course east and to station at sand hills."

(13) "Thence south 67° west 76 chains and 50 links to station."

(14) "Thence south 34° 45' west 98 chains to station No. 25 of survey of exterior boundaries."

(15) "Thence north 31° 30' west, crossing the channel or entrance to the bay, 19 chains and 44 links to 'La Goleta' exterior boundary, station No. 24."

(16) "Thence north 7° 32' west, crossing the said 'inner bay' 125 chains and 20 links, to the stake 16 on the high-water line of the bay, and commencement of this survey thereof; containing, exclusive of the lands above described as covered by the navigable waters of the 'inner bay of San Pedro' 43,119.13 acres; and being designated upon the plats of the public surveys as lots Nos. 37, 38 and 39 in township 3 south of range 12 west, lot No. 37 in township 3 south of range 13 west, lot No. 37 in township 3 south of range 14 west, lot No. 37 township 4 south of range 13 west, lot No. 37 in township 4 south of range 14 west, lot No. 37 in township 4 south of range 15 west, and lot No. 37 in township 5 south of range 13 west, of San Bernardino Meridian Line."

The various stations in this Inner Bay Exception Survey are known and indicated on the maps in evidence here as "I.B.1," etc., the eleventh call ending with Inner Bay Station 12 or "I.B.12."

[5] Had the description ended with the word "San Pedro" in the following phrase, "Excepting, reserving and excluding from the tract as thus surveyed that portion thereof covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro," the title to the tidelands of the bay would unquestionably be in the plaintiff, for the reason that it is thoroughly established that the term "navigable waters" includes all waters below the high-tide line, and the phrase thus used is equivalent to the statement "that portion thereof covered by the waters of the inner bay of San Pedro at mean high tide." It should be noted that immediately after the foregoing clause and preceding the description by metes and bounds is the following phrase, "and which are included within the following described lines, to wit." The word "and" is significant for the reason that it implies that the former phrase "excepting the navigable waters" is synonymous with the description which followed. Without the word "and" it might be contended that the patent should be construed as though it read, "only that portion of the navigable waters which are included within the following described lines, to wit," etc. The inner bay exception survey begins at a stake on the high-water line of the inner bay of San Pedro, and proceeds, "Thence according to the true meridian along the high-water line of the inner bay of San Pedro" from station to station until the description, "Thence north 31 degrees, 30 minutes, crossing the channel or entrance to the bay," and then again the last course which for 125 chains and 20 links crosses the inner bay "to the stake on the high-water line of the bay and the commencement of the survey thereof." The phrase, "containing, exclusive of the lands above described as covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro," again indicates an intention to exclude from the patent the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro.

The Rancho Palo Verde lies immediately to the west of the Rancho San Pedro, and a portion of the inner bay is included within exterior boundaries of the latter rancho. This fact accounts for the final course which departs from the high-tide line "Thence north 7 degrees, 32 minutes west, crossing said inner bay 125 chains and 20 links to the stake on the high-water line of the bay and the commencement of this survey thereof. * * * (Italics all ours.)

In Spring v. Hewston, 52 Cal. 442, it was said:

"If the initial point of a boundary is the mouth of a creek, and it is described in a conveyance as 'thence ascending the creek,' and several courses and distances are given up the creek, and these courses and distances do not follow, but often diverge from the creek, the true boundary is the creek."

This reasoning applied to the situation involved in this case would make the phrase "thence along the high-tide line" modify and affect every one of the courses and distances from the original point of the inner bay exception and make the high-tide line its true boundary. See, also, Stoll v. Beecher, 94 Cal. 1, 29 Pac. 327. The decision of this court in Freeman v. Bellegarde, 108 Cal. 179, 41 Pac. 289, 49 Am. St. Rep. 76, leads to the same conclusion. There the description was "thence along the margin of the bay (giving four courses and distances) * * * 11 chains to mouth of creek, thence ascending creek (giving thirteen courses, with their distances) * * * N. 45 degrees W., 9 chains 50 links, crossing the creek to the end of the old wall on N. side of marsh." The court said:

"The further call in the mortgage and subsequent conveyances, 'thence ascending said creek,' must prevail over the courses and distances. The creek is the boundary of the land conveyed, and the courses and distances, being only approximate estimates of the direction and length of the boundary, must yield to the actual line of the creek. When a meandering stream is a boundary it is impracticable for a surveyor to fix monuments in the channel of the water, or to define the actual line of its windings and courses; and in attempting to define its banks it would be impossible for two surveyors to give the courses and lengths of its several meanders alike."

The patent of the San Pedro Rancho has already been before this court and before the Supreme Court of the United States. De Guyer v. Banning, 91 Cal. 400, 27 Pac. 761; Id., 167 U. S. 723, 17 Sup. Ct. 937, 42 L. Ed. 340. The question involved was as to the ownership of Mormon Island within the inner bay exception. It was there contended that the decree of confirmation and the patent granted this land to the patentees. This controversy was first decided by this court in favor of the claim of the patentees, but subsequently on rehearing it was held that the patentees were bound by the terms of the patent, and the island therefore did not pass to the patentees. This decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is therefore now conceded by the parties to this action that the patent controls the rights of the parties. The question litigated in the case of De Guyer v. Banning, supra, did not involve the exact question now before us. The statements in the opinions of the Supreme Court of this state and of the United States relating to the "inner bay exception," although obiter dicta, are very persuasive as to the meaning of the patent. It is stated (167 U. S. 735, 17 Sup. Ct. 941, 42 L. Ed. 340):

"The map which accompanied and was made part of the patent of 1858 shows the exterior lines of the survey made under the decree of confirmation. Those lines include the whole of the inner bay of San Pedro. The map also shows the exterior lines of the bay itself. But across that part of the map which designates the bay are the words 'Inner Bay of San Pedro (Exception).' And, as already stated, the map has on its face not only a table showing the exterior lines of the entire boundary run by the surveyor general, but a table of courses and distances, under the heading 'Traverse of inner bay of San Pedro to be excluded from survey of the claim.' It is not disputed that Mormon Island is within the exterior lines of this inner bay, and is almost covered with water at high tide. That the part excluded or excepted from the survey embraced the navigable waters of the inner bay cannot be doubted. Was it not also intended to exclude Mormon Island, which, according to the opinion of the court below on the original hearing, consisted, at high water, 'of a pile of rocks, covering not much more than an acre'? This question was answered in the negative by the Supreme Court of California, which, on the rehearing of the case, said: 'The remaining question is, whether the land in controversy is included within the exception; and, as to this, we entertain no doubt that the exception properly construed embraces all the lands within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro, as shown on the map accompanying the patent and is not confined simply to such land as is covered by the navigable waters of that bay. That this is the true meaning of the exception is made to appear not only from the fact that the inner bay of San Pedro is marked "excepted" upon the map referred to, but is also conclusively shown by the concluding portion of the survey itself, as returned and certified, in which, after giving the boundaries of the land surveyed by courses and distances, it designates the land surveyed, "exclusive of the lands above described as covered by the navigable waters of the inner bay of San Pedro," as being certain numbered lots on the plats of the public survey, neither of which lots includes any portion of the land within the exterior boundaries of the inner bay of San Pedro, as marked on said map.' We entirely concur in that view." 167 U. S. 739, 17 Sup. Ct. 943, 42 L. Ed. 340. "If the claimants under the decree of confirmation did not themselves present the survey to the General Land Office, and ask a patent in accordance therewith, they accepted a patent based upon that survey, and plainly showing that it conformed to a survey that did not embrace, for the purposes of a patent, anything within the exterior lines of the inner bay of San Pedro." (Italics ours.)

The patent as thus interpreted excluded not only all lands within the inner bay covered by navigable water, but all lands within the exterior boundaries of said bay. If we follow this interpretation in the present case, it necessitates the affirmance of the judgment, for it is not disputed that all the lands claimed by the plaintiff lie below the navigable waters of the inner bay.

A course of the inner bay exception survey was involved in the case of Wheatley v. San Pedro, etc., Ry., 169 Cal. 505, 147 Pac. 135. It was there held that the shore line was the boundary (see map, 169 Cal. 508, 147 Pac. 136), but as to all calls to station I.B.12, including the foregoing, the defendant concedes that the shore line is the real boundary, but contends that the last three lines are not meander lines; that all the land outside of these lines is owned by the defendant as successor to the patentee, regardless of the fact that some of it lies below the line of the mean high tide; for the reason that by a patent issued in pursuance of a Mexican grant the tidelands therein pass to the grantee. This contention involves a consideration of the actual shore line as shown by later surveys, and is largely based upon the fact that such survey shows so wide a departure from the courses and distances of the inner bay exception as to demonstrate that such lines were intended as arbitrary boundaries rather than meander lines of the shore. A further statement of facts will be necessary to present and discuss the defendant's position. Parcels "C" and "B" lie east of the line connecting I.B.12 and I.B.13 (the line marked 12 on the plat) and contain, respectively, 3.42 acres and 30.29 acres. Parcel "A" lies to the south of line 13 (I.B.13 to I.B.14), and contains 229.73 acres. The plane of mean high tide is 5.1 feet above the plane of mean low tide. Maps of the inner bay were made in 1857, 1858, 1883, 1899, 1908. During each of these surveys parcels "A," "B," and "C" were in their natural condition. A comparison of the different topographical surveys shows that there had been little change in the bay during all this period.

From I.B.13 to I.B.14 the course is from six inches to one foot below the level of ordinary high tide.

Nearly the entire East Basin lying east of Mormon Island, including parcel "A," lies under water from 6 inches to a foot at ordinary high tide. Parcel "C," a shallow bight, is covered by water, in the main from 1 foot to 1½ deep. At high tide the water is deeper over parcel "B" than over parcel "C."

Southerly from station I.B.12 the survey followed for several hundred feet practically along the 5.1 foot contour line, until the first slough called for between those points is approached. After crossing, the line again practically follows the line of ordinary high tide for some distance, when it leaves the line of high tide, and crosses the southeast portion of the bay, to I.B.13. This station is 1.1 feet below high-tide line. From I.B.13 to I.B.14 the line leaves the high-tide line and crosses ground covered at mean high tide by water from six inches to a foot or more in depth at ordinary high tide. Station I.B.14 is about 4.5 feet below ordinary high tide. From I.B.14 to I.B.15 the line for about 3,000 feet runs through still deeper water, between 1 to 3½ feet below mean high tide. Parcel "A" is nearly 2 miles in length along the line I.B.13 to I.B.15, and nearly 2,000 feet in width. It is a shallow portion of the bay itself. Around "C" and "B" there is a comparatively abrupt rise of 1.1 feet.

Parcels "O" and "P" are clearly parts of the bay and of San Pedro channel. The survey, upon leaving station I.B.12 at 9 chains, crosses a slough 4 chains wide, course north-east, and at 59 chains crosses a slough 3 chains wide, course east. It is clear that the surveyor did not intend to follow the high-tide line of these sloughs, which extended for long distances beyond the lines of the inner bay survey. From these facts the defendant deduces the conclusion that at I.B.12 it was the intent to make an arbitrary boundary line rather than to follow the meanderings of the shore line at high tide. In considering the survey however, it should be borne in mind that the surrounding land to the east and south was so nearly level that a rise of a foot in the tide would, in some places, advance the shore line a mile, and in other places the land was even more nearly level. In legal contemplation, the bay may always be said to extend to the mean high-tide level; as a matter of fact, the actual water line is constantly changing, and perhaps the mean high-tide level, as now so definitely and accurately determined, may have been unknown in 1858 when the survey for the patent was made.

The following statement by the Supreme Court of the United States in Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 406, 11 Sup. Ct. 819, 840, 35 L. Ed. 442, is particularly applicable to the lines under consideration:

"The difficulty of following the edge or margin of such projections, and all the various sinuosities of the water line, is the very occasion and cause of running the meander line, which, by its exclusions and inclusions of such irregularities of contour produces an average result closely approximating to the truth as to the quantity of upland contained in the fractional lots bordering on the lake or stream."

In this survey, for the purpose of defining the patent boundary of the Mexican grant, the surveyor is not concerned with the question as to the amount of land contained within the patent boundaries as the basis of fixing the contract price. The amount of land granted, however, was $8\frac{1}{2}$ leagues, and this was an important element in fixing the boundaries thereof. The appellant contends that the area of the inner bay exception, conforming as it does to the traverse lines shown upon the plat and in the patent, tends strongly to confirm its position that the traverse lines of the inner bay exception were intended to be the boundary lines and not meander lines. This coincidence, however, was to be expected as the government rules of survey provide for such method of computation, and therefore the statement of the area of 1,100.19 acres for the inner bay exception adds nothing to the delineation of the boundaries, shown by the patent.

[6] It is suggested that, as the decree confirming the Rancho San Pedro made no exception of the inner bay, the unauthorized exception thereof ought not to be further extended by construction. This suggestion is not in accord with the decision of De Guyer v. Banning, supra, which holds that the patent boundaries are conclusive upon both the patentee and the United States. It is perhaps worthy of note that the decree confirming title in the patentee, and subsequently made the basis for the issuance of the patent, stated that the land thus confirmed to the petitioners contained $8\frac{1}{2}$ leagues more or less. As a league contains 4,340.278 acres (U. S. v. Perot, 98 U. S. 428, 431, 432, 25 L. Ed. 251), the decree called for 36,892.363 acres. The patent recites that the claimant petitioned for confirmation of a ranch containing "ten leagues more or less" (43,420.78 acres), and had confirmed to them "eight leagues and a half more or less." The actual area conveyed to them, exclusive of the inner bay exception, is stated in the patent to be 43,119.13 acres, or only 283.65 acres less than the 10 leagues claimed and 6,610.42 acres more than confirmed to the patentees ($8\frac{1}{2}$ leagues). We do not, however, attach any importance to this point.

The case of Producers' Oil Co. v. Hanzen, 238 U. S. 325, 35 Sup. Ct. 755, 59 L. Ed. 1330, is very much relied upon by the appellant because it is there held that the line run by the government surveyor, although purporting to be a meander line of a bayou, actually excluded from the survey portion of the high land between the meander lines and the bayou. There the cases stating the rule applicable are thus summed up:

"They unquestionably support the familiar rule relied on by counsel for the oil company that in general meanders are not to be treated as boundaries and when the United States conveys a tract of land by patent referring to an official plat which shows the same bordering on a navigable river the purchaser takes title up to the water line. But they no less certainly establish the principle that facts and circumstances may be examined and if they affirmatively disclose an intention to limit the grant to actual traverse lines these must be treated as definite boundaries. It does not necessarily follow from the presence of meanders that a fractional section borders a body of water and that a patent thereto confers riparian rights."

The facts upon which the court distinguishes Producers' Oil Co. v. Hanzen, supra, from those cases holding that the shore line and not the meander lines in a patent constitute the boundary lines of the land patented are thus stated in the opinion:

"In the instant case we find a survey [by Bristol] of improved lands made at the express request of the occupant to whom they were subsequently patented; a grant from the United States specifying the exact number of acres conveyed; a positive declaration in field notes that land to the north [i. e., between the traverse line and the bayou] lies outside the traverse lines; admission that excluded area contains not less than 40 acres of high ground, and evidence of large timber growing there; official plat delineating the surveyor's courses and specifying the acreage of the several subdivisions, which cannot be said to indicate a water boundary beyond possible question. Outside the southern traverses of this plat, in space designated 'Open Lake,' lie 300 acres of fast land surveyed by Barbour in 1896. Although Noel, the oil company's immediate vendor, as owner, was in possession of property known as Wilson's Point place for some 30 years, and until after alleged unlawful entry by defendants in error, his corporeal possession (as expressly stipulated) was limited east and north by the Bristol traverse lines and he never occupied or exercised any act of corporeal possession over the above-indicated 40 acres or more without the same."

In that case, a successor of the United States government claiming under a mineral location was contesting the validity and extent of the patent, and the above rules of construction required that the description in the patent should be most strongly construed against the patentee and in favor of the government and its successors. In the case at bar that same rule works against the contention of the appellant, for here the city succeeding to the rights of the government is seeking to establish its claim to land lying between the meander lines and the shore line. There the patentee was trying to maintain title to the land between the meander line and the shore line.

[7] In considering the relation of the actual shore line to the meander line of the inner bay exception, much stress is laid, in appellant's brief, upon the intention of the surveyor. We are, however, not concerned with the intention of the surveyor who made the survey on the ground. The plat of his survey, with the field notes, were submitted to the United States Land Office at Washington by the United States Surveyor General at San Francisco, with the following certificate of approval:

"The field notes of the 'Rancho San Pedro' and from which this map has been made out have been examined and approved and are on file in this office. United States Surveyor General's Office, San Francisco, California. February 19, 1858. J. W. Mandeville, United States Surveyor General for California."

—and such plat thereafter filed in the General Land Office at Washington, D. C., and made a part of the patent. When we have determined that the patent and plat attached thereto on their face purport to meander the line of high tides of the inner bay exception, it follows that the grant should be so construed, in favor of the government, notwithstanding the fact that the surveyor, in making a survey on the ground, may have included within the exterior boundaries of the Rancho San Pedro tidelands which should have been more carefully delimited by the meander lines of the inner bay exception, and thus excepted from the grant. In other words, if the patent and plat on their face show an intention to meander the shore line of the inner bay, the latter is the proper boundary, where the effect of following the meander lines as boundary lines would be to convey tidelands from the government to the patentee. All the foregoing considerations compel the conclusion that the mean high-tide line of San Pedro bay is the boundary between the land conveyed and the land retained by the government, and that therefore the claim of the plaintiff to the tidelands as successors of the government is valid.

[8] In anticipation of this possible construction of the patent, appellant contends that in any event parcels "C" and "B" should be excluded from the inner bay exception, because included in the mouths of estuaries tributary to the bay and that the surveyor crossed the same as required by law and by good surveying practice. The following statements in Knight v. United States Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974, are relied upon, to wit:

"Where a water of a larger dimension is intersected by a water of a smaller dimension, the line of measurement of the first crosses the latter at the points of junction, from headland to headland. The existence of tidelands in the intersecting water in no respect affects the result."

"In determining a boundary line stated as the line of 'ordinary high-water mark,' on the bay of San Francisco, there can be no other course than to follow the stated line of ordinary high tide on the shore of the bay, crossing the mouths of all inferior tidal streams or estuaries, many of which enter into San Francisco bay at different points, and not to follow the meanders of any such inferior tidal streams or estuaries."

See, also, Bolsa Land Co. v. Burdick et al., 151 Cal. 254, 260, 90 Pac. 532, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275.

It is true that the course I.B.12 crosses two sloughs, one extending east and the other northeast. But in determining the proper point of crossing, if we follow the shore line to such slough or estuary, the point of crossing is the intersection of such shore line and such estuary to a corresponding point on the opposite bank. For this purpose we assume the bay to be filled with water to the mean high-tide line. The application of this principle to the lines of the bay at high tide is not free from difficulty. The banks of the northernmost channel are clearly defined and the line of intersection with shore of the bay clearly indicated. By crossing the channel diagonally from point to point parcel "C" is included in the bay.

Parcel "B" contains a total area of 47.41 acres but within the exterior boundaries thereof are four parcels of land indicated on the diagram as parcels "I," "J," "K," and "L," containing 41.31, .97, .86, and .98 acres, respectively. Parcel "I" is separated from the balance of the Rancho San Pedro and from the other parcels by channels and mud flats which form a "shoreshoe." The channel to the north of parcel "I" at low tide dwindles to a few feet and at high tide is five or six hundred feet wide along the line I.B.; thence narrows to two or three hundred feet wide and expands to five or six hundred feet. The channel to the south of parcel "I" is somewhat deeper and more uniform in width. Perplexing as it appears to locate the high-tide line of the bay as distinguished from the high-tide line of the estuaries flowing into the bay, we think the presumption in favor of the government and against the patentee sufficiently supports the finding of the trial court with reference to the high-tide line of the bay, and therefore as to the ownership of parcel "B."

In view of the interpretation of the patent adopted by the trial court and hereby affirmed, the various assignments of error in the admission of testimony become immaterial and need not be specially noted, such as the testimony of witness D. E. Hughes to the effect that in his opinion the lines I.B.13, I.B.14, and I.B.15 were ascertained by triangulation and not actually surveyed upon the ground.

Judgments affirmed.

OLNEY, J. I concur in the major portion of the main opinion, but dissent from that portion which upholds the judgment of the lower court in its finding that title to all of parcel "B" is in the city. In my opinion, it very clearly appears from the evidence, from the original patent map, and from maps introduced by the city itself, that the high-tide line of the waters of the bay is intersected by inferior tidal streams or sloughs, and that the boundary line of parcel "B," as found by the court, runs up these sloughs instead of crossing them as it should have done under the rule of Knight v. United Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974, and Bolsa Land Co. v. Burdick, 151 Cal. 254, 90 Pac. 532, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275.

PEOPLE v. SOMSKY. (Cr. 880.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 28, 1920.)

1. Criminal law — §881(1) — Verdict sufficient though not stating defendant was guilty as charged.

Verdict, "We, the jury, find the defendant (naming him) guilty of felony, to wit, forgery," held sufficient, though omitting words "as charged in the information."

2. Forgery — §7(2) — False certification of check constitutes "forgery"; "bill of exchange"; "acceptance."

Defendant who forged certification of a check in the name of a bank, signed by its cashier, a check being a "bill of exchange" under Civ. Code, § 3254, was guilty of "forgery"; certification by authorized officers constituting "acceptance" by a bank, and Pen. Code, § 470, expressly making the forgery of an acceptance of a bill of exchange a crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Acceptance; Bill of Exchange; Forgery.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Theodore Somsky was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

George Appell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Roridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment based on a verdict of conviction of the defendant upon the charge of forgery.

The appellant's first contention is that the verdict of the jury was insufficient in form to support the judgment appealed from. The information charged the defendant with the commission of "the crime of felony, to wit, forgery committed as follows." It then proceeded to set forth in detail that the defendant did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, falsely, fraudulently, and with intent to prejudice, damage, and defraud the Bank of Italy, make, alter, forge, and counterfeit a certain indorsement and certification, to wit, "Certified 12/5 1917, Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, W. O. Tarry, Cashier, $3,800.00," upon a certain check (setting the same forth in detail), and did then and there with the same fraudulent and felonious intent utter, publish, and pass the same as true and genuine to the said Bank of Italy, contrary, etc. The verdict of the jury read as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant, Theodore Somsky, guilty of felony, to wit, forgery." The defendant's contention is that this verdict, in order to be sufficient to support the judgment, should either have contained the words "as charged in the information," or should have sufficiently set forth the language of the information to identify the particular act of forgery of which the defendant was found guilty.

[1] This contention in either aspect has no merit. The addition of the words "as charged in the information," while frequently and appropriately found in verdicts, would not add anything to such a verdict as that in the instant case, which in itself identifies a particular statutory crime. It has in fact been held that a verdict which omits the specification of the particular crime, but merely finds the defendant guilty "as charged in the information," would be an insufficient verdict. People v. Mitchell, 92 Cal. 590, 28 Pac. 597, 788. It would seem to follow that the omission of these words from a verdict which did in itself identify the particular statutory crime of which the defendant was found guilty would not vitiate such a verdict.

The cases cited by the appellant in support of his contention are clearly to be distinguished from the case at bar. In each of them the defendant was charged with the doing of acts constituting a crime, but which crime outside of said acts had no specific definition in the statute; such as "obtaining money under false pretenses," or "receiving stolen property," and the like. In such cases the statute does not define the crime except as the specially forbidden acts define it, and hence a verdict would be insufficient which neither referred to the information nor contained a recital of the inhibited acts of which the defendant was found guilty. But in the case of forgery the statute in a word specifies and defines the crime, and hence it is sufficient in the verdict to so specify and define it.

[2] The only other contention of the appellant is that the information is insufficient in charging the defendant with the certification of a check, his claim being that section 470 of the Penal Code does not expressly designate the certification of a check as being the subject of forgery. The information sets forth the precise language of the certification which the defendant is alleged to have forged, including the name of the cashier of the bank executing the same, and alleged that the said certification was indorsed upon the check drawn upon said bank, which check is also set forth in full. A check is a "bill of exchange" under section 3254 of the Civil Code. A certification of a check by the authorized officers of the particular bank upon which it is drawn constitutes an "acceptance" thereof on the part of the bank which binds it to pay the amount called for by the check upon presentation for payment. The forging of an acceptance of a bill of exchange is expressly made a crime under section 470, Penal Code. It follows that an information which specifically charges the forging of such a certification as is set forth in this information sufficiently accuses the defendant of the statutory crime of forgery.

HOUGHTON v. KUEHNRIK. (Civ. 2075.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, May 6, 1920.)

4. Brokers ⇨54—Entitled to commissions on producing purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy.

Unless there is a provision in the contract to the contrary, a real estate broker, employed to negotiate a sale of land, earns his commission, and it is payable, when he produces within the time allowed a purchaser who is ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms prescribed, or with whom the owner enters into a contract on other terms satisfactory to him.

2. Brokers ⇨63(2)—Where owner exercised option to refuse to exchange property, broker, who brought parties together, not entitled to commission.

Where a contract for the exchange of lands, providing for payment of commissions to the broker negotiating the same, gave defendant the option of canceling the agreement within a fixed time, and defendant exercised such option, the broker, whose rights to commissions depend wholly on the contract, cannot recover, notwithstanding another clause of the agreement provided that, if for any cause principals should fail to comply with contract, party at fault should pay the broker for commissions; such clause obviously having reference to a failure of title or the like.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by W. H. Houghton against P. Max Kuehnrich. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, defendant having been granted a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order granting new trial affirmed.

McKinley & McKinley and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell & Mathews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. Plaintiff sued defendant for $4,000 real estate commission for procuring one Ralph Granger to assent to the terms of an agreement for exchange of real estate, which was drawn by defendant's attorney. The cause was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict for $4,000 in favor of the plaintiff. The trial court granted defendant's motion for a new trial, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The pleadings admit that the defendant executed and delivered a certain instrument, which is set forth in paragraph I of the complaint, and which appears to be an agreement for the exchange of real property between the defendant, P. Max Kuehnrich, as party of the first part, and Ralph Granger, as party of the second part. It was stated in said agreement that the party of the first part therein (the defendant herein) was the owner of certain property in Los Angeles (describing it), which he desired to exchange for certain real property in Brooklyn, N. Y. (describing it), owned by Ralph Granger, the party of the second part therein. The terms upon which the defendant was willing to exchange his property for the property of Granger are therein set forth in detail. The agreement bears date of October 28, 1915, and contains the following paragraphs:

"It is understood, however, that the first party [Kuehnrich] shall have 17 days from and after the 28th day of October, 1915, within which to inspect said property of second party, and that first party, if not satisfied therewith, may at any time during said period cancel and terminate this agreement. W. H. Houghton [plaintiff herein] are hereby authorized to act as my agents in negotiating an exchange, and I agree that, if they shall secure an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above-described properties on the above terms, I will within 2 days furnish a certificate of title or abstract from a competent searcher of titles, together with a deed of bargain and sale, conveying a good and sufficient title to the property above mentioned, except as aforesaid.

* * * It is further understood and agreed that if, for any reason whatever, either or all principals to this agreement shall fail to comply with same, and in consequence this exchange shall fail of consummation, then the parties or party at fault for such failure hereby agrees to pay W. H. Houghton the full commission for both sides, together with attorney and escrow charges.

"It is further agreed with W. H. Houghton that, when they have received an acceptance to exchange the above properties on above mentioned terms, I will pay them the sum of $2,500 as commission for such service, irrespective of any commission paid by the other party."

This agreement was signed by Kuehnrich, the defendant herein, and witnessed by H. B. Mathews. Immediately following their signatures is written the following:

"This agreement witnesseth that I, Ralph Granger, of San Diego, owner of the second herein described piece of property, hereby accept the proposition of exchange made therein upon the terms stated, and agree to furnish a certificate of title or abstract from a competent searcher of title within 22 days, showing property vested as described, and to furnish a good and sufficient deed of conveyance as directed. I agree to pay to W. H. Houghton the sum of $1,500 commissions for services rendered. Dated Oct. 28th, 1915.

"[Signed] Ralph Granger,

"By W. H. Houghton, Agent.

"W. B. Mathews, Witness."

W. H. Houghton was not authorized by any instrument in writing to sign Mr. Granger's name to the above paper. He talked with him over the telephone, and was told by him to execute the contract, and it was upon this telephonic authorization that he signed Mr. Granger's name.

Within 17 days after October 15, 1915, Kuehnrich, the party of the first part in said agreement, sent to Mr. Granger, at San Diego, a telegram worded as follows:

"You are notified that I am not satisfied with your property known as Clinton Apartments in borough of Brooklyn, New York City, described in our agreement of exchange dated October twenty-eighth and hereby cancel and terminate said agreement.

It is to be stated that plaintiff is not a party to any of the above documents. His name appears on the exchange agreement, not as a party thereto, but simply as agent for Mr. Granger for the purpose of signing his name thereto. He had no independent contract for the payment to him of a commission for making the exchange. His right to any compensation was dependent upon and inseparably bound up with the agreement of exchange, which contained a cancellation clause for the benefit of the defendant. After the cancellation of the contract by the defendant, Houghton sued Kuehnrich for $4,000 as broker's compensation, being $2,500 claimed as due on Kuehnrich's promise and $1,500 due on Granger's promise. As stated, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and on motion of the defendant the court set aside the verdict of the jury and granted a new trial.

Respondent attempts to justify the action of the court in granting the motion for a new trial upon several grounds. We do not deem it necessary, in disposing of the case, to enter into a discussion of all of them. We think that upon the merits of the case, as drawn from a construction of the written contract of exchange, coupled with the proved facts, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

[1] The circumstances under which a broker is entitled to his compensation for finding a purchaser of real estate is thus stated by the appellate court in Stewart v. Bowie, 185 Pac. 868:

"Unless there is a provision in the contract to the contrary, a real estate broker, employed to negotiate a sale of land, earns his commission, and it is payable when he produces, within the time allowed, a purchaser who is ready, able, and willing to take the property on the terms prescribed, or with whom the owner enters into a contract upon those or other terms satisfactory to him."

[2] We are of opinion that this case must be governed by the principles announced in cases like Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 338, 160 Pac. 576, and Brion v. Cahill, 34 Cal. App. 262, 165 Pac. 704. In the latter case it appeared that the defendant and one Krummes entered into a written contract of exchange of their respective properties, and in the same contract and as a part of it, over the signature of the defendant, was written:

"And I further agree to pay to P. A. Brion, as agent, the sum of $1,000 for services rendered, for such services."

The exchange was not consummated, owing to the fact that Krummes had no title to the property he agreed to convey. Upon suit brought by the broker, judgment was rendered in his favor. We find the following language used in the course of the opinion of the appellate court, in reversing the judgment:

"In support of the judgment the respondent relies upon a line of authorities holding that a real estate broker, employed to sell real property, has earned his compensation when he has produced a purchaser able and willing to take the property on the terms proposed, or who has been accepted by his principal as such purchaser by entering into a contract with him. In the latter event those authorities hold that the ability of the purchaser to carry out his contract is immaterial to the right of the broker to receive compensation from his principal."

And in the same case, quoting from Jennings v. Jordan, supra, the opinion continues:

"The object of the contract actually entered into was to provide for an exchange of the properties of the parties thereto, each agreeing to convey title free of incumbrances, and the provision therein for the payment of a commission to Eppinger must be construed in its relation to the whole contract. * * * Unless and until the exchange was consummated, the parties would receive no benefit from Eppinger's efforts; and, as we have seen, there was no obligation existing to pay Eppinger anything, except that arising from the written agreement under consideration. The provision relating to such payment is not separable from the remainder of the contract; and certainly as to Jordan when the other party to it found himself unable to comply with its terms and consented to its cancellation (Jordan already having a right to rescind it), the whole contract fell, the provision relating to Eppinger's compensation with the rest."

These cases are referred to in Stewart v. Bowie, 185 Pac. 868, as follows:

"In such cases [referring to Jennings v. Jordan and Brion v. Cahill, supra] the broker, not having the protection of the ordinary broker's contract for compensation for services to be performed, must stand or fall by the contract actually entered into; and, if he has seen fit to allow the payment of his compensation to be dependent upon the performance of a contract made between other parties than himself, he cannot complain if through the nonperformance of that contract his own contingent right be lost."

The case at bar is very much stronger in favor of respondent's position than either the Jennings or Brion Cases. In neither of those cases did the contract give to either party the privilege, as does the contract here, of terminating it within a specified time. In both of those cases the exchange was not consummated because one party to the contract had not a good title to convey, and the contracts were either abandoned or rescinded for that reason. In the case at bar the exchange was not consummated because the defendant, availing himself of an express provision of the contract, gave notice before the time fixed by the contract for so doing that the contract was terminated and annulled. The exact language was: "I hereby cancel and terminate said agreement." The provision of said agreement for the payment of a compensation to plaintiff was an integral part of it, and when the contract was canceled and terminated all its provisions were canceled and terminated, including the provision for plaintiff's benefit. The only contract that ever existed providing a compensation for plaintiff having ceased to exist, he is in court without any contract to support his claim, and cannot recover.

Counsel for appellant rely upon the case of Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 Pac. 254, to sustain their position upon the point now under discussion. The agreement in that case between the owner of the property for an exchange was quite similar to the one in this case; but there is the material distinction between the two, in that the contract there considered contained no provision, like the one in this contract, that the party had the option to cancel the same within a specified time—to cancel the entire contract. When such option was exercised, it occurs to us the plaintiff's right to compensation no longer existed.

The case of Ketcham v. Axelson, 160 Iowa, 456, 142 N. W. 62, also relied upon by appellant, is clearly distinguishable from this case, in that in the Axelson Case plaintiff had an independent broker's contract, good under the laws of Iowa, in and by which it was agreed that he would be paid $170 if he would secure a party who would exchange property with the defendant at such figure as would be satisfactory to the defendant. The plaintiff procured a party who entered into a binding written contract with the defendant for an exchange of lands on terms satisfactory to the defendant. It is true the contract of exchange contained a clause that defendant might cancel it before a certain date. The parties, after entering into a mutually binding agreement, had some misunderstandings, a lawsuit and finally released each other from the contract of exchange. The contract was not canceled by the party exercising the privilege of cancellation therein contained. It was correctly held that the agent was entitled to his compensation. He had fully performed his contract. He had procured a party ready and willing to exchange properties on terms satisfactory to the defendant, and they had entered into a binding written contract of exchange. The plaintiff's contract for compensation antedated the exchange agreement. His compensation was not provided for therein, nor referred to. He brought the parties together, and they made their own contract. His compensation was not contingent upon anything either party to the contract might thereafter do, or fail to do. His contract for compensation, not being a part of the exchange contract, was in no way affected by its terms or by subsequent mutual cancellation. The court said:

"The right of the agent to his commission is in no way affected by the conduct of his principal to which he has not consented subsequent to the execution of the contract of sale."

Appellants call attention to a clause in the exchange agreement wherein it is agreed that if, for any cause, either of the landowners should fail to comply with its terms, and in consequence the exchange should fail, the party or parties at fault should pay the plaintiff his full commissions, and claim that this clause secures him a right of recovery. Obviously this has no reference to the contract becoming unenforceable between the parties by reason of its cancellation by the defendant, acting within the rights given him by the terms of the contract. Each party had agreed to do certain things, such as to give certificates or abstracts of title, to execute certain mortgages, to execute deeds conveying title, etc. Either one, or both, might neglect to do some or all of these things, and as a result no exchange of properties be made, and the clause refers to such contingencies. Neither party could be said to be in "fault" when simply doing or omitting to do the very things which the contract specifies he might do or not do.

As we are of the opinion a fair construction of the terms of the contract, viewed in connection with what transpired, leads to the conclusion the plaintiff has not a right of recovery, it follows that upon this ground alone the court was justified in granting the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The order granting a new trial is hereby affirmed.

HAYWARD et al. v. BLACK. (Civ. 3243.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 6, 1920.)

Quieting title  15—Agent cannot counterclaim for commissions in principal's action to quiet title.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 437, 438, in action to quiet title, defendant, who expressly denied he claimed any interest in plaintiff's land, could not present a counterclaim for commissions earned as agent for plaintiff in making sale of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by William R. Hayward and another against George A. Black. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Benton, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action to quiet title. The complaint is in two counts, in the first of which the plaintiffs, after alleging themselves to be the owners in fee simple and possessed of the tract of land involved in the action, allege that the defendant, George A. Black, claims some interest in said parcel of land adverse to the ownership of plaintiffs, which claim is without right, and the defendant has no right, title, or interest in or to any part of said premises. The second count adopts the above averments of the first count, and then proceeds to set forth two instruments in writing, which, being recorded, are alleged to be a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title. The first of these is termed an "agency agreement," wherein the plaintiffs purport to authorize and employ said defendant to act as their agent in negotiating a sale of said property. This agreement purports to be signed with the names of the plaintiffs, by one Archie Hood, as agent, and by said defendant. The other agreement is one purporting to be made by the plaintiffs, through said defendant, acting as their agent under the prior agreement, with one J. G. Gardner for an exchange of certain property of the latter for the said property of the plaintiffs upon certain terms. The plaintiffs allege that neither of them ever authorized said Archie Hood, or the said defendant, or any other person, to sign their names, or the name of either of them, to either of said agreements, and that both of said agreements are void. Wherefore the plaintiffs pray that their title be quieted as against said defendant.

The defendant demurred to the sufficiency of this complaint, which demurrer was overruled, and he thereupon filed an answer and counterclaim, to which the plaintiffs demurred, and which demurrer the trial court sustained. Thereupon the defendant presented an amended answer and counterclaim, wherein he expressly denied that he claimed any interest whatever in the lands of the plaintiffs, but in respect to the second cause of action alleged certain facts tending to show that he had been created the agent of the plaintiffs by virtue of the first agreement set up in said second cause of action, and that by virtue of such agency he had entered into the agreement with said Gardner set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint, and had thereby become entitled to a real estate agent's commission, amounting to $700, for having produced said Gardner as a purchaser of the plaintiffs' said premises under said agreements, for which amount he prayed judgment against said plaintiffs. Plaintiffs also demurred to this amended answer and so-called counterclaim, and upon hearing said demurrer the trial court sustained the same without leave to amend, and thereupon proceeded to take testimony and make its findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon in favor of the plaintiffs, quieting their title as against said defendant. From the decree entered in accordance therewith the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The only contention of the appellant discussed in his briefs upon this appeal is his contention that under and by virtue of sections 437 and 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure he was entitled to present in this action to quiet title a counterclaim for his commission claimed to have been earned under and by virtue of the two agreements set forth in the second count of the plaintiffs' complaint. Section 437 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the answer of the defendant shall contain (2) a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim. Section 438 thereof provides that—

"The counterclaim mentioned in the last section must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of one of the following causes of action: (1) A cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; (2) in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action arising also upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action."

It will at once be seen that the defendant's contention that he is entitled to present a counterclaim in this action cannot be predicated upon the second subdivision of said section 438 above set forth, since this is not an action arising upon contract, but is a suit in equity, founded upon the plaintiffs' claim of title to the lands in question. The defendant's contention must therefore be confined to the first subdivision of said section, and he must be able to show in it authority for the filing of such a counterclaim as he has set forth in his answer herein in an action to quiet title. It is clear, both upon reason and authority, that this he cannot do. The foundation of the plaintiffs' claim is their asserted ownership of and title to the premises described in their complaint. Whatever cause of action the defendant might have for commissions cannot be said to arise out of the plaintiffs' title to and ownership of said premises, and cannot be said to be in any way connected with the subject of the action, which is the plaintiffs' right to have their title quieted against any asserted adverse claim on the part of the defendant. The defendant by his answer asserts no adverse claim, but, on the contrary, denies that he makes any adverse claim to the plaintiffs' premises. It therefore follows that he was not entitled to assert his so-called counterclaim in this action.

The authorities fully support this view. In the case of Engelbrechtsen v. Gay, 158 Cal. 27, 109 Pac. 879, which was an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, the Supreme Court held that the defendant could not assert by way of either cross-complaint or counterclaim a claim for damages for a trespass alleged to have been committed by the contractor foreclosing said lien through his having wrongfully piled dirt upon the abutting property of the defendant. In the case of Meyer v. Quiggle, 140 Cal. 495, 74 Pac. 40, which was an action to quiet title, the defendant undertook to set up a cause of action for damages for the breach of a contract with the plaintiff to sink a well upon the land to which his action to quiet title related. The Supreme Court held that such a claim could not be made the subject of a counterclaim under subdivision 1 of section 438, Code of Civil Procedure, in an action to quiet title. In so holding, the Supreme Court cited with approval the case of National Fire Ins. Co. v. McKay, 21 N. Y. 191, in which case the court said:

"A counterclaim, when established, must in some way qualify or must defeat the judgment to which a plaintiff is otherwise entitled."

In the early case of Carpenter v. Hewel, 67 Cal. 589, 8 Pac. 314, it was held that in an action of ejectment the defendant could not set up by way of counterclaim an alleged indebtedness of the plaintiff to him for rent alleged to have accrued by virtue of a lease between himself and the plaintiff. Under these authorities we are constrained to hold that the defendant's asserted counterclaim could not be properly pleaded or heard in connection with the plaintiffs' suit to quiet title, and hence that the trial court was not in error in sustaining the plaintiffs' demurrer to the so-called counterclaim without leave to amend.

No other points are discussed in the briefs upon this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

HAM et al. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 3044.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 14, 1920. On Petition for Rehearing, March 13, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court, In Bank, Denying Hearing, April 10, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §78(3)—Order sustaining demurrer not final judgment.

An appeal cannot be taken from an order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint, such an order not being a final judgment.

2. Appeal and error §933(4)—Order granting new trial without stating ground sustained if any ground is well taken.

Where the particular grounds on which an order granting a new trial was made do not appear in the record, a ruling of the trial court must be sustained if any of the grounds presented on the motion is well taken.

3. Appeal and error §977(3)—New trial §6—Discretion of trial court very broad and not reviewed unless abused.

The discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial is very broad, and an order will be upheld unless it appears that such discretion has been abused.

4. Trial §315 — Prior agreement to abide thereby renders a quotient verdict invalid.

There is no impropriety in jurors making an average of their individual estimates as to the amount of damages for the purpose of arriving at a basis for discussion and consideration, nor in adopting such average if it is subsequently agreed to by the jurors; but to agree beforehand to adopt such average and abide by the agreement without further deliberation or discussion is fatal to the verdict.

5. Appeal and error §1015(5)—Determination of fact on counter affidavits on motion for new trial binding on appeal.

It is not the province of the appellate court on appeal from an order granting a new trial to determine what facts related in contradictory affidavits are true, and a finding of the trial court on such affidavits can no more be disturbed than a finding in the trial of the facts in the case.

6. Highways §166—Local regulations not in conflict with state regulation, though more stringent, valid.

Local regulations may be adopted controlling street and highway traffic which are not in conflict with the Motor Vehicle Act 1913, and regulations are not in conflict which merely place additional and more stringent limitations upon the operation of motor vehicles than those prescribed by the state law.

7. Bridges §30—County ordinance regulating motor vehicles on bridges not in conflict with state law.

The ordinance of the county of Los Angeles which declares it unlawful to drive any vehicle over or across any county bridge at a rate of speed greater than five miles an hour is not in conflict with Motor Vehicle Act 1913, § 22, subd. b, relating to speed of automobiles on bridges, etc.

8. Bridges §32—Statute as to speed of vehicles on bridges relates only to places where view is obstructed.

Motor Vehicle Act 1913, § 22, subd. b, relating to speed of motor vehicles on bridges, etc., only relates to conditions where the view of the road traffic is obstructed.

9. Bridges §30—Local ordinance may prescribe less rate of speed than state law.

A local ordinance prohibiting motor vehicles to travel at more than five miles an hour over a bridge would not conflict with a state law prohibiting motor vehicles from traveling at a rate of more than ten miles per hour over a bridge.

10. Bridges §44(3)—Violating speed ordinance on bridge contributory negligence.

Violating a local ordinance prohibiting motor vehicles from traveling at a rate of speed in excess of five miles an hour when crossing a bridge is contributory negligence, if it proximately contributes to an accident.

11. Bridges §44(3)—Darkness may constitute "obstruction" within law relating to speed of automobiles.

Darkness may constitute an "obstruction" within the meaning of Motor Vehicle Act 1913, § 22, subd. b, declaring that a motor vehicle shall not be driven at a greater rate of speed than one mile in six minutes when the operator's or chauffeur's view of the road traffic is obstructed, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Obstruction.]

12. Highways §197(1)—Trial §253(9)—Not negligence per se to operate automobile so that it cannot be stopped within distance lighted by lamps; instruction erroneous as ignoring conditions relative to negligence.

While negligence may be predicated as a matter of law on the fact that an automobile is being driven in the nighttime at such a rate of speed that it cannot be stopped within a radius illuminated by its lights, it was erroneous for the court to lay down the general rule of law that it is negligence per se to drive an automobile at night at a rate of speed which will not permit stopping within such distance; such instruction not taking into account the degree of darkness of the night or known conditions of the road.

13. Highways §209—Person injured by reason of defect has burden of proving due care.

Under St. 1911, p. 1115, one suing for injuries from a defect in a highway must affirmatively show that he was, at the time of the accident, using due care.

14. Death §104(2) — Trial §296(7) — Instruction as to presumption of care by deceased held erroneous.

In an action for death of one killed while riding in an automobile on a highway by reason of a defect in a bridge, the court erred in instructing that it is presumed that all persons use due care for the preservation of their own lives, although the court instructed that plaintiff must affirmatively show due care, in view of St. 1911, p. 1115.

15. Officers ⇐116—Liable for negligence in performing "ministerial acts."

Public officers are liable for their negligence in performing duties ministerial in character, and not judicial or discretionary; a duty being "ministerial" which unqualifiedly requires the doing of a certain thing (citing Words and Phrases, Second Series, Ministerial Act).

16. Highways ⇐198—Officers, when liable for negligence.

A street superintendent or road supervisor upon whom is imposed by statute or ordinance, or under the express direction of the legislative or administrative authority of a city or county, the duty of keeping in repair and making safe for public use the streets and highways, and to whom the means of carrying out these duties are available, is liable for a negligent performance of his duty, subject to certain statutes relating to notice to officers of condition of street or highway demanding attention.

17. Highways ⇐198—When road officers liable for negligent maintenance.

Under Los Angeles County Charter, art. 12, § 27, when the supervisors have by appropriate general rules, regulations, and directions provided for the maintenance and repair of the highways by the road commissioner, in the absence of specific knowledge of his failure to perform his duty in some particular case, they are relieved from responsibility for the results of his negligence.

18. Bridges ⇐37—Road commissioner not liable for delay in repairing bridge beyond his authority to repair.

Where repairs to be made on a bridge were so extensive that a road commissioner could not make them without special action first taken by the county board of supervisors, he was not liable for damages for injuries to a traveler by reason of his failure to repair the bridge without action by the board.

19. Bridges ⇐21 (2), 37—Method and time of making repairs on defective bridges discretionary with county supervisors.

Under Pol. Code, § 4041, requiring that, when the cost of construction of a bridge exceeds $500, such work shall be done by contract, or, in case of emergency by unanimous consent of the board, by day labor, it is a matter of discretion with the county supervisors, not only as to the method of repairs of a bridge, but when the repairs shall be made, or whether made at all, and they are not liable for injuries resulting to travelers on the bridge by reason of delay in repair.

On Petition for Rehearing.

20. Highways ⇐198—Statute does not absolve officer from liability in failing to place barriers at dangerous breaks in road.

St. 1911, p. 1115, does not absolve those in charge of the care and maintenance of highways from liability for negligence in failing to place warnings or barriers at dangerous breaks in a road until such time as it might be convenient to repair them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Margaret A. B. Ham and others against the County of Los Angeles and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint as to certain defendants, and from an order granting a new trial after judgment in their favor, the plaintiffs appeal. Appeal from order sustaining demurrer dismissed, other order affirmed in Appellate Court, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Mattison B. Jones and Jones & Evans, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Edward T. Bishop, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages for the death of one George Ira Ham, whose death was caused by his being driven off a bridge partly washed out by flood waters, while riding in an automobile with a companion, who was driving. The bridge was on one of the county roads and was part of the highway system of the county of Los Angeles.

The defendants were the county of Los Angeles, members of the board of supervisors of the county and their bondsmen, and F. H. Joyner, chief engineer of the county roads, Sydney A. Butler, John J. Hamilton, and Arthur King, and were charged with negligence in safeguarding and repairing the broken bridge.

Demurrers to the complaint, as not stating a cause of action against the defendants county of Los Angeles, Sydney A. Butler, John J. Hamilton, and Arthur King were sustained without leave to amend. On the trial before a jury a verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of defendants Woodley, one of the supervisors, and Joyner, the road engineer. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiffs and against the remaining defendants, members of the board of supervisors and their bondsmen. The amount of recovery against these defendants was the sum of $18,330 and costs. On motion for a new trial the judgment for plaintiffs was set aside and a new trial granted. Plaintiffs have taken two separate appeals, one from the judgment or order sustaining the demurrers as to the defendants county of Los Angeles, Butler, Hamilton, and King; the other from the order of the trial court granting the motion for a new trial.

[1] The first appeal may be briefly disposed of. It does not appear that any judgment of nonsuit or dismissal was taken as to the defendants in whose behalf the demurrer was sustained. In any event, the appeal is not from any final judgment, but from the order sustaining the demurrer. As this is not an appealable order, the appeal must be dismissed. Rickert v. Zoeger, 169 Cal. 399, 146 Pac. 894. It may be stated, however, that appellants have abandoned their contention of error in sustaining the demurrers as to defendants Butler, Hamilton, and King; and only base their appeal as to the demurrer affecting the cause of action against the county of Los Angeles, on the validity of that provision of the act of the Legislature approved April 26, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1115), attempting to make municipal corporations liable for negligence of their officers in the care or repair of highways, which provision, because not covered by the title of the act, was held unconstitutional in Brunson v. City of Santa Monica, 27 Cal. App. 89, 148 Pac. 950.

[2, 3] The order granting a new trial which is the basis of the second appeal, was made, generally, without specifying the particular grounds, upon a motion containing among others, the following specifications: Newly discovered evidence; misconduct of counsel on the trial; errors in ruling on evidence; errors in instructions to jury; misconduct of the jury; insufficiency of the evidence; and errors in law occurring at the trial. Appellants, in attacking the order appealed from, are confronted with two limitations upon the action of this court in reviewing such an order: First, that where the particular grounds upon which the order was made do not appear in the record the ruling of the trial court must be sustained if any of the grounds presented on the motion is well taken (Minturn v. Bliss, 77 Cal. 90, 19 Pac. 185; Morgan v. Robinson Co., 157 Cal. 348, 107 Pac. 695; Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 286, 152 Pac. 913; Miller v. Logan, 32 Cal. App. 28, 161 Pac. 1022); and, second, that the discretion of the trial court in granting a new trial is very broad, and the order will be upheld unless it appears that the discretion has been abused (Tweeddale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 156 Pac. 483; Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 Pac. 1019). In the case last cited, the Supreme Court lays down this broad rule:

"That the granting of a new trial is a thing resting so largely in the discretion of the trial court that its action in that regard will not be disturbed except upon the disclosure of a manifest and unmistakable abuse has become axiomatic. * * * So long as a case made presents an instance showing a reasonable or even fairly debatable justification, under the law, for the action taken, such action will not be here set aside, even if, as a question of first impression, we might feel inclined to take a different view from that of the court below."

As we are satisfied that, under these general principles and the facts shown in the record here, the order appealed from must be affirmed, it would only be necessary to consider a single well-grounded specification on the motion for a new trial. Since the case must go back for a new trial, however, and in compliance with request of counsel, we will give our best consideration to all the points raised on this appeal which are likely to arise on a retrial.

[4, 5] Misconduct of the Jury.—We are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence before the trial court of misconduct of the jury in the manner of arriving at its verdict to justify granting a new trial. There were submitted by defendants on this point affidavits of most, if not all, of the jurors that, in determining the amount of damages, after nine of the jurors had agreed upon a verdict for plaintiffs, they agreed and proceeded as follows:

"That each of said nine jurors would place upon a slip of paper the amount to which he believed the plaintiffs entitled; that said amounts should be added together, the resulting sum divided by nine, and the resulting quotient taken as the amount of the damages to be assessed against the defendants without further discussion, balloting or assent; that in pursuance of this agreement each of said nine jurymen placed upon a slip of paper the amount to which he believed the plaintiffs entitled, which nine amounts were thereupon added together, divided by nine, and the quotient resulting was $18,330.00; that thereupon, pursuant to said previous agreement, said sum of $18,330 was, without further discussion, balloting or assent on the part of or by any of said nine jurors who joined in said verdict, entered by the foreman in the form of verdict prepared by the court, and no ballot was taken or assent given to said verdict other than that hereinabove set forth."

Some of the affiants state that, although they deemed the quotient thus arrived at too large, they accepted it because of the agreement to abide by the result of the average.

If this state of facts existed, it is quite unnecessary to further analyze or discuss the matter. It was obviously a chance verdict, and not only justified, but made imperative, a new trial. Dixon v. Plums, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180; McDonnell v. Pescadero Stage Co., 120 Cal. 476, 52 Pac. 725. It is true, as held in the last-cited case, that there is no impropriety in the jurors making an average of their individual estimates as to the amount of damages for the purpose of arriving at a basis for discussion and consideration, nor in adopting such average if it is subsequently agreed to by the jurors; but to agree beforehand to adopt such average and abide by the agreement, without further discussion or deliberation, is fatal to the verdict. It is true, in the case before us, that plaintiffs presented to the court, on the motion, counter affidavits of these same jurors, in which they modify their former statements, and allege that certain averments therein contained were inadvertently made; but these counter affidavits contain no denial that there was a previous agreement to abide by the average sum arrived at, or that they were influenced in adopting such amount as their verdict by such an agreement. They do state, however, that there was deliberation and discussion after taking this average, before they finally voted to adopt it. But it is not the province of this court to determine whether the facts as related in the counter affidavits are true; nor it is necessary to determine whether, if true, the amended affidavits avoid the attack on the verdict. If the trial judge had denied the motion for a new trial, we would be bound to presume that he accepted the amended counter statements as sufficient; but, as he granted a new trial, we must assume the facts most strongly against appellants. The court may have believed that the jurors told the truth the first time. Indeed, it is rather difficult to accept the explanation that each of them inadvertently and unknowingly made oath to a statement, plainly set out in the affidavits, that he agreed to abide by the result of such an average of the amounts before the slips were filled out and thereafter adopted such average as his verdict because of such agreement and without further discussion. At any rate, it was a question of fact for the trial court to determine where the truth lay, on this conflicting evidence, and we can no more disturb the finding against appellants than if the question arose on a finding in the trial of the facts of the case.

[6-9] Exclusion of County Ordinance.—Another ground of the motion for a new trial was the refusal of the court to admit in evidence an ordinance of the county of Los Angeles which declares it unlawful to drive any vehicle over or across any county bridge at a rate of speed greater than five miles an hour. The board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, under the county charter (section 10, art. 3), are vested with all the powers which are granted to supervisors under the Constitution and general laws of the state. Under section 4041 of the Political Code, subdivisions 4, 31, 37, and 41, boards of supervisors are empowered to make and enforce rules and regulations for the protection, management, control, and use of public highways, and to enact ordinances for that purpose, and generally to make and enforce, within the limits of their county, all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. In fact, the only objection raised as to the effect and validity of the ordinance in question was that it is in conflict with the general laws of the state as embodied in the Motor Vehicle Act. The objection to the admission of the ordinance in evidence was based, and by the trial court sustained, on the authority of Application of Smith, 26 Cal. App. 116, 146 Pac. 82. In so far as the decision cited suggests the operation of the State Motor Vehicle Act as superseding all municipal regulation of automobile traffic, whether conflicting with the state law or not, it is in conflict with a considerable array of subsequent decisions in the appellate courts, and particularly with the expression of the Supreme Court in the late case of Mann v. Scott, 182 Pac. 281. Indeed, it seems now to be the accepted law that local regulations may be adopted controlling street and highway traffic which are not in conflict with the State Motor Vehicle Act, and that such regulations are not in conflict which merely place additional and more stringent limitations upon the operation of motor vehicles than those prescribed by the state law. In Mann v. Scott, supra, the Supreme Court says:

"Upon a careful reconsideration of the appellants' contention that the State Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 is the controlling law upon the subject, and that it was error to give an instruction embodying the regulatory provisions of the city ordinance, we are constrained to confirm the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that the municipal ordinance in the respect noted was not inconsistent with the state law, but was valid and operative in the city of Los Angeles at the time of the plaintiff's injury. And this, we think, is so regardless of the question of whether or not the regulation of the traffic upon the streets of the city is a 'municipal affair.' * * * Where the Legislature has assumed to regulate a given course of conduct by prohibitory enactments, a municipality with subordinate power to act in the matter may make such new and additional regulations in aid and furtherance of the purpose of the general law as may seem fit and appropriate to the necessities of the particular locality, and which are not in themselves unreasonable."

As further illustrating the point, the court, in this decision, quotes with approval the language of Mr. Justice Henshaw, in the case of In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 118, 99 Pac. 517, 519 (132 Am. St. Rep. 75), as follows:

"If the state should pass a law declaring it unlawful to erect a chimney of a height exceeding 150 feet, would any one seriously contend that a city of the state within the earthquake zone might not by ordinance, in the clear exercise of police power, for the benefit of its citizens, still further restrict the height of chimneys?" Mann v. Scott, 28 Cal. App. Dec. 171; Pemberton v. Arny, 183 Pac. 356; Ex parte Snowden, 12 Cal. App. 521, 107 Pac. 724; In re Hoffman, supra.

Under these authorities, the county ordinance here in question is clearly not in conflict with any provision of the State Motor Vehicle Act of 1913, then in force. The only provision of the state law relating specifically to regulation of speed in crossing bridges is contained in subdivision (b) of section 22 (St. 1913, p. 649), and declares that a motor vehicle shall not be operated or driven at a greater rate of speed "than one mile in six minutes where the operator's or chauffeur's view of the road traffic is obstructed either upon approaching an intersecting way, or in traversing a crossing or intersection of ways, or in approaching or traversing a bridge, dam, trestle, causeway or viaduct, or in going around corners or a curve in a street or highway." Under the natural and grammatical construction of this provision, it only relates to conditions where the view of the road traffic is obstructed, and we think the trial court was right in so construing it. But, at most, the provision is but a specification of a ten mile an hour speed limit over bridges, and, under the decisions above cited, does not inhibit a local law prescribing a less rate of speed. Moreover, the state law is obviously only intended as a speed limitation for the safety of traffic, while the county ordinance limiting the rate of speed to five miles an hour upon bridges, like the familiar enactments affixing a penalty for riding or driving over a bridge faster than a walk, may well be intended for the protection and preservation of the bridge itself against the well-known effect of excessive vibration. The issues on the trial involved the question of due care on the part of the deceased in the use of the highway. Evidence had been introduced showing that the automobile had slid or skidded forward a distance of from 30 to 50 feet, under locked brakes, before going over the broken end of the bridge, thus indicating an approach over the bridge at a considerable speed. Such a condition, in fact, might well indicate that if the ordinance had been observed the accident would have been averted.

[10] We are of the opinion that the county ordinance was valid, and that the violation of its terms was, under the established rules of law, an act of contributory negligence if it proximately contributed to the accident. Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663. The exclusion of the ordinance from the evidence was error.

Instructions as to Speed Limits.—Respondents, on their motion for a new trial, further complained of the action of the trial court in refusing instructions in their behalf bearing on the provisions of the state law limiting the speed on approaching or traversing a bridge, where the view of the traffic is obstructed, at a greater rate than one mile in six minutes. One of the instructions objected to contained language as follows:

"In that connection I charge you that darkness may constitute an obstruction within the law quite as much as intervening objects. If the driver of a motor vehicle enters upon a bridge at night, when it is impossible for him by means of the lights carried by his automobile to see across the bridge, then his view of traffic along the bridge is obstructed within the meaning of the law, and he is forbidden to proceed at a greater rate of speed than ten miles per hour."

In a further instruction the court said:

"I instruct you that it is negligence, as a matter of law, to drive an automobile at night at such a rate of speed that the automobile cannot be stopped or an obstruction or excavation avoided within the distance lighted by the lamps of the machine."

[11] In view of our conclusion as to the validity and admissibility in evidence of the five mile per hour limitation of the county ordinance, the doctrine invoked in these instructions does not need to be determined for the purposes of this case; but we are disposed to venture an opinion that the contention of respondents as expressed in the first quotation therefrom is well taken. Obviously, what the regulative provisions of the statute are intended for is to prevent an automobile driver from exceeding certain moderate speed limits where he cannot see what is ahead of him. The legislators were not indulging in any nice physical or metaphysical distinctions as to the nature of the obstructions to sight, whether they arose from positive or negative conditions; whether they were objective or subjective. It is just as dangerous to speed into a crossing or over a bridge without the use of one's sight to warn and guide him, whether the limitation is caused by defective vision, physical obstructions, the glare of an approaching headlight, a bank of mist or fog, or the absence of light—the condition we call darkness. Artificial light has been called into service to dispel the obstruction of the vision by the darkness of night, but it is only effective so far as its rays penetrate and illuminate. And it seems clear that the automobile driver who attempts to cross a bridge in a state of darkness, even with the aid of artificial lights, is operating in violation of this provision of the state law if he travels at a rate of speed exceeding that named in the statute.

[12] The second instruction quoted from is clearly erroneous, in laying down a general rule of law that it is in all cases negligence per se to drive an automobile at night at a rate of speed which will not permit of stopping within the distance lighted by the lamps of the machine. Such instruction does not take into account the degree of darkness of the night or known conditions of the road. But we are not prepared to say that negligence may not be predicated as a matter of law, irrespective of any positive law as to speed limits, where an automobile is being driven in the night on any part of the highway, and where the driver is dependent upon the lights of his machine for knowledge of the condition of the road and the traffic upon it, and runs into an obstruction, if he drives at a rate of speed which will not permit him to stop or slow up within the radius illuminated by his lights, and the accident is proximately caused thereby. This proposition is not without the support of eminent authority. In Lauson v. Fond Du Lac, 141 Wis. 57, 123 N. W. 629, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 40, 135 Am. St. Rep. 30, the driver of an automobile, traveling over a straight stretch of country road, ran into an unlighted and unprotected ditch or opening in the highway, and was injured. The evidence disclosed that he was traveling at a moderate rate of speed, but too fast to stop in time to prevent the accident after the broken condition of the highway was disclosed by his headlights. It was held by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin that it appeared as a matter of law that the driver was not using ordinary care in the use of the highway. The court says:

"It seems to us, and we decide, that the driver of an automobile, circumstanced as was the driver of the car in which the plaintiff was riding, and operating it under such conditions as he operated his machine on the night of the accident, is not exercising ordinary care if he is driving the car at such a rate of speed that he cannot bring it to a standstill within the distance that he can plainly see objects or obstructions ahead of him. If his light be such that he can see objects for only a distance of ten feet, then he should so regulate his speed as to be able to stop his machine within that distance."

There are further arguments and conclusions in this case that are instructive on the principle invoked. Under similar conditions of darkness, where the automobile was run into an unlighted concrete mixer on the street, the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in West Const. Co. v. White, 130 Tenn. 520, 172 S. W. 301, held as a matter of law that—

"It was negligence for the driver of the automobile to propel it in a dark place in which he had to rely on the lights of his machine at a rate faster than enabled him to stop or avoid any obstruction within the radius of his light, or within the distance to which his lights would disclose the existence of obstructions."

It was held to the same effect in Knoxville Ry. & Light Co. v. Vangilder, 132 Tenn. 487, 178 S. W. 1117, L. R. A. 1916A, 1111, with the further declaration that the blinding glare of an approaching headlight only imposed a further duty on the driver to reduce the rate of speed. See, also, on this point, Pietsch v. McCarthy, 159 Wis. 251, 150 N. W. 482.

[13, 14] Proof of Due Care.—Again, respondents claim, in support of the order for a new trial, that the jury was incorrectly instructed as to the nature and degree of evidence necessary to free the deceased from the imputation of contributory negligence. The statute under which it is sought to hold the highway officials of Los Angeles county liable for this accident is known as the "Pridham Act" (Act 2554, Stats. 1911, p. 1116). It is expressly provided by this act that no liability for injury resulting from negligence in keeping a highway in repair shall rest upon such officials unless it shall appear that the "damage or injury was sustained while such * * * highway * * * was being carefully used and that due care was exercised to avoid such danger." This, as to this class of actions, clearly changes the rule generally applicable in the state of California, that the burden of showing contributory negligence is on the defendant. In the absence of the clause just quoted, the defendants, if they wished to show contributory negligence as a defense, would have to plead and prove it. But, as the statute reads, an affirmative showing that the road was, at the time of the accident, being used with due care, that is, without negligence proximately contributing to the injury, must be made by the plaintiffs in order to maintain their cause of action. On the trial the court, after instructing the jury correctly as to the requirement that it must appear that the highway was being used with due care and without negligence, proceeded to cancel the effect of this requirement by the further instruction that—

"The law provides, however, that it is presumed that all persons use due care for the preservation of their own life and to avoid injury to themselves; in the absence of any evidence in the case with relation to the question of the care used by the deceased at the time of the injury in question, your findings on this issue on this presumption must be in favor of the plaintiffs. * * *"

This instruction, as thus far quoted, seems to relieve the plaintiffs from any showing whatever as to due care in the use of the highway, and, we think, introduces an element of error into the instruction. Bell v. Incorporated Town of Clarion, 113 Iowa, 126, 84 N. W. 962; Tyndale v. Old Colony R. Co., 156 Mass. 503, 31 N. E. 655; Bond v. Smith, 113 N. Y. 378, 21 N. E. 128; Cordell v. N. Y. C. & H., etc., Co., 75 N. Y. 330; Wirowski v. Lake Shore, etc., Ry. Co., 124 N. Y. 420, 26 N. E. 1023. The instruction then proceeds with a submission to the jury of rules of law to govern them in weighing evidence in the case, bearing upon this question, which, taken apart from the portion above quoted, probably correctly states the law, and permits the jury to take into account the recognized disposition of every rational person to avoid injury, but does not save it, as appellants justly contend, from the vice pointed out. From the recognized disposition of every rational person to avoid injury, the jury doubtless may infer, where the circumstances shown in evidence warrant it as a legitimate inference of fact, that the injured person did use due care; but to instruct the jury that the law raises a presumption of due care in such cases is to offset by a legal presumption the declaration of the statute that the burden is on the plaintiff in such cases to show that due care was used by him.

[15] Liability of Road Officials.—The most important question, in its application to a new trial of this case, is the construction of the Pridham Act, together with the rulings of the California courts, on the conditions under which public officers are liable for negligence in the care and repair of streets and highways. The general rule in this state, if there may be said to be one established, is that public officers are liable for their negligence where the duty imposed upon them is ministerial in character and not judicial or discretionary. Such a rule of liability is first suggested, though not determined, in Huffman v. San Joaquin County, 21 Cal. 427, where Mr. Chief Justice Field, in holding that no cause of action was created against the county by negligence of its officers in the performance of their duties, said, by way of dictum, that—

"If any remedy exist for injuries resulting from neglecting to keep such bridges in repair, it must be sought either against the road overseers or supervisors personally."

Later decisions have laid down the general rule of liability, limiting it to negligence in the performance of ministerial duties, or, as the rule has been stated, that before a public official becomes liable for a breach of duty the duty must exist, and it must be such as not to involve the exercise of discretion on his part. Doeg v. Cook, 126 Cal. 213, 58 Pac. 707, 77 Am. St. Rep. 171; South v. San Benito County, 180 Pac. 354; Dobbins v. City of Arcadia, 186 Pac. 190.

[16] The main perplexity in the case of public officials, such as city trustees or the supervisors of a county, whose responsibilities include and blend almost indefinitely the judicial, legislative, and administrative functions, is to determine where the ministerial and imperative duties end and the discretionary powers begin. It is said by some of the authorities that a public official is absolved from liability for negligence if the act is such as to involve "any discretion on his part either as to its performance or the manner of its performance." This statement of the law obviously requires some modification, as it would be difficult to conceive of any official act, no matter how directly ministerial, that did not admit of some discretion in the manner of its performance, even if it involved only the driving of a nail. It would seem a fair application of the rule would be that any duty is ministerial which unqualifiedly requires the doing of a certain thing. To the extent that its performance is unqualifiedly required, it is not discretionary, even though the manner of its performance may be discretionary. Words and Phrases (Second Series) gleans from numerous authorities cited the following definition:

"A 'ministerial' act is one which a person performs in a given state of facts in a prescribed manner in obedience to the mandate of legal authority, without regard to or the exercise of his own judgment upon the propriety of the thing being done."

In the matter of repair of streets and highways, there seems to be no longer a question, under the decisions of this state, that a street superintendent or road supervisor upon whom is imposed by statute or ordinance, or under the express direction of the legislative or administrative authority of the city or county, the duty of keeping in repair and making safe for public use the streets and highways, and to whom the means of carrying out this duty is available, is liable for a negligent performance of his duty; with the further proviso, under comparatively recent legislation, that he has had certain specified notice of the condition of the street or highway demanding attention. Wurzburger v. Nellis, 165 Cal. 48, 130 Pac. 1052; Stockton Auto Co. v. Confer, 154 Cal. 402, 97 Pac. 881; South v. San Benito County, supra; Dobbins v. City of Arcadia, supra; Doeg v. Cook, supra. In the case last cited it is indicated that there may be a concurrent negligence which will involve a liability both on the part of the supervisory body—in that case the city trustees—and the officer whose immediate duty it is to make the repairs. In Lynn v. Adams, 2 Ind. 143, the court refused to hold the defendant, a supervisor of highways, liable, because the responsibility of keeping the road in repair was divided between him and the overseers, and there was no definite absolute duty on either. But ordinarily it would appear that the duties of these separate functionaries are separable and distinct. If the supervisors are empowered and required to provide for the care and repair of the highways by general rules and orders delegating the specific execution of the work to a road overseer or superintendent, and they have failed to do this, and damage to third parties results from defects in the highway of which they have notice, they, and not the road overseer, would seem to be liable. On the other hand, if the supervisors of the county have made and given the necessary general provisions and directions to impose this specific duty on the road overseer, he alone is responsible for the negligence.

ty charter, are relieved of the duty of caring for the roads in the respective districts. The charter provides for a road commissioner, who will have charge of the roads throughout the entire county, subject to the general direction of the supervisors. Section 27, art. 12, of the charter reads as follows:

"The road commissioner, subject to such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the board of supervisors, shall have direction and control of all work of construction, maintenance and repair of roads, highways and bridges, other than work done under contract, and it shall be his duty to examine and inspect contract work as the same progresses, and see that the same is properly performed, and when completed to file his written approval thereof with the board of supervisors. He shall also have the control and management of all county rock quarries and gravel pits, and all other materials, property and instrumentalities necessary for and connected with the construction, maintenance and repair of roads and highways."

The road commissioner, whose duties are thus fixed by law, is one of the appointive charter officers of the county. We think that when the supervisors have, by appropriate general rules, regulations and directions, provided for the maintenance and repair of the highways by the road commissioner, in the absence of specific knowledge of his failure to perform his duty in some particular case, they are relieved from responsibility for the results of his negligence.

[18, 19] It is contended here, however, that the supervisors did have notice of the dangerous condition of this bridge, and that it was not being safeguarded or repaired—indeed, that it could only be repaired by contract work, through action to be taken by the board; and that the negligence, therefore, was that of the supervisors for failing, within a reasonable time, to provide for such repairs. The Pridham Act of 1911 provides that—

"No officer who has charge of or whose duty it is to care for or repair any street, highway, public building, public work or property shall be liable for any injury to person or property arising from the dangerous or defective condition thereof or failure to repair the same, unless such officer shall have had actual notice of such defective or dangerous condition, and shall have failed, for a reasonable time after such actual notice, to repair the same; provided that such officer had authority to remedy such condition, or to make such repair at the expense of the state or political subdivision thereof, and funds were available therefor."

It may be observed, in passing, that this act does not seem to have been enacted to create or enlarge any liability of public officers for negligence in the performance of their duties beyond the liability already existing at law, but to limit such liability. It is conceded here that the extensive repairs required on this bridge could not be made by the road commissioner without special action first taken by the board of supervisors, and such commissioner was therefore absolved from liability for delay in repairing the bridge. The jury found, by its verdict, that the supervisors, respondents here, had actual notice of the damaged and dangerous condition of the bridge, and that they failed to provide means for its repair within a reasonable period. The evidence shows that they had notice by March 9, 1914, and that the repairs had not been made on April 12, 1914, the date of the accident. It is admitted that the cost for making the necessary repairs was about $1,400. Section 4041 of the Political Code requires that, when the cost of construction of a bridge exceeds $500, such work shall be done by contract, and let under prepared and adopted plans and specifications to the lowest responsible bidder, or, in case of emergency, by unanimous consent of the board, the work may be done by day labor. It is claimed by respondents that it was a matter of discretion with the supervisors whether they should make the repairs by contract or by day labor, and that there had not sufficient time elapsed when the accident occurred to have done the work under the contract provision. There does not appear to have been any move to do it either way. We agree, however, that it was a matter of discretion with the supervisors, not only as to the method of repair which they might adopt, but as to when the repairs should be made, or whether made at all. The season of the year, or the prevalence of heavy rains and high waters, may have rendered it advisable to postpone the work. The character of the damage and the material of the bridge might suggest the advisability of replacing it with a more substantial structure of steel or concrete. We are satisfied that the discretionary powers and duties of the supervisors in the matter of replacing the bridge, absolved them from liability for this delay.

If a cause of action existed here, either against the commissioner or the supervisors, or both, it was for failure to safeguard the approach to the dangerous break in this bridge by barriers or warning signals, if there was such failure. The trial court eliminated this question from the case, however, by excluding all evidence offered by plaintiffs to show negligence of the defendants in this respect; and, as the question of error in such ruling is not involved in this appeal, the issue thus suggested is not properly before us. We are constrained to say, however, that it is difficult to conceive a theory that would excuse public officials, whose duty it is to maintain a highway in a reasonably safe condition, from providing the most simple and obvious safeguard by erecting a barrier or putting out warning lights at night, at such a death trap on a traveled highway. Though the highway authorities may not have been bound to immediately replace this bridge in a safe condition for use, the common dictates of prudence require that it should not be left a menace to the life and limb of every unwary traveler. Liability for want of care in providing such warnings and safeguards has been universally applied by the courts, on general principals of the law of negligence, and irrespective of special enactments. Such rule of liability, as applying to highway and street officials, is recognized in Doeg v. Cook, supra, and Dobbins v. City of Arcadia, supra. Doubtless the ground on which the ruling of the court was made in this instance was the construction placed on the provisions of the Pridham Act. Literally applied, it gives support to such ruling. The language is that—

"No officer who has charge of, or whose duty it is to care for or repair, any street, highway * * * shall be liable for any injury to person or property arising from the dangerous or defective condition thereof or failure to repair the same, unless such officer shall have had actual notice of such defective or dangerous condition and shall have failed for a reasonable time after such actual notice to repair the same."

Literally interpreted, it is declared that no liability shall attach from the dangerous condition of the highway until sufficient time has elapsed to make the necessary repairs, which in this case was shown to be a period of several weeks, at least. Surely the courts are not required to construe this provision of the Pridham Act to mean that such a place of danger may, with immunity, be left unguarded and without barriers or warnings until it can conveniently be repaired. The Legislature was evidently dealing here with the question of liability for failure to make the repairs, and not with that of liability for failure to give necessary warning of the dangerous condition of the highway.

Because of the various errors in the trial of the case, herein pointed out, the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; THOMAS, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellants have asked for a rehearing on this appeal in order to obtain a more explicit statement of the opinion of this court as to the liability of the county supervisors for failure, if there was such, to place barriers or warning signals at the place where a portion of the bridge was washed out by the floods.

[20] This part of the opinion is expressly shown to be by way of dictum, and was only intended to make clear the point that we were not in accord with the contention that the Pridham Act absolved those in charge of the care and maintenance of highways from liability for negligence in failing to place warnings or barriers at dangerous breaks in the road until such time as it might be convenient to repair the break in the highway. We were not undertaking to say upon whom such liability would rest. Moreover, in another part of the opinion it is expressly stated that—

"Where the supervisors have, by appropriate general rules, regulations, and directions, provided for the maintenance and repair of the highways by the road commissioner, in the absence of specific knowledge of his failure to perform his duty in some particular case, they are relieved from responsibility for the results of his negligence."

The petition for a rehearing is denied. But perhaps in the denial of the application we have sufficiently illuminated the "guide-post," which petitioners ask us to "repaint," to enable them to decipher the inscription thereon.

Opinion of Supreme Court, In Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, we are not to be understood as expressing or intimating any view as to the correctness of that portion of the opinion which relates to the matter of neglect of the commissioner or supervisors with regard to safeguarding the approach to the dangerous break on the bridge by barriers or warning signals. As is expressly stated in the opinion, this question is not involved in this appeal and that portion of the opinion is purely by way of dictum.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

AUSTIN v. NEWTON. (Civ. 3050.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 6, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨995—Appellate court reviewing evidence recognizes control of facts by physical laws.

In reviewing evidence, appellate court must recognize that certain facts are controlled by immutable physical laws, and cannot permit verdict of jury to change such facts.

2. Appeal and error ⇨995—Appellate court must cautiously apply common sense and knowledge of physical laws to facts.

Appellate court is under duty to exercise great care and caution in applying test of common sense and common knowledge of physical laws to a given state of facts.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨706(5)—Finding that automobile driver's negligence proximately caused accident sustained.

In action against automobile driver for injuries to plaintiff riding tandem on a motorcycle with his son, evidence held sufficient to support finding that defendant's negligence in crowding plaintiff and his son off macadamized pavement of roadway was proximate cause of accident.

4. Evidence ⇨588—Not impossible that one riding motorcycle at a speed of 15 to 20 miles per hour could be thrown over a wall.

Appellate court cannot hold that plaintiff and his son, riding tandem on motorcycle which went off macadamized road into soft ground of ditch, could not have been thrown over a wall into orchard if motorcycle was traveling only 15 to 20 miles an hour, instead of 60, as defendant, the driver of automobile, claimed.

5. Appeal and error ⇨995—Court need not see that details of accident as testified to consist with physical facts and laws of science.

It cannot be laid down as a rule of law that plaintiff in a personal injury case cannot recover unless appellate court can see that every detail of the accident as testified to by plaintiff and his witnesses is consistent with admitted physical facts and laws of science.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1071(3)—Judgment affirmed after discarding findings unsupported by evidence.

Judgment will be affirmed where findings sufficient to sustain it remain after discarding findings unsupported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by E. E. Austin against A. M. Newton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon F. Moss, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kendrick & Ardis and Dailey S. Stafford, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff while riding on a motorcycle, driven by his son, on Citrus avenue, near the town of Covina, in Los Angeles county. Plaintiff recovered judgment. Defendant appeals, contending that plaintiff's version of the accident, as described by himself and his witnesses, is so irreconcilable with the admitted physical facts that it is inherently impossible that plaintiff could have been injured in the manner that he and his witnesses described.

Citrus avenue runs northerly and southerly. It is intersected by Ciennaga avenue, a highway running at a right angle with the direction of Citrus avenue, and which, though entering Citrus avenue from the east, does not extend beyond the westerly line of that highway. Citrus avenue, at this locality, is bordered on the west by an orange orchard. Between the orchard and the macadamized pavement of Citrus avenue, at the intersection of the latter with Ciennaga avenue, and for a short distance north and south of Ciennaga avenue, there is a board wall running parallel with and west of Citrus avenue. This wall has a dirt top, about 2 feet wide. Between the board wall and the hard macadamized pavement of Citrus avenue there is a ditch, about 8 feet wide, filled with soft dirt and stones. The top of the board wall is about 2½ feet above the ground on either side.

Plaintiff's theory of the accident, as disclosed by his complaint, is substantially as follows: While plaintiff was riding a motorcycle on the right-hand side of Citrus avenue, near where Ciennaga avenue joins it, defendant so carelessly and negligently ran and propelled her automobile that the driver of the motorcycle, plaintiff's son, in order to escape being run over and crushed by the automobile, was compelled to run his motorcycle into the ditch, whereby plaintiff's leg was broken, and the only way that plaintiff could have escaped being crushed by the automobile was for the driver of the motorcycle to run it into the ditch.

Plaintiff and his witnesses, testifying to how the accident happened, described it substantially as follows: Plaintiff was riding on a tandem seat on the motorcycle, behind his son, who was driving. The motorcycle was proceeding southerly on Citrus avenue. At some distance north of the intersection of Ciennaga avenue with Citrus avenue the motorcycle was traveling at about 25 miles an hour. It slowed down to about 20 miles an hour as it approached the crossing. Defendant's automobile, traveling westerly on Ciennaga avenue, approached the intersection. When defendant's automobile started to make the turn into Citrus avenue, the motorcycle, proceeding southerly along Citrus avenue, was southwest of the automobile and distant therefrom about 20 feet. The automobile did not make a "square turn," but "cut the corner," traveled in a southwesterly direction from the north side of Clennaga avenue, caught up with the motorcycle, while the latter was traveling southerly on Citrus avenue, and crowded it off the macadamized pavement into the ditch immediately west of Citrus avenue. The automobile continued on its course along Citrus avenue, traveling in a southerly direction. Plaintiff testified:

"After we saw the automobile, it turned around the corner southwest and came clear across Citrus avenue, there taking the right of way from us and coming up beside us, and then we went into the ditch. During the time when the automobile was making the turn into Citrus avenue, our motorcycle was just a foot or two inside the macadam, keeping well on the macadam."

Plaintiff testified that while the motorcycle was traversing the ditch, and before it came to a stop, he slid off behind the motorcycle, and that as he slid off he was dragged by and on his feet. It was conceded by all the witnesses that he was thrown over the board wall into the orchard immediately west of the wall. He lay there with his head toward the wall, about 5 feet distant therefrom, his body extending toward the west.

In describing how his leg was broken, plaintiff testified:

"My leg was broken just below the knee by striking the board wall. * * * The ditch is narrow, and we had a rough journey through there. We went back and forth. [That is, from side to side.] We did not go straight, of course. Probably we might have went up against the bank of the curb [meaning the board wall] a time or two after we struck the wall."

Asked how far he traveled along the ditch before he slid off the motorcycle, plaintiff replied:

"I suppose we went 60 or 75 feet. It seemed to me we did, but it was all done so quickly that I couldn't tell exactly. * * * It [the motorcycle] came to a stop before it was overturned. I don't know what overturned it. I was off the motorcycle and on the ground before the motorcycle stopped. * * * I don't know what particular thing made me get off. I know the ditch was rough, and there were stones in the ditch and holes washed out, and I stayed on it as long as I could. * * * I simply slipped off. * * * I slid off behind. * * * As near as I can remember, it didn't seem but a short distance after I struck, after I went into the gutter, that I went over the wall—it didn't seem but a short time, and a very short distance. * * * I let go and went off the motorcycle and I don't know what caused me to do it, but I went off, and as near as I can remember I drug by on my feet as I slipped off the motorcycle, and I fell to my right onto the dirt bank, and went over the bank, part way down into the orange orchard, and I lay there with my head partly toward the bank, partly up the bank, and my feet were down toward the orange orchard."

Plaintiff and his son both testified that when the motorcycle left the macadamized pavement and went into the ditch it was traveling at a speed not to exceed 15 miles an hour. Both landed in the orchard and were rendered unconscious. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was rendered unconscious by being "violently thrown from said motorcycle." Plaintiff testified that he "went off" the motorcycle before it stopped, but that he did not know what it was that caused him to be thrown off. Louis Clark, a witness for plaintiff, testified that father and son "went off" the motorcycle at practically the same instant, or, as he put it, the "same second."

Plaintiff's right leg was broken just below the knee joint. The blow that caused the fracture was so violent that it fractured the bone clear through, breaking it into two parts. The leg was lacerated and torn on the inside. There was no bruise or contusion on the outside of the leg. The doctor whom plaintiff employed to set the broken bone testified that the leg appeared to him as though the injury was due to a blow struck on the inside of the leg, inside and below the knee. "The force that broke the leg was applied on the inside of the limb just below the knee joint."

According to defendant's version of the accident, the motorcycle, traveling at a great speed—60 miles an hour, according to one witness—overtook defendant's automobile after she had made the turn into Citrus avenue, and, endeavoring to pass it on the wrong side, i. e., on the right-hand instead of the left-hand side, went so close to the westerly edge of the macadamized pavement that it ran into the soft dirt in the ditch, and thus its momentum was arrested so suddenly that plaintiff and his son were pitched off the motorcycle and thrown over the board wall into the orange orchard west of Citrus avenue.

[1] Undoubtedly an appellate court, in reviewing the evidence, is bound to exercise its intelligence, and in doing so must recognize that certain facts are controlled by immutable physical laws. It cannot permit the verdict of a jury to change such facts, because, as said in Quigley v. Naughton, 100 App. Div. 476, 91 N. Y. Supp. 491, to do so would, in effect, destroy the intelligence of the court. And when the undisputed circumstances show that the story told by a litigant and his witnesses cannot by any possibility be true, or when their testimony is inherently impossible, the appellate court should not hesitate to reverse the judgment, to the end that the cause again may be submitted to the determination of a jury or trial judge.

[2] On the other hand, as an appellate court, it is our bounden duty to exercise great care and caution in applying the tests of common sense and common knowledge of physical laws to a given state of facts. Common experience and observation teach us that strange and astonishing things sometimes happen in the world of physical phenomena, and accidents sometimes appear to happen in manner unaccountable. For these reasons an appellate court must be careful not to give to dogmatic and undemonstrated conclusions respecting natural laws precedence over the testimony of apparently credible witnesses; and the mere fact that the admitted circumstances make the story of the witnesses seem improbable will not justify a reversal by an appellate tribunal upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. Stokes v. Metropolitan Street Ry. Co., 173 Mo. App. 676, 160 S. W. 46. Unless, therefore, we can say that, under the undisputed physical facts, the accident could not possibly have been due to defendant's negligence as alleged in the complaint, we must affirm the judgment. It is not sufficient that the story told by plaintiff and his witnesses may be improbable. It is for the jury or the trial judge to weigh and balance probabilities. We cannot reverse upon the ground that the finding of negligence is contrary to the evidence unless we can see that the fact as found contravenes recognized physical laws, and that therefore it is impossible that the accident could have been due to the negligence alleged in the complaint.

[3, 4] Tested by the foregoing, we cannot say that the finding that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of the accident is not supported by the evidence. We think the evidence shows beyond peradventure that plaintiff's injuries resulted from the motorcycle being crowded from the paved road into the ditch. There seem to be but two possible alternatives: (1) Either the motorcycle was crowded off the macadamized road into the soft dirt of the ditch by the automobile coming up behind it and forcing it off; or (2) the motorcycle overtook the automobile, as testified to by defendant's witnesses, and, endeavoring to pass on the wrong side, was crowded off for lack of space, but through no fault of defendant. One of these two alternatives must be adopted. The angle at which the motorcycle would leave the macadamized road and go into the ditch would be substantially the same under either of these two possible theories. The only difference would be that, in one case, that presented by the theory that defendant's automobile crowded the motorcycle off the hard pavement the motorcycle would be traveling at a speed not exceeding 15 to 20 miles an hour when leaving the hard macadam; while in the other case, that presented by defendant's theory of the accident, the motorcycle would be traveling at a much higher rate of speed when going off the hard pavement. It is conceded that plaintiff's leg was broken in the accident, that the motorcycle went into the ditch, and that plaintiff was thrown over the board wall and into the orchard where he was found unconscious. The witnesses on both sides agree as to these effects of the accident. The disagreement is as to the cause of the accident. In determining the question as to whether the accident could have been due to defendant's fault, in negligently crowding the motorcycle into the ditch, without doing violence to any of the universally recognized laws of the physical universe, we seem to be confronted, in the final analysis, with this question: Could plaintiff and his son have been thrown over the board wall into the orchard if their motorcycle was traveling at a speed of not to exceed 15 to 20 miles an hour when it went into the ditch? For, regardless of its speed, it must have gone off the road at approximately the same angle under either of the two possible versions of the accident presented by the respective parties to the action. Therefore, unless we can say that plaintiff and his son could not possibly have been thrown over the wall and into the orchard if the motorcycle was going at the speed described by plaintiff's witnesses, but that such an eventuality was possible if it was going at the higher rate of speed testified to by defendant's witnesses, we cannot say that the accident could not possibly be due to defendant's negligence. We are unable to say that, if the motorcycle went off the hard macadam at the speed testified to by plaintiff's witnesses, plaintiff could not have been thrown into the orchard and his leg broken. The manner in which plaintiff and his son were thrown over the board wall would suggest a considerable rate of speed on the part of the motorcycle. But it could hardly be held, as a matter of law or a demonstration of physics, that the results shown could not be accomplished at a rate of 15 to 20 miles per hour. The distance at which plaintiff and his son were found beyond the board wall may be accounted for on the theory that after being thrown over the top they slid or rolled down the embankment, which the evidence shows sloped toward the orchard.

The fact that the bruises on plaintiff's leg were on the inside and not the outside can be accounted for by the fact that the outer part of his leg came in contact with the comparatively smooth surface of the wall, while the inner side may have been struck at the time of the impact by some sharp or jagged part of the motorcycle.

[5] Probably appellant would not seriously contend that the accident could by no possibility be caused by defendant's negligence in crowding the motorcycle off the hard pavement, even though no bruises were found on the outside of plaintiff's leg, and notwithstanding the motorcycle riders were thrown over the board wall into the orchard. As we understand counsel's argument, what appellant does contend for is that there are certain details of the accident, as described by plaintiff and his witnesses, that are irreconcilably in conflict with certain admitted physical facts. For example, plaintiff, in one part of his evidence, while trying to fix on a map the spots where the several occurrences happened, testified, in effect, that he slid off the motorcycle into the ditch at a spot about 90 to 100 feet distant from where he was found lying in the orchard as he regained consciousness. Such inconsistencies, however, would not necessarily prevent a recovery by plaintiff. It is not to be supposed that witnesses to an accident that happens in the twinkling of an eye should accurately observe all the details. Much less is it probable that one who is injured in the accident, and rendered unconscious, should be able to give a correct account of all the quickly happening events. It cannot be laid down as a rule of law that a plaintiff in a personal injury case cannot recover unless the court can see that every detail of the accident, as testified to by the plaintiff and his witnesses, is consistent with admitted physical facts and the laws of science. Undoubtedly where some of the details of an accident, as described by a witness, conflict with admitted physical facts, the whole story of the accident, as given by that witness, may be entirely discredited; but, as an appellate court, we cannot reverse unless we can say that the admitted physical facts are wholly irreconcilable with the negligence alleged in the complaint. To entitle respondent to an affirmance, it is sufficient if it can be said that, notwithstanding the admitted physical circumstances, the accident could have been caused by the negligence charged in the complaint. We hold that the reasonableness of plaintiff's version of the accident was a question of fact for the trial court, and that its finding thereon is conclusive here.

[6] It is claimed that those parts of the findings wherein the court finds, in effect, that defendant violated certain ordinances of the county of Los Angeles, are unsupported by the evidence, for the reason that no county ordinance was introduced during the trial. A sufficient reply to this contention is that these parts of the court's findings may be entirely discarded and the remaining findings still be sufficient to sustain the judgment.

There is no other point that merits discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

REGAN v. LOS ANGELES ICE & COLD STORAGE CO. (Civ. 3276.)

1. Negligence — 80—Contributory negligence bars recovery.

Contributory negligence of a plaintiff which directly contributes to his injury bars recovery.

2. Municipal corporations — 706(7)—Person run down in street not guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law.

A person standing in the street between a nearby standing automobile near the curb and approaching traffic on that side of the street cannot be said to have been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to observe approaching vehicles.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by James J. Regan against the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. J. Ford and Henry G. Bodkin, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITAIN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment for $824 and costs in a suit for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

There is only one question to be determined. It was raised by the defendant's motion for nonsuit, which was denied. It is as to whether or not the trial court should have determined, or this court can determine, as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence under the peculiar facts of this case. The same question is presented by the contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

At the time of the accident an automobile, described as a Buick touring car, with its top up, was standing close to the curb on the south side of East Seventh street, about 150 feet east of Alameda street, in Los Angeles. It had been struck earlier in the morning and slightly injured, apparently before it was parked on East Seventh street. After it was parked it was headed east in the direction of traffic on the side of the street on which it stood. The plaintiff and two other men had crossed from the other side of the street to speak to a man in the machine, and, their attention being called to the abrasions on the left rear mud guard and on the spare tire irons and the spare tire at the back, they were examining the rear parts of the machine. They had been there about five minutes. The street at that point was 60 to 70 feet wide, and there were no obstructions between the standing machine and the north side of the street. The accident occurred in the morning of a clear day. At the moment of the accident the plaintiff was standing close to and back of the left rear mud guard of the machine. One of his companions, who escaped injury, was standing at his right, back of the body of the machine, and another, who was also struck and who subsequently died, was standing at the plaintiff's right, on or with one foot on the running board. The plaintiff had not looked back to ascertain if another machine was approaching after crossing the street. There was a slight curve in the street, so that if an on-coming machine from the rear had followed a perfectly straight course it would have approached and run into the right-hand curb.

While the plaintiff was standing in the position indicated, a heavy truck owned by the defendant and operated by its employé approached and crossed Alameda street. Several boys were trying to climb on the truck, and the driver turned in his seat to tell them to get off. He crossed Alameda street without looking where he was going, and did not turn his face forward until the truck he was driving had struck the plaintiff, knocking him under the standing machine. The truck also struck the rear mud guard of the machine and hit the man who subsequently died.

[1, 2] The rules of law applicable to such cases are well established. The negligence of a plaintiff which directly contributes to his injury bars recovery. One using a public street is charged with the duty of observing approaching vehicles, it is true, but this rule is qualified and explained by the more general rule that, except in cases where the law itself fixes a standard of care, negligence is always relative and to be determined in view of all the circumstances of the particular case. Thus, if there was a plainly visible obstruction in a street, a person taking position on or immediately in front of it would be in a position of safety and might be relieved from the duty of observing traffic as he would be if he remained on the sidewalk. The standing automobile was a clearly visible obstruction in the course of the on-coming truck. Whether its driver simply continued in a straight course along the curving street, or, as some of the witnesses testified, swerved towards the obstruction, is of no importance. He heedlessly drove the truck upon the plaintiff. The plaintiff was in a position where, if it could not be said, as a matter of law, he had a right to assume he would not be run down, reasonably prudent men might have drawn that conclusion of fact. It certainly cannot be said as a matter of law that he was guilty of negligence. The rule of contributory negligence gives no support to the claim that the driver of an automobile or truck may heedlessly or wantonly run down those who are where they have a right to be, particularly if reasonable men may differ concerning the prudence exercised by the injured person.

The judgment is affirmed.

HAYNES et al. v. INDIO LEVEE DIST. et al.
(Civ. 3177.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 5, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡179(1)—Owner of land on which dam is being constructed held necessary party to action to enjoin construction.

In suit for a mandatory injunction requiring a levee district, which had constructed a dam across a natural waterway and made a new channel whereby plaintiff's lands were flooded, to restore the course of the river to its natural channel, the owner of the land whereon the dam and cut for the new channel were situated held a necessary party, since the relief sought could only be obtained by permitting the levee district to enter upon her land to perform the work of restoration.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡179(1)—Complaint in suit to restore natural channel held to negative presumption that diversion was authorized.

In a suit for a mandatory injunction requiring a levee district to restore a river to its natural channel, an allegation that the diversion of the waters was not done in pursuance of any plan or improvement adopted by the levee district or its trustees, and that the diversion was unlawful and wholly without right, held sufficient as against general demurrer to negative any presumption that the work had been done in pursuance of any legal authorization.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡162—Right to divert natural water course so as to flood lands depends on statute.

Neither a levee district nor any other municipal or quasi municipal corporation has authority to change the natural channel of a water course so as to turn the floods upon adjacent property not naturally subject to its flow without some express authority of law or of legal procedure, and even then the injured party must have his day in court.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡177(1)—Mandatory injunction lies to compel restoration of natural water course.

A levee district which has diverted the natural channel of a water course, thereby flooding plaintiff's lands, having committed trespass irreparable in character and of a continuing nature, may be restrained by a mandatory injunction and compelled to restore things to their natural and original condition.

5. Appeal and error ⚡917(1)—On appeal involving general demurrer, allegations of complaint are admitted as the whole truth.

For the purpose of appeal the appellate court, where objection was by general demurrer, must not only admit the allegations of the complaint to be the truth, but the whole truth, and it cannot on considering the sufficiency of the complaint infer or presume the existence of facts not pleaded.

6. Equity ☞87(2)—Laches cannot arise where suit to restrain diversion commenced within statutory period.

Where suit to restrain a levee district from diverting the waters of a natural water course into a new channel, thereby flooding plaintiff's land, was begun within the period of the statute of limitations, no presumption of laches on the part of plaintiff can arise within that period, in the absence of special pleadings or facts demanding an early protest.

7. Estoppel ☞108—Objection that equitable estoppel against plaintiffs exists may be raised by general demurrer.

In a suit to restrain diversion of a natural water course, that the complaint discloses a state of facts which would amount to an equitable estoppel on plaintiffs may be raised by a general demurrer; but, where the existence of the laches depends upon matters extraneous to the record, they should be presented by answer.

8. Dedication ☞39—Owner of land devoted to public use may not object thereto when rights of third parties involved.

Where a person has suffered property belonging to him to be taken and devoted to a public use and the matter has gone on so far that the beneficiaries of such use rely on its continuance and adjust their affairs accordingly, such owner having knowledge thereof and making no objection, his conduct will be regarded as a dedication by him of the property to the particular public use, and he cannot thereafter interrupt or prevent the same; his only remedy being for compensation.

9. Estoppel ☞108, 110—Must be pleaded, but not by general demurrer to complaint not clearly showing estoppel.

Estoppel is usually purely a matter of defense and cannot be raised even on the trial unless pleaded, much less by general demurrer to a complaint that does not clearly show facts constituting an estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by John R. Haynes and another against the Indio Levee District, Charlotte M. Price, and others for an injunction. From a judgment of dismissal on demurrer as to defendant Price, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment reversed and order sustaining demurrer set aside.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, and Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for appellants.

Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal of the action as to Charlotte M. Price, one of the defendants. The order of dismissal was made upon plaintiff's refusal to amend after demurrer sustained to plaintiffs' second amended complaint.

The facts set out in the second amended complaint are substantially as follows: That the defendant Indio levee district, a regularly organized levee district under the laws of the state of California, by its trustees, constructed a dam across the natural channel of White Water river, a natural waterway, and also above this dam cut a new channel through a natural ridge which intervened between the course of the river and the lands of the plaintiffs, and which always theretofore had protected such lands from the flood waters as well as the ordinary flow of said river, and that the construction of this dam and the cut or channel through the intervening ridge turned the waters of the river, particularly in seasons of high water, into this new channel and upon and over the lands of plaintiffs, to their great damage. The dam and cut in question are situated upon the land of the defendant Charlotte M. Price. Defendants, other than the Indio levee district, are owners of contiguous property affected by the change in this water course, and were made parties defendant because of their refusal to join with plaintiffs in prosecuting the action. The relief sought by plaintiffs is a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant Indio levee district to restore the course of the river to its natural channel. The demurrer of defendant Price is a general demurrer.

[1] We think it is obvious that Charlotte M. Price is a necessary party to this action, if it can be maintained at all, by reason of the fact that the relief sought could only be obtained by requiring and permitting the Indio levee district to enter upon her land to perform the work of restoration demanded. Hence the only question to consider is whether or not the complaint states a cause of action against the levee district. We think it does.

[2-4] It is alleged in the complaint that the diverting of the waters of the river from their natural channel was not done in pursuance "of any plan or improvement adopted by the said Indio levee district" or its trustees, and that the diversion "is unlawful and wholly without right." As against a general demurrer, this, we think, is a sufficient allegation, if such was needed, to negative any presumption that the work had been done in pursuance of any legal authorization therefor. We know of no authority vested in a levee district, or any other municipal or quasi municipal corporation, to change the natural channel of a water course so as to turn the floods upon adjacent property not naturally subject to its flow, without some express authority of law or of legal procedure; and, even then, the injured party must have his "day in court." Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. 41; Cloverdale v. Smith, 128 Cal. 230, 60 Pac. 851; Larrabee v. Cloverdale, 131 Cal. 96, 63 Pac. 143; Heier v. Krull, 160

Cal. 441, 445, 117 Pac. 530. A trespass, irreparable in character and of a continuing nature, such as is alleged in the complaint before us, may be restrained by a mandatory injunction, thus restoring things to their natural and original condition. Allen v. Stowell, 145 Cal. 666, 79 Pac. 371, 68 L. R. A. 223, 104 Am. St. Rep. 80; Rudel v. County of Los Angeles, 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400; Geurkink v. City of Petaluma, 112 Cal. 306, 44 Pac. 570; Island Rec. Dist. v. Floribel Alfalfa Synd., 167 Cal. 467, 140 Pac. 4. In the case last cited the court says:

"* * * We know of no cases where a court has refused to consider the complaint for want of facts where it is alleged, as it is here, that the defendants have dammed the channel of a stream thereby forcing the flood waters to seek another outlet which in the nature of things will most probably injure the persons seeking relief. Both pleading and proof of plaintiff in this case come within the principles announced in Rudel v. Los Angeles County, 118 Cal. 283, 50 Pac. 400. One may not dam the natural flow of a stream to the detriment of his neighbor by causing the water to empty upon the latter's land. Prohibitory injunction will issue where the damage is threatened and mandatory injunction to remove the cause when some injury has been done. Allen v. Stowell, 145 Cal. 666, 104 Am. St. Rep. 80, 68 L. R. A. 223, 79 Pac. 371."

Respondent Price offers no argument against the doctrines stated. Indeed, the only point urged in respondent's brief against the sufficiency of the complaint is that the facts pleaded show an estoppel to maintain the action by reason of laches on the part of plaintiffs in protesting against the acts complained of. Stated in respondent's own words, her contention is that—

"Admitting the allegations of the second amended complaint to be true, yet appellants are not entitled to the mandatory injunction they seek since they have stood by while the development was made for public use, and have suffered it to proceed at large expense to successful operation, having reasonable cause to believe it would affect their own property, and have allowed this respondent to acquire certain property rights, depending upon said improvement remaining permanent."

[5-8] For the purposes of this appeal we must not only admit the allegations of the complaint to be the truth, but the whole truth. In other words, we cannot, on considering the sufficiency of the complaint, infer or presume the existence of facts not pleaded. And we are unable to find in the complaint the basis for respondent's assertion that the work complained of was for public use, or that it was prosecuted at great expense, or that the property rights of the defendants would be greatly affected by plaintiffs' delay in commencing action. It is shown by the complaint that the dam and excavation work was done in the spring and summer of 1915, that the damage complained of occurred in January and February of 1916, and that the action was not instituted until January, 1917. But the action was begun within the period of the statute of limitations, and no presumption of laches can arise within that period, in the absence of special pleading of facts demanding an earlier protest. Furman v. Craine, 18 Cal. App. 47, 121 Pac. 1007; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; Ex-Mission L. & W. Co. v. Flash, 97 Cal. 610, 32 Pac. 600; Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 Pac. 467; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 Pac. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520; Meigs v. Pinkham, 159 Cal. 104, 111, 112 Pac. 883. We do not question that if the complaint disclosed a state of facts which would amount to an equitable estoppel of plaintiffs' action the point could be raised by general demurrer. But where, as here, the existence of the laches depends upon matters extraneous to the record, they should be presented by answer. There can be no dispute as to the correctness of the doctrine affirmed by the authorities cited by respondent, and as particularly laid down in Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 415-429, 147 Pac. 567, 573:

"That where a person has suffered property belonging to him and under his control to be taken and devoted to a public use by one engaged in administering such use, and the matter has gone on so far that the beneficiaries thereof rely on its continuance and adjust their affairs accordingly, such owner having knowledge thereof and making no objection or protest, this conduct will be regarded by the courts as a dedication by such owner of the property to the particular public use, and he cannot thereafter interrupt nor prevent the same, his only remedy being to seek compensation for the property he has thus allowed to be taken."

[9] Such a state of facts, however, does not appear from the complaint demurred to; and it was not incumbent upon the pleader to allege his diligence in prosecuting the action. Estoppel is usually purely a matter of defense, and cannot be raised, even on the trial, unless pleaded, much less by general demurrer to a complaint that does not clearly show facts constituting an estoppel. Burk v. City of Santa Cruz, 163 Cal. 807, 127 Pac. 154; C Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982; Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 125 Pac. 258.

The judgment of dismissal as to the defendant Price is reversed, and the order sustaining demurrer set aside.

KEMPTON et al. v. FLORIBEL LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO. et al. (Civ. 3098.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, March 8, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 6, 1920.)

1. Corporations — 264 — Limitations did not run against action against stockholder for payments to corporation until election to treat contract as rescinded.

Where corporation contracting to sell land could not convey title on completion of payments, and purchaser elected to treat the corporation's inability and refusal as a rescission of the contract and sued for the return of the payments, held, the action was not on the contract, but on the new obligation to repay created by plaintiff's election; and hence suit on stockholder's liability, brought within three years thereafter, was not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 359, though brought more than three years after making of contract.

2. Vendor and purchaser — 342 — Purchaser's remedies on vendor's failure to convey stated.

When vendor will not or cannot convey according to contract terms, the purchaser may sue for breach, or in equity for specific performance or alternative damages, or may treat the contract as rescinded by consent and sue at law for purchase money paid, to be recovered as money had and received, and, if plaintiff is willing to waive all claims for equitable relief and damages, the contract is extinguished as fully as if performed under Civ. Code, §§ 1689, 1691.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by M. Gertrude Spearman Kempton and another against the Floribel Land & Improvement Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants Cerf Rosenthal and Samuel Savannah appeal on the judgment roll. Judgment affirmed.

Albert Picard, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Clarence E. Todd, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BRITAIN, J. The appeal is on the judgment roll. The only matter to be determined is whether or not the plaintiff's cause of action was barred as to appealing stockholders of the defendant corporation under facts appearing in the complaint and findings.

The plaintiffs sued the corporation and the two principal stockholders. It was alleged that in 1911 the corporation entered into a contract set forth as an exhibit, to convey to the plaintiffs, upon their payment in installments of $750, a lot of land in Marin county. Payments aggregating $675 were made under the contract, and on July 16, 1917, the plaintiffs tendered the balance, demanding conveyance. The defendant corporation refused to convey, and it cannot do so. It was alleged "that plaintiffs now elect to treat said inability and refusal of said defendant to perform said contract as a rescission by said defendant Floribel Land & Improvement Company, a corporation, of said contract, as of date July 16, 1917." It was further alleged that up to the date of the so-called rescission the plaintiffs had performed all the obligations of the contract binding on them, and that in performance of the contract they had paid to the corporation the various sums of money aggregating $675, "which said sums, by said inability and refusal of defendant as aforesaid, became and are the property of these plaintiffs, in the hands of the defendant corporation." The prayer was in terms for the return of the money paid, with interest from the respective dates of payment. The findings, conclusions of law, and judgment followed the allegations of the complaint, except that interest was allowed on the aggregate amount of the payments from July 16, 1917. By demurrer the appellants pleaded the bar of the statute of three years against stockholders' liability. Code Civ. Proc. § 359.

[1, 2] The Code section has received frequent consideration by the Supreme Court in cases which have made familiar the clear distinction between the accrual of a cause of action on an existing obligation of the corporation and the incurring of the liability of the obligation by the corporation, from which latter point the time begins to run in favor of the stockholder on his collateral statutory liability. Under these cases the bar of the statute may be raised in favor of the stockholder before suit can be brought on an original contract of the corporation, which does not mature or is not broken by the corporation until more than three years after its date when the obligation is incurred. These cases were collected and reviewed in a very recent decision. Chambers v. Farnham (February 6, 1920) 187 Pac. 732.

In that case the suit was against the stockholders only; a prior judgment against the corporation being relied upon as establishing the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiffs from injuries caused their crops by the breach of a condition of a lease from the corporation to them. In reliance upon two other cases, the plaintiffs in that case contended the statute had not run against the stockholders, because, they asserted, the action was upon an implied contract which arose at the time the damages were sustained. Commenting on this claim, in his able opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Angellotti said:

"Nothing said in Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 98, 65 Pac. 1094, or in Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 171 Cal. 500, 153 Pac. 939, in discussing Yule v. Bishop, supports counsel in this regard. The decision in Yule v. Bishop, supra, was based upon the ground that under our statutes and decisions the original obligation of the corporation had been extinguished by payment by the indorser of a note of the corporation, such a payment by a surety being held to be 'full performance' of the obligation within the meaning of section 1473, Civil Code. * * * Of course, there is no analogy between such a case and one where the plaintiff's only possible claim is for damages for a breach of an obligation created by a contract which has in no way been performed or extinguished." Chambers v. Farnham, 187 Pac. 733.

The present case is not one where the plaintiffs' only possible claim is for damages for the breach of the obligation, nor was the obligation one which had not been extinguished. When it becomes clear that the vendor will not or cannot convey in accordance with the terms of his contract, the vendee may sue for damages for the breach, or he may sue in equity for specific performance or alternative damages, or he may treat the contract as rescinded by consent and sue at law for the money theretofore paid on account of the purchase price of the land, to be recovered, not as damages, but as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff is willing to waive all claims for equitable relief and for damages, the contract is extinguished as fully as it might have been by full performance. Civ. Code §§ 1689, 1691. As was said in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Shaw in 1917:

"The general rule, where performance of a contract to convey is due and the vendor refuses to perform it, or fails to perform on being duly requested to do so, is that the vendee may, if he chooses, treat such breach as an abandonment and termination of the contract and may then abandon it himself, and, 'the contract having thus come to an end, he may sue at law to recover what he has paid, in an action for money had and received; for, the contract being at an end, the vendor holds money of the vendee to which he has no right, and to repay which, therefore, the law implies his promise.'" San Diego Construction Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 548-553, 166 Pac. 325, 327.

In such a case the action is not on the original contract upon which the obligation of the stockholders, as well as of the corporation, was fixed at its date, but upon an entirely new obligation to repay the plaintiffs money which was not incurred until the plaintiffs elected to relieve the corporation from the old obligation. Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co., 115 Cal. 141, 46 Pac. 899; Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 680-685, 130 Pac. 432.

"A cause of action is not upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing, within the meaning of the Code, merely because it is in some way remotely or indirectly connected with such an instrument, or because the instrument would be a link in the chain of evidence establishing the cause of action. In order to be founded upon an instrument in writing, the instrument must, itself, contain a contract to do the thing for the nonperformance of which the action is brought." McCarthy v. Mt. Tecarte Land Co., 111 Cal. 328, 43 Pac. 956.

These authorities show that the present case is within the reason of the rule announced in Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 68, 65 Pac. 1094, and not within that on which Chambers v. Farnham, 187 Pac. 732, was decided. The action was not on the old obligation to convey, but on the new obligation to repay money to which the plaintiffs were entitled. The action was brought within three years from the time that obligation was incurred by the corporation and the stockholders incurred as principals the same obligation at the same time. The application of these rules in the particular case works no injustice. The appellant stockholders in the form of a corporation in effect were carrying on what in substance amounted to a limited partnership. When the original contract was made when the plaintiffs during a period of six years were paying to the corporation the small installments on the purchase price of the lot, when the corporation refused either to convey or to pay back the plaintiffs' money, and up to the time of the judgment, the appellants in equal shares owned 29,980 shares of the 30,000 shares into which the corporate stock was divided.

The appellants had the benefit of the payments and should repay to them the plaintiffs' money as required by the judgment. It was in accordance with the law and is affirmed.

RECLAMATION BOARD v. CHAMBERS,
State Controller. (Civ. 2120.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 10, 1920. Modified April 8, 1920.)

1. States — § 114—Appropriation for benefit of drainage district not gift of public money to individuals or corporations.

Act May 27, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1209), making an appropriation for the benefit of Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district in connection with a particular project of that district which is a public agency created by Act Dec. 24, 1911 (St. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 117), as amended and supplemented by Act May 26, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 252), Act June 9, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1338), and Act May 27, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1122), does not violate Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting gifts of public money to individuals or corporations, though before its passage an assessment on account of such project had been made and assessors appointed, and though the prior law contemplated taxation of the landowners within the district.

2. Statutes 114—Work of reclamation board under act creating drainage district held public work.

The work of the reclamation board under the provisions of the act creating the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district (Act Dec. 24, 1911 [St. 1911, Extra Sess., p. 117], as amended) is a public work inaugurated by the state for a public purpose primarily to aid navigation, and also to prevent floods and the destruction of property and reclaim land, especially in view of Reclamation Act 1915, § 7, declaring that the state and the people thereof had a primary and supreme interest in such work.

3. Constitutional law 70(1) — Amount of contribution to public improvement a legislative question not reviewable by court.

The amount that the state should contribute toward the cost of a project of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district is a matter solely for the determination of the Legislature, and not subject to review by the courts.

4. Drains 10—Manner of paying for improvement by drainage district within legislative discretion.

As the work done by the reclamation board in behalf of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district is carried on by the state, and all property acquired is state property, the manner of paying for it is solely a matter of legislative discretion, and the state may, if it elects, pay all the cost, or place it upon land specially benefited, or divide it between the landowners and the state in such proportions as it deems equitable.

5. Statutes 95(1)—Appropriation for drainage district not invalid as releasing indebtedness of landowners to district.

Act May 27, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1209), making an appropriation for a project of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 25, prohibiting local or special laws releasing or extinguishing any indebtedness of a municipal corporation, though prior to its passage an assessment on account of such project had been made and assessors appointed, as under Reclamation Board Act, §§ 13 and 14, there is no lien on land or legal liability on the owner of land in the district until the benefits are apportioned on each tract of land, and the landowners have an opportunity to object, and the list has been deposited with the county treasurer.

Original application by the Reclamation Board for a writ of mandate directed to John S. Chambers, as Controller of the State of California. Writ granted.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, and Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

James L. Atteridge (Wesley E. Marten, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as state controller, to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $100, payable out of the appropriation of $10,000 made by the act of the Legislature approved May 27, 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 1209.

This act was passed, as expressed in section 1 thereof, for the purpose of co-operation in the construction of the public works included in and provided for by that certain project heretofore adopted by the reclamation board, known as Sutter Butte by-pass project No. 6 of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district. The act appropriates for the benefit of the said district, in connection with the said Sutter Butte by-pass project No. 6, the sum of $3,000,000, payable over a term of years, $10,000, however, of which appropriation, by the provisions of said act, was to take effect and be available immediately upon said act becoming a law.

The refusal of the respondent to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner for the amount named in the petition is based on the claim that the money appropriated by this statute is a gift, and that the said appropriation of $3,000,000 is in violation of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that:

"The Legislature shall have no power * * * to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever"

—and also upon the further claim that the appropriation violates section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, which declares that:

"The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * 16. Releasing or extinguishing, in whole or in part, the indebtedness, liability, or obligation of any corporation or person to this state, or to any municipal corporation therein."

It appears from the petition that the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district is a public agency or mandatory created by an act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved December 24, 1911 (Stats. 1911, Extra Session, p. 117), as amended and supplemented by the act of May 26, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 252), and as further amended and supplemented by the act of June 9, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1338), and as further amended and supplemented by the act of May 27, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1122), which original act of December 24, 1911, as amended and supplemented by the acts hereinbefore mentioned, is known, designated, and referred to as the "Reclamation Board Act," as provided in section 31 of said act so amended and supplemented. That the reclamation board referred to in the petition was created and exists as provided for by said Reclamation Board Act, and that the management and control of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district is vested in the reclamation board.

It further appears from the petition that the reclamation board, in accordance with the provisions of section 13 of the "Reclamation Board Act," did on the 6th day of November, 1917, adopt and determine upon a certain portion or project of the plans to be carried out by the said board in the said Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, and did designate the same by the name and number of "Sutter Butte by-pass project No. 6," and did make and adopt its order and resolution for the levying of an assessment in the sum of $14,993,190 upon the lands embraced within the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district to be benefited thereby as might be determined in the manner provided by law, and did direct that the said assessment be known and designated as "Sutter Butte by-pass assessment No. 6," and did appoint three assessors for the purpose of making said assessment, as provided by the Reclamation Board Act.

The said plans and resolution were amended in sundry particulars, and on December 27, 1918, the reclamation board did pass and adopt amended plans and estimates for said "Sutter Butte by-pass assessment No. 6." By this amendment the board reduced the amount of said assessment from $14,993,190 to the sum of $10,624,522.25. This assessment was again amended and revised by the board on the 11th day of August, 1919, when the same was fixed at the sum of $11,995,578.71.

As appears from the foregoing, an assessment had been ordered and assessors duly appointed prior to the passage of the act of May 27, 1919, making the appropriation now in question. Section 15 of the act of June 9, 1915, after providing for the deposit of money collected and the paying out of the same on warrants of the state controller, contains the following provision:

"Drafts of the reclamation board may be presented to the controller and warrants drawn, as aforesaid, against the funds to be raised by an assessment as soon as the reclamation board has passed its order or resolution for the levy of such assessment and appointed the assessors therefor." Stats. 1915, p. 1351.

In view of this provision it is contended by the respondent that, inasmuch as the reclamation board had prior to the making of this appropriation, to wit, on December 27, 1918, ordered an assessment of $10,624,522.25 to be levied and assessed upon the lands within the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district to be benefited thereby, and had appointed the assessors therefor, a liability was thereby imposed upon the landowners, and that this debt and liability had accrued as the debt and liability of the landowners prior to the time at which the Legislature made the appropriation now in question. That this appropriation of $3,000,000, made after the debt and liability of the landowners had been thus established in favor of the reclamation board, was a gift, in that it was the voluntary payment by the Legislature of the legally accrued debt and liability of these landowners, and as such "a gift of public money" in violation of the Constitution of the state.

[1, 2] With this contention of the respondent we cannot agree. In no manner can we hold that this appropriation is in violation of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, which prohibits the Legislature from making a gift or lending the credit of the state to "any individual, association, municipal or other corporation whatever." The work being done by the reclamation board, under the provisions of the act creating the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, is a public work inaugurated by the state of California for a great public purpose, which public purpose is primarily to aid navigation and restore the Sacramento river to its former navigable condition, and also for the purpose of the prevention of disastrous floods, the prevention of the destruction of property, and incidentally for the reclamation of land.

In speaking of districts of the character of the one here, the Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207, said:

"It is unnecessary to repeat the reasons set forth in the decisions in those cases [cases cited], by which the conclusion there reached was expressed, to the effect that such districts are, in strictness, not corporations at all, but rather governmental agencies to carry out a specific purpose, the agency ceasing with the accomplishment of the purpose. But, additionally, it may be said that the likeness of these agencies to corporations is superficial, and that the similitude—for it is no more than this—ceases if consideration be paid to the fact that the state could accomplish this very work without organizing a district as such at all, and without giving the landowners within the district any voice in the selection of the managers or trustees. Thus it would be perfectly legal and competent for the Legislature, delimiting a tract of land, itself to appoint a commissioner or commissioners to perform all of the functions which, under the existing schemes, are performed by the trustees and the assessors."

That the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district is more closely related to the state than the ordinary drainage district clearly appears from section 7 of the Reclamation Act of 1915, which declares that:

"The state of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest in having erected, maintained, and protected on the banks of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and the by-passes and overflow channels and basins mentioned herein, good and sufficient levees and embankments or other works of reclamation, adequately protecting the lands overflowed or subject to overflow by said streams, and confining the waters of said rivers, tributaries, by-passes and overflow channels and basins within their respective channels and boundaries, and it shall be the duty of the reclamation board at all times to enforce on behalf of the state of California and the people thereof the erection, maintenance and protection of such levees, embankments and channel rectification as will, in their judgment, best serve the interests of the state of California. The purposes and objects of this act are to carry into effect the plans of the California debris commission with such modifications and amendments and such additional plans as have been or may hereafter be adopted by the reclamation board for the control of the flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers and their tributaries and said basins, and to vest in said reclamation board control and jurisdiction over said plans." Stats. 1915, p. 1340.

As said by this court in Argyle Dredging Co. v. Chambers, 181 Pac. 84:

"We then have an institution, a state agency, created by the state, under the exclusive control and management of the state, administered by officers appointed by the Governor of the state, and engaged in an enterprise of statewide concern—the act itself providing that 'the state of California and the people thereof are hereby declared to have a primary and supreme interest' in its objects and purposes."

The passing by the reclamation board of an order of assessment and the appointment of assessors prior to the date of the passage of the act making this appropriation, and the fact that the law in force at that time contemplated that the moneys necessary to do this public work should be raised in a certain manner, to wit, by taxing the landowners within the district, did not, in our opinion, deprive the Legislature of the power to change this mode of taxation and to provide other or different methods to raise the whole or part of the funds necessary to carry on and complete such work.

[3, 4] The amount that the state should contribute toward the cost of the work provided by the Sutter Butte by-pass assessment No. 6 is a matter solely for the determination of the Legislature, and is not subject to review by the courts, and that the Legislature in this matter had the power to make this appropriation we entertain no doubt. The power to construct these works is vested in the state, the work is carried on by the state, and all the property acquired by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise is state property, and the method of paying for the same is solely a matter of legislative discretion. The state, if it elects, may pay all the cost, or place the same upon the lands specially benefited by the work, or it may in its discretion divide the burden between the landowners and the state in such proportions as the state may deem equitable. The making of this appropriation was a legislative determination that the amount thereof was the proper sum for the state to bear for the benefits to be received by the state from this work.

That the Legislature had the power to pass the act of May 27, 1919, making the appropriation in question, thereby changing in part the policy that was theretofore adopted by the state as to raising the funds necessary to carry on this work, we think, is settled by the case of the County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 164 Pac. 613, which was a proceeding for a writ of mandate to compel the controller to draw his warrant in favor of the county of Sacramento in payment of a claim arising under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of 1915 for the establishment and maintenance of a bureau of tuberculosis under the direction of the state board of health; the act providing that any county establishing a tuberculosis ward or hospital should receive from the state $3 per week for each person in the active stages of tuberculosis and unable to pay for his support. The respondent refused to draw his warrant in favor of the petitioner, upon the claim that the statute, in so far as it authorized the payment of the sums specified therein to cities, counties, etc., for the purposes stated in the act, was in violation of sections 22 and 31 of article 4 and section 13 of article 11 of the Constitution. His contention was that the maintenance and support and control of county hospitals constitute duties and burdens which the law casts upon the supervisors and taxpayers of counties, and that the expense necessary to be incurred in supporting such hospitals is a county charge; that, the state having by the provisions of the Political Code transferred to counties the duty and burden of maintaining hospitals for the care, support, and treatment of the indigent sick, an appropriation of any money from the state treasury for the purposes mentioned amounted to a gift, and was therefore in violation of the Constitution.

This court sustained the constitutionality of the act, and, as to the Legislature having the power to change the policy of the state in reference to county hospitals, said:

"There is no doubt that the Legislature, by the legislation above referred to, intended to and did transfer from its own shoulders and so placed upon the counties the duty and burden of caring for, supporting, and treating the classes of persons mentioned. But this does not mean that the state has thus forever surrendered all control over those matters or the right itself to exercise full and complete and exclusive jurisdiction and control over hospitals for the indigent sick, * * *

"As above declared, the state may, if it so elects, assume entire control of the matter of caring for and supporting and administering aid to the classes of persons for whose benefit county hospitals are established and maintained. It has the right and power to establish and maintain, under its own exclusive control and management, hospitals for such purposes, and so entirely relieve counties of that duty and burden. And, having the right and the power to take upon itself entire responsibility for the support and the treatment of all such persons, it has the undoubted right and power to take exclusive or only partial control and assume corresponding liability for the care, treatment, and support of a portion or a certain class of such persons, or those only who are afflicted with a particular kind of malady."

[5] The respondent also claims, as before stated, that this appropriation violates section 25, subd. 16, of article 4 of the Constitution, which declares that:

"The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * 16. Releasing or extinguishing in whole or in part the indebtedness, liability, or obligation of any corporation or person to this state, or to any municipal corporation therein"

—his contention being that—

"The present appropriation attempts to specially release in part the existing liability of a quasi public corporation."

Conceding that this provision of the Constitution applies to legal obligations and debts arising from an assessment levied under the Reclamation Board Act, nevertheless we are of the opinion that the said provision of the Constitution has no application to the matter now before us. The passing of the order for the assessment and the appointment of the assessors did not create a lien upon the lands within the district in any manner whatever, and no lien on said lands could be created until the benefits were apportioned upon each tract of land and the landowners had an opportunity after notice given to make objections to the steps taken to fix such lien. At the time this appropriation was made the reclamation board had gone no further than to make the order of assessment declaring the amount to be raised, and appointed three assessors, whose duty it was to define the territory to be charged with the assessment. Section 13 of the Reclamation Board Act provides as to the proceedings to be taken by the assessors, and as to the hearing of objections by the reclamation board, and section 14 of said act provides that after such hearing has been had the assessment list shall be certified by the secretary of the board to be correct, and the list shall then be deposited in the office of the county treasurer, and "such assessment shall thereafter constitute a lien upon the lands so assessed. * * *"

In Argyle Dredging Co. v. Chambers, 181 Pac. 84, this court, in passing upon the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature of January 30, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 5), held that the Legislature had the power to authorize the state board of control to purchase warrants of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district "issued in payment for the expense of continuing the construction of the east levee of the Sutter by-pass," and that the state by said act "has simply added another class of securities in which the board of control may invest state funds." These warrants are the legal obligations of the district and will be paid out of assessments, when collected, and, when paid, the money goes back into the state treasury just as it would upon payment of any bonds purchased by the board of control. But there is no lien created upon the land of any landowner until an assessment list has been prepared, a hearing had, and the list deposited in the office of the county treasurer, and no legal liability rests upon the landowner until such mode has been followed and completed. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether the Legislature has the power to make an appropriation for the purposes mentioned after a lien has attached to the land. But, as no lien has yet been created upon the land, it is sufficient to say, under the facts as they exist, that the Legislature has full power to change its policy with respect to the method by which the public work being performed for the state, through the officers of the reclamation board, shall be paid.

In no view of the case can we see that the act making this appropriation violates any provision of the Constitution. The demurrer interposed by the respondent to the petition is hereby overruled, and it is ordered that the peremptory writ of mandate prayed for be issued.

In re PATTERSON'S ESTATE. (Civ. 2091.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 4, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 3, 1920.)

1. Descent and distribution ☞62—Either husband or wife may by agreement relinquish inheritable interest in estate of the other.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 158-160, authorizing husband or wife to enter into agreement with the other or a third person respecting property, each may, by agreement with the other, relinquish his or her inheritable interest in the estate of the other.

2. Frauds, statute of ☞56(7) — Agreement of husband with wife, relinquishing inheritable interest in her estate, need not be in writing.

Agreement between husband and wife, authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 158-160, whereby one relinquishes his inheritable interest in the estate of the other, need not be in writing, being controlled by no statute of frauds; section 159 merely requiring an agreement for immediate separation to be in writing.

3. Descent and distribution 62—Husband's agreement with wife, relinquishing his inheritable interest in her estate, shown by evidence.

Agreement between husband and wife, whereby he relinquished his inheritable interest in her estate, held sufficiently shown by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Ralph Charles Hennigan and H. M. Patterson each petitioned for letters of administration on the estate of Mildred L. Patterson. The petition of Hennigan was granted, and that of Patterson denied, and Patterson appeals. Affirmed.

Harry Davids, of Chico, for appellant.

Carleton Gray, of Oroville, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. Ralph Charles Hennigan and H. M. Patterson filed separate petitions asking for letters of administration upon the estate of Mildred L. Patterson, deceased. After a hearing, the petition of the former was granted, and that of the latter denied. The appeal is by said H. M. Patterson from the order granting letters of administration to said Hennigan and from the order denying letters to himself.

Mildred L. Patterson was formerly the wife of one Hennigan, who died in 1896, leaving five children, of whom Ralph Charles Hennigan was the oldest son. In April, 1900, she married H. M. Patterson, and one son, Orval Patterson, was born to them. Mrs. Patterson was a resident of Butte county, and died therein on January 27, 1919, leaving an estate, consisting of real and personal property of the value of about $15,000, and leaving no will.

The court found:

"That H. M. Patterson was not entitled to administer said estate, for the reason that he was not entitled to succeed to the personal estate of Mildred L. Patterson, deceased, or some portion thereof, and that the said H. M. Patterson had, during the lifetime of the said Mildred L. Patterson, deceased, and on or about the 15th day of May, 1911, entered into a valid contract with the said Mildred L. Patterson, deceased, according to and by the terms of which the said H. M. Patterson relinquished, released, and waived all rights, including his inheritable rights and interests in and to the property and estate of Mildred L. Patterson, deceased."

Appellant states in his brief "that the only issue to be passed upon is whether or not the evidence sustains the court's finding to the effect that appellant had relinquished his right to inherit as an heir of his wife," and contends that said finding is not so sustained. This contention is based, not alone upon the proposition that the evidence itself, assuming it to be competent, was insufficient to justify said finding, but also upon the proposition that an agreement between a husband and wife, by which the one agrees to relinquish his or her inheritable interest in the other's estate, cannot be shown by parol. In other words, the last stated point is that such an agreement, to be valid, must, under the terms of our statute of frauds, be reduced to writing. Upon this position the argument is advanced that the appellant is an heir of the deceased, and that therefore he is entitled, under the provisions of section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to letters of administration of his deceased wife's estate. The facts of this case are:

Prior to the marriage of the parties the appellant had worked on the farm of Mrs. Hennigan for two or three years. It appeared in evidence that at the time of the marriage deceased had personal property and real estate which varied in value "from a few hundred dollars probably to a couple thousand dollars," as claimed by appellant; to over $21,000 as contended by respondent. The second marriage proved to be an unhappy one. According to the testimony of the respondent, appellant, soon after the marriage, began asking his wife "to put her bank account in his name, so he could draw the checks." Finally she put her funds into a joint account, and there was some trouble because appellant failed to fill out the stubs in the check books when he drew money.

In January of 1901 the spouses purchased some land, a portion of which was afterward sold, and in 1903 a tract of 50 acres was purchased and held in their joint names. Shortly after the purchase of this property appellant began demanding of deceased that she deed to him one-half thereof, and threatened to bring an action to compel her to do so. He began drinking heavily, and would stay away from the home for two or three days at a time. In May, 1911, at the request of Mrs. Patterson, appellant, who had then been away for three or four days, came to the house to talk matters over. There were also present at that time Ralph Charles Hennigan, Robert Daniel Hennigan, another son, and Edythe Leona Beeny, a daughter of the deceased. Mrs. Patterson said that she and the children had come to the conclusion "to accede to his demands, and try and bring about peace in the family in general, and have a general understanding between us all, and that her chief aim was to keep a father for the boy, to avert a separation on account of the boy, and save him from a drunkard's grave, if she could." The result of the consultation was that Mrs. Patterson deeded to appellant 25 of the 50 acres standing in their joint names, he deeded the balance to her, and the bank account was divided between them. The agreement was that Mrs. Patterson should take care of her children by her first marriage, and that appellant would do the same by his son. Robert Hennigan testified that appellant said—

"he wanted one-half of that property in full settlement of his claims. He said he was going to have 25 acres of that land before he would come there and live, and that at her death he would have no claims on her property—or our property. That was to be our property then and always, whether she should die or not, and he was to have the 25 acres which had the bearing orchard on it for his and Orval's part. He wanted Orval to be his sole heir. He spoke of the money in the bank at that time. He was to have no claim on the personal property whatever. * * * Mr. Patterson said he was to waive the claim to the personal property because he got the bearing half of the orchard."

Ralph C. Hennigan testified that appellant said—

"he wanted it fixed, and a clear title to this property, so that at his death it would go to his son alone, and that we would have no claim against it whatever, and that her part that she kept would go to us solely, and that he wanted a half of it, instead of waiting until her death. Q. Was there any discussion at this meeting between Mr. and Mrs. Patterson as to the children being present and their not being present? A. There was. She told him that she wanted us there; she was morally bound to have us there and take part in this agreement and division of the property, because this property that she owned had come from money left by our father from leases on land and farming opportunities left to her by our father, and that we had a right to be there and to take part in the discussion in the settlement of these property rights. It was simply and nothing else but a settlement of inheritable rights on the part of the children on both sides; he insisting that he wanted his part of this property to be so Orval would be his sole heir at his death, and that we would be her sole heirs at her death. That was his declaration there."

Other witnesses—children of Mrs. Patterson by her first husband—testified that they were present when the real property mentioned was divided, and corroborated Ralph and Robert Hennigan as to the declarations by Patterson that he would relinquish his interest in the estate of his wife, and that he did so agree. It was further shown that, after the agreement and division of the 50-acre tract between Patterson and his wife, one of the children of the latter by her former husband assisted in farming her land, and that Patterson, after said agreement and division, never made any claim that he had any interest in her share of the property. In fact, it appears that, about one year after the settlement between appellant and his wife, the former left the premises of Mrs. Patterson, and that, on the 14th day of January, 1919, he filed a complaint in divorce, pending which Mrs. Patterson died.

The above comprises a sufficient statement of the facts for the purposes of the decision herein.

[1, 2] 1. That either a husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might, if unmarried, "subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other," is expressly confirmed by sections 158, 159 and 160 of the Civil Code. Section 159 provides:

"A husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property, and except that they may agree, in writing, to an immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them and of their children during such separation."

Section 160 provides that the mutual consent of the parties is a sufficient consideration for such an agreement as is mentioned in section 159. It follows, of course, from said Code provisions, that a husband and wife may enter into an agreement whereby the one or the other or both may relinquish his or her inheritable interest in the estate of the other. This proposition, however, is not disputed here, nor could it be, since the disposal of one's inheritable interest in the estate of another is no less an act involving a contract or an engagement respecting property than where such act involved the transfer of property in tangible form or property having a present tangible existence. In re Davis, 106 Cal. 453, 456, 39 Pac. 756; Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 276, 34 Pac. 775, 38 Am. St. Rep. 287; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 596, 599, 79 Pac. 272; Cullen v. Bisbee, 168 Cal. 695, 698, 144 Pac. 968.

Nor have we been able to find any provision in our law requiring that an agreement between a husband and wife, whereby the one relinquishes or transfers to the other his or her inheritable interest in his or her estate, shall, to be valid or of binding force, be in writing; and counsel for the appellant frankly say that, after considerable research, they have not succeeded in finding any California cases holding it to be the rule that such an engagement between husband and wife must be reduced to writing to be valid and enforceable.

Section 159 of the Civil Code, supra, more nearly than any other Code section or law to which our attention has been directed approaches to the requirement of a writing in such agreements between husband and wife as the one involved herein. This, though, may even be stating the proposition too strongly, for it is more conservative, and, indeed, more correct, to say that it is the only section specifically relating to contracts between a husband and wife respecting property, save the section as to the transfer under certain circumstances of the community property (section 172), which requires a contract between them to be in writing. But it is very clear that that section does not apply to the facts of this case. As shown, the agreement herein was not one of separation between the husband and wife. There was, in other words, no agreement between them to separate and to live apart from each other. The agreement was a part of a transaction resulting in a division between them of a certain tract of land which, it may be conceded for the purposes of this case, as counsel for appellant contend was true, they owned and held as tenants in common, and neither their agreement to divide between them said land, nor the agreement whereby each relinquished his and her inheritable interest in the estate of the other, contained a covenant or involved an understanding that they were thereafter to live separate and apart from each other or cease their marital relations. Section 159 of the Civil Code, so far as it requires any engagement which a husband and wife may enter into to be in writing, provides only that an agreement to an immediate separation must be evidenced in that formal manner. There is no other matter referred to in said section, as we read it, which is required thereby to be reduced to writing except an agreement between them to an immediate separation. It is very clear, therefore, that, if section 159 is the only Code section upon which appellant can rely for the support of his position that the agreement with which we are here concerned must be in writing, he is entirely without a foundation to sustain him. Nor is such an agreement within any provision of our statute of frauds, or within the fair import of any language thereof.

But we think the question has virtually been settled by our Supreme Court in a number of cases. See Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 596, 599, 79 Pac. 272; Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 719, 103 Pac. 190; Cullen v. Bisbee, 168 Cal. 695, 144 Pac. 968. See, also, Galbraith v. McLean, 84 Ill. 379; Kershaw v. Kershaw et al., 102 Ill. 312. In Perkins v. Sunset, etc., Co., Mr. Justice Melvin, speaking for the court, says:

"Under our law there can be no doubt that a husband and wife may enter into a contract with respect to their property whereby one may release to the other all interest, both present and in expectancy. Crum v. O'Rear, 132 Ill. 443, 24 N. E. 956; In re Davis, 106 Cal. 453, 39 Pac. 756; Von Glahn v. Brennan, 81 Cal. 264, 22 Pac. 596; Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 279, 38 Am. St. Rep. 287, 34 Pac. 775; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 598, 79 Pac. 272."

Again, in the same case, it is said:

"It will be seen by an examination of the authorities cited above that the utmost freedom of contract exists in California between husband and wife and that the courts will resort to circumstantial evidence furnished by the general conduct of the spouses with reference to their property in determining the existence or non-existence of a contract where the exact terms of the alleged agreement have escaped the memory of one or both of the parties to it. In the case at bar there was both positive evidence and also testimony as to facts and circumstances tending to show that the contract, whereby the husband remitted to his wife all his interest in that which would ordinarily have been the community property, was, and had been in existence for a long period of years."

Thus it will be observed that, while the California cases above cited and considered do not deal directly with an agreement of precisely the same character as the one here, nevertheless what is said in those cases applies with equal force to the case here, and upon the doctrine of said cases we feel persuaded that we must predicate the decision of the point under consideration here, particularly in view of the fact that, as we have shown, there is no express provision of our law requiring such agreements to be put in writing or nothing in the language of any provision of our law treating cognate subjects from which the conclusion may reasonably be deduced that the Legislature intended that they should, to be enforceable, be reduced to writing.

[3] 2. We think that the evidence as received is sufficient to support the finding that the appellant agreed to relinquish his inheritable interest in the estate of the deceased, if, indeed, he ever had any such interest. We need not recapitulate the positive evidence, of which a fair conspectus is above presented herein, in support of this conclusion. It is sufficient to say that the evidence, considered together with the conduct of the parties towards each other long anterior and down to the date of the division between them of the land mentioned, and the immediate circumstances surrounding the transaction eventuating in the division, appear clearly enough to be sufficient to have warranted the conclusion arrived at by the trial court, as evidenced by its findings, that an agreement was made by the appellant, as a part of the transaction resulting in the division of the land, that he would forever waive or relinquish any inheritable claim to or interest in the estate of the deceased. What appeared to be uppermost in his mind, in insisting on a division of the land, was the future welfare of his own son by deceased, he repeatedly saying that he wanted it understood that, upon his death, his share of the land should go to said son solely and that the children of deceased by her former marriage should not receive, upon his death, any part of his estate or of the land which he received by the division. The fact that he left the deceased about a year after the division of the land was effected, and the fact that he brought suit for divorce against the deceased, and in the complaint in said action, the record of which is in evidence here, he made no claim of any interest in the deceased's estate, merely referring to the fact of the division of the land, and describing both parcels, and alleging that each parcel so described was the sole and separate property of each spouse, were circumstances which the trial court could well have considered, and no doubt did consider, as tending to strengthen and support the positive evidence that the appellant, at the time the tract of fifty acres was divided between him and the deceased, agreed to relinquish his inheritable interest in the estate of the deceased.

Then there is some evidence tending to show that all the property of the deceased, including the money appropriated to the purchase of the tract taken and held in the joint names of the appellant and the deceased—the tract divided between them—was inherited in part by the deceased from her former deceased husband, the father of respondent, and partly acquired as of her community right in the estate of her former husband. This evidence might well be held to tend in some measure to support the claim of respondent that an agreement to relinquish his inheritable interest in the estate was made by appellant, since, considering the probabilities of such a situation, if it in fact existed (and it was for the trial court to determine whether it did exist), the court below could well have concluded or inferred therefrom that the appellant would readily assent to a waiver of a claim to any interest in property or an estate in which he in fact had no actual interest. In addition to the foregoing, we may call attention to the appellant's testimony, which would seem to go far towards confirming the claim that he did agree to surrender or relinquish any inheritable interest he might set up in his wife's estate. He testified:

"I had this conversation about inheritable rights with my wife probably six months after we separated. It took place on a bench in the city park in Chico, and I told her that unless she agreed to sign such paper I was afraid I would have to get a divorce, and it was probably six months afterwards that she finally told me she would not sign. This last conversation we had somewhere along in 1913. I don't remember the exact date, and the conversation was started by myself, because I wished to have the inheritable rights in both families absolutely settled in case of her death or my death, so there would be no come-back from either branch of the family, and that was my idea all along. I had that idea in my mind at the time of the division of the property."

We may also refer to the further testimony of the appellant that he had approximately $1,600 when he and the deceased intermarried, in April, 1900, and that the land they bought and took in their joint names, and subsequently divided between themselves, was "worth probably $12,000 or $15,000."

From the foregoing consideration of the evidence, both positive or direct and circumstantial, we think we are perfectly safe in the conclusion that the finding that the appellant agreed to surrender any inheritable right or interest he might have or claim or put forth in the estate of the deceased derives sufficient support from the evidence. At any rate, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that said finding is not sufficiently supported; and we are constrained to add that, all the facts and circumstances of the case considered, the conclusion of the trial court in that particular and the order following therefrom granting letters of administration to a son of the deceased, are not alone legally well grounded but involve a disposition of the controversy in harmony with the principles of abstract justice.

The order is affirmed.

CORNISH v. SUITER et al. (Civ. 2745.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 12, 1920.)

Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 334(2) — Misrepresentation that defendants were agents held to entitle plaintiff to recover payments made to them.

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1572, defendants, though not knowingly corrupt, were guilty of actual fraud upon plaintiff inducing him to contract to purchase land through them as agents for a supposed company by positively asserting in manner not warranted by their information that they were duly authorized agents for such company, and that the company owned the land, both of which representations were untrue, so that plaintiff was entitled to recover from them what he had paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Thomas J. Cornish against M. B. Suiter and B. F. Suiter. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas Scott and George E. Whitaker, both of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. From the findings of fact made in this case it appears that at various times between the 1st day of January, 1911, and the 10th day of July, 1911, the defendants represented to the plaintiff that they were the duly authorized agents of the owner of a certain tract of land in Modoc county, Cal., which land had been subdivided under the name of Willow Ranch Orchard homestead tract, and that said land was owned by the Tri-State Land Company. Believing and relying upon such representations, the plaintiff paid to the defendants on June 7, 1911, the sum of $250, and on July 10, 1911, the sum of $250, for and on account of the purchase of a ten-acre parcel of land in said tract. The Tri-State Land Company was not a corporation, but said name was in fact a fictitious name under which one Bernard C. Sitz pretended to be operating and conducting a business of advertising and selling and improving said land, as the defendants at all times well knew, but the defendants failed and neglected to disclose to the plaintiff that the said name of the Tri-State Land Company was a fictitious name, or that said Sitz was the person carrying on said business under said name. Neither in his own name nor in the name of the Tri-State Land Company was the said Sitz at any time the owner of said tract of land or of any part thereof, and he was not, nor were the defendants, at any time the agent or agents of the owner of said tract of land or any part thereof. At all the times of making the representations mentioned the information and knowledge which the defendants had did not warrant the making of said representations. The defendants well knew that one Kirkpatrick was in fact the owner of all of said land, and that Sitz, operating under said name of Tri-State Land Company, was not the owner, and that defendants did not have authority from Kirkpatrick to sell or dispose of the land or any part thereof. Prior to the making of said representations the defendants knew that Sitz would not be able to deliver deed for the land unless Kirkpatrick was first paid therefor. Prior to the making of such assertions and representations, Kirkpatrick notified the defendants that, unless Sitz first paid him for the land and received conveyances thereof, parties purchasing from the defendants would not get deeds for their land. Prior to the time when defendants made said representations to the plaintiff, Sitz presented to them a false and forged abstract of title which showed a fictitious and forged deed purporting to convey said tract of land from Kirkpatrick to Bernard C. Sitz, and purporting to be a copy of the records of the office of the county recorder of Modoc county, and the defendants believed the same to be genuine and relied upon the same. Said forged abstract of title was presented to the defendants about the month of July, 1910, and did not purport to show any conveyance of such land to the Tri-State Land Company. At two different times subsequent to seeing said forged abstract, and prior to June, 1911, the defendants were at the county seat of Modoc county, but made no investigation or inquiry concerning the true state of the record title to said tract of land. "As early as January, 1911, defendants knew that said purported abstract of title was false and forged, and that said tract of land was in fact owned by the said Kirkpatrick." Said representations were made by the defendants to the plaintiff for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to enter into a contract with them as the agents of Sitz to purchase the said parcel of land. The plaintiff was not informed at any time prior to July 11, 1911, as to the identity of the defendants' principal in any manner, except that they were the agents of the Tri-State Land Company. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the said Sitz, but believed the Tri-State Land Company to be a corporation, and the defendants to be agents thereof. In August, 1911, plaintiff offered to pay the defendants an installment of $20 on account of the purchase of said land, being an installment mentioned in the contract delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff in the name of Tri-State Land Company on July 11, 1911, but defendants refused to accept the payment of $20 and informed the plaintiff that their principal was and would be unable to convey or perform the contract for the conveyance of said land, and that the said owner of said land had refused to recognize or be bound by the acts of said defendants as the agents of said Sitz. Upon the facts found as above stated, judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for said sum of $500 with interest, from which judgment the defendants appeal.

The appeal, as presented by counsel for appellants in their brief, rests chiefly upon the claim that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. The findings of fact as made by the court are numbered I to VII. The so-called specification of insufficiency of the evidence, as contained in the bill of exceptions, merely states "that the evidence does not support the following findings filed in the action, to wit: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7." This specification is coupled with an assertion that all of the evidence in the case shows "that plaintiff knew that he was dealing with Bernard C. Sitz, who represented the Tri-State Land Company." As to the last-named proposition, there is no doubt that the defendants caused the plaintiff to believe that he was dealing with a corporation. This is confirmed by the fact that when, on the 11th day of July, 1911, they delivered to the plaintiff a contract, that document purported to be executed by the Tri-State Land Company as a corporation.

The so-called specification of insufficiency of the evidence does not point out any particular in which the evidence is insufficient to support any designated fact found. Turning to the brief for appellants in order to ascertain what particulars of that nature are relied upon by counsel, we find that they have quoted five sentences or parts of sentences selected out of the findings, and as to each of them counsel assert that there is nothing in the evidence to support the finding shown by the words quoted. These assertions by counsel are not in any instance accompanied by any quotations from or designation of any portion of the transcript to which we are invited to refer in order to ascertain what evidence actually was given bearing upon the point stated. Assuming without deciding that the specifications are sufficient to raise a question as to the sufficiency of each of the findings, the court is not under obligation to closely search through an extensive transcript for the purpose of overturning what seems to be a just judgment. Nevertheless we have read all of the evidence. It sufficiently appears that in taking the plaintiff's money the defendants pretended to be representing a certain corporation which did not exist; that the individual whom in fact they did represent as agents was, as they well knew, operating under the name of a corporation pretending to do business when such corporation did not exist. One of the findings selected for attack states "that as early as January, 1911, defendants knew that said purported abstract of title was false and forged, and that said tract of land was in fact owned by said Kirkpatrick." It appears that defendant B. F. Suiter visited the tract of land in the early part of 1910, and that the abstract and deed, which afterwards turned out to be forged, were shown by Sitz to the defendants before Mr. Suiter made that visit to the land. It does appear that Sitz had some kind of contract with Kirkpatrick, the owner of the land, and that as early as January, 1911, the defendants received from Kirkpatrick a letter in which it was very clearly implied, if not in direct terms stated, that no deed had yet been made. This was a circumstance which should have caused defendants to investigate the genuineness of the supposed deed which had been shown to them before they would take the responsibility of representing an ownership supposed to be based upon such deed.

Appellants claim that they should not be held liable in this case, because they were not guarantors of the title of their principal; that they merely received this money as agents for their principal to whom they accounted for the money so received. The fact is, according to their own testimony, that they sent to Mr. Sitz $300 of the money which they received from the plaintiff, and retained for themselves the other $200 as commission. In our opinion, this is not the ordinary case of an agent representing a vendor of real property. Assuming that defendants were not knowingly corrupt in the matter, they were none the less guilty of actual fraud because they induced the plaintiff to enter into the contract by positively asserting, in a manner not warranted by their information, that which was not true. Civ. Code, § 1572. They made it appear to the plaintiff that they were receiving his money as agents for a corporation when in fact such corporation did not exist. Under the circumstances, the defendants acted upon their own responsibility in accounting to Sitz as their principal in the transaction. The plaintiff is entitled to hold the defendants as principals to whom he paid money for which he has received no consideration. There are no errors in the court's rulings on evidence offered which would control the decision on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

BERTOLA v. ALLRED et al. (Civ. 3282.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 17, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 13, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨141—Purchaser's letter held a sufficient specification of defects, where so considered by vendor.

Where the vendor and his agent treated a letter written by the purchaser as a sufficient specification of defects in the title, it will be so considered, regardless of informality.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨141—Complaint as to title received by vendor sufficient, though contract required report to agent.

Where the purchaser made complaint of defects in title direct to the vendor, instead of to his agent, as provided in the contract, the vendor cannot complain, where he made no objection on that ground until after institution of action.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨143 — Purchaser held not to have waived defect in title, in view of vendor's representations.

Where the vendor and his agent assured purchaser that she would be allowed to maintain physician's office on the premises, despite covenant restricting the use of the land to residential purposes, and that the restrictions would be removed, the purchaser, though knowing of the restriction, did not waive it.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨134(4)—Covenant restricting use of property constitutes incumbrance.

Where the vendor informed the purchaser that she could maintain physician's office on the premises, despite a covenant restricting the use of the property to residential purposes, but the vendor was unable to secure modification of the restrictive covenant, it constituted an incumbrance on the title, and warranted the purchaser in refusing to carry out the contract of purchase.

5. Vendor and purchaser — 340—Purchaser entitled to recover all of down payment, though vendor had paid agent's commission.

Purchaser, where vendor was unable to secure removal of a restriction continuing an incumbrance, was entitled to recover from the vendor the full amount of the down payment, although vendor paid his agent his commission immediately upon the purchaser's making a down payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Mariana Bertola against C. S. Allred, with W. W. Kirby as cross-defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Allred appeals. Affirmed.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $500 in an action brought by her to recover from the defendants said sum for their alleged failure to perform the terms and conditions of a contract for the sale to said plaintiff of certain real estate. The cause was tried before a jury, and the facts of the case, upon which the jury rendered their verdict in the plaintiff's favor, were briefly these:

The plaintiff, being desirous of purchasing a residence in Ingleside Terrace tract, in the city and county of San Francisco, saw an advertisement in a paper to the effect that the defendant W. W. Kirby had houses to sell in said tract. She called upon Kirby, who introduced her to the defendant Allred as his principal, and together they went to view the premises. The plaintiff, who was a physician, informed the defendants that she desired to use the premises, if purchased, for her residence, and also for an office for the practice of medicine. She was shown at the time certain building restrictions imposed upon the tract at the time of its original subdivision, which provided "that no building or structure, except a dwelling house, or appurtenances thereto, designed to accommodate one family only, or which shall be used exclusively as a dwelling house, and not more than one such building upon any one lot, shall at any time be placed upon the above-described real property," and which further provided "that said real property shall not at any time be used for any purpose other than residential purposes." She inquired whether these building restrictions would be applied to the practice of medicine, and was assured by both defendants that they would not. A few days later a written contract for the purchase by the plaintiff of said premises was prepared and presented to her for signature. It called for an initial payment of $500, and provided among its several terms that 14 days from the date thereof were to be allowed the purchaser to examine the title to the property and to report in writing all valid objections thereto to the defendant Kirby, which objections, when so reported, the defendants were to have 90 days to remove. The defendant Kirby, who acted throughout as the agent of the defendant Allred, was by the terms of the contract expressly authorized to extend the time for the examination of the title and for the making of objections thereto for a period of not to exceed 30 days.

Upon reading this contract, the plaintiff saw that the word "office" therein had been erased, and the word "study" inserted, and upon objecting to this change was assured that said change would be sufficient to avoid the restrictions, and that everything would be all right. On October 10, 1918, the plaintiff signed said contract, but presently learned that its terms were not sufficient to so affect the restrictions upon the use of the property as to enable her to maintain an office thereon. She had several interviews within the next few days with both of the defendants, who repeatedly assured her that the objections would be removed. On October 23d she was called to attend the defendant Kirby professionally, he being confined to his bed with influenza, and she then talked with him about the removal of the restrictions, and he orally agreed with her that the time for making her objections to the title should be extended, in order to enable himself and his principal to accomplish the removal of the restrictions to her use of the property in part for office purposes. She also on the same day saw the defendant Allred, who assured her that the restrictions would be removed. On the following day she wrote to the defendant Allred a letter in which, among other things, she stated that—

"Our agreement to extend the time of final adjustment, as the agent, Mr. Kirby, is ill, will give time to settle the point you spoke of yesterday, namely, the restrictions on office and placing of garage. Have you seen the company about it yet?"

Shortly thereafter the defendants brought to the plaintiff a letter from the Urban Realty Company, which appears to have made the original subdivision of the property and imposed the building restrictions thereon, which letter was to the effect that the maintenance of a doctor's office upon the premises would be in direct conflict with the intent and meaning of the restrictions, which neither the manager nor the board of directors of said company had any power to change. It thus appearing that the restrictions upon the use of the property for other than residential purposes could not be removed, the plaintiff commenced this action for the recovery of the deposit which she had paid upon her signature of the contract for its purchase. From the judgment which followed in her favor, the defendant Allred prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that there is no sufficient evidence to support the plaintiff's claim that her objections to the title to the property were presented within the time specified in the contract, and that there was no sufficient or competent evidence that her time to present said objections had ever been extended. We are of the opinion that this contention is without merit. Almost immediately after the date of the execution of her contract for the purchase of said premises the plaintiff began insisting upon a more specific removal of the restrictions upon her use of the premises for office purposes than would be accomplished by the appellant's attempted evasion of the terms of said restrictions through the insertion of the word "study" for the word "office" in the plaintiff's contract. So far as her objections to the title could be made orally and could be made specific, she had urged these objections during the 10 days immediately following the date of execution of her contract, and during that time the defendants both assured her that they were endeavoring to bring about a removal of her specific objection to the title thus made. On October 24, 1918, within the 14 days provided for in her contract, the plaintiff wrote to the appellant Allred the letter from which the above excerpt is taken. While it is true that this letter is somewhat vague and uncertain as a statement, standing alone, of the plaintiff's objections to the title, it does specifically refer to the two points of objection which had been the subject of frequent oral discussions between the plaintiff and the defendants during the preceding 10 or more days, and, this being so, we think it was permissible for the plaintiff to show what the oral conferences between herself and the defendants had been, in order to explain whatever uncertainties may appear upon the face of her written communication. The main objection which the defendants urged to the admission of this letter in evidence was that it was insufficient as a specification of defects in title; but we think this objection was not well founded in view of the evidence in the case, which showed that after its receipt the defendants both treated it as a sufficient specification of the plaintiff's objections to the title, and continued for some time thereafter their endeavors to have the obnoxious restrictions removed.

[2] The appellant makes the further objection to the introduction of this letter that it was not addressed or sent to the defendant Kirby, the contract having provided that objections to the title were to be reported in writing to him. It is undisputed, however, that Kirby was merely the agent of the appellant Allred in the transaction, and hence that any report which was required to be made to him by the wording of the contract would be made to him as such agent only. This being so, the plaintiff's report to the principal directly, instead of to him through the medium of his agent, would amount to a sufficient compliance with the terms of the contract, and as to this also the appellant made no objection until after the institution of the action.

[3] The appellant's next specification of error is based upon his contention that, since the plaintiff's own testimony showed that she knew of the building restrictions upon the premises at the time of the execution of her contract to purchase the same, she must be held to have waived her objections to the title upon this ground. This contention might have some merit, were it not for the facts, as disclosed by the undisputed evidence, that the plaintiff was continuously and repeatedly assured by both of the defendants that the obnoxious restrictions would be removed, and that it was only in consequence of these assurances and in reliance thereon that she was induced to execute the contract for the purchase of the premises. This being so, it may not be contended that the plaintiff waived objections to the title upon which she was thus constantly insisting and was being repeatedly assured would be removed.

[4] The appellant further insists that the trial court was in error in its refusal to give to the jury a set of several instructions requested by the defendants, and which were based upon the proposition that the plaintiff's maintenance of an office for the practice of her profession upon the premises would not amount to a violation of the restrictions which had been imposed upon the use of said premises for other than residential purposes. That such restrictions constitute such incumbrances upon the title to real property as will justify a purchaser in seeking a recovery of his partial payment in the event of the refusal or failure of the seller to bring about their removal has been expressly held by the Supreme Court in the case of Tandy v. Waesch, 154 Cal. 108, 97 Pac. 69, and by this court in the case of Whelan v. Rossiter, 1 Cal. App. 701, 82 Pac. 1082, and in view of the law as laid down in these cases the trial court was justified in its refusal to give the defendants' requested instructions.

[5] It is finally urged by the appellant that the amount of the respondent's recovery was excessive in view of the fact, as shown by the evidence, that the defendant Kirby had retained out of the plaintiff's initial payment to him of the sum of $500 the amount of his commissions, viz. the sum of $230, and hence that the plaintiff's recovery against this appellant should not have been in excess of $270. We think, however, that the plaintiff, having paid to the appellant through his agent the sum of $500 upon a contract which both the appellant and his agent have failed or refused to carry into effect, would be entitled to a recovery of the whole sum paid by her regardless of any division of said sum which might have taken place between the appellant and his agent Kirby, and with which the plaintiff had nothing to do.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

DYSERT et al. v. WEAVER et al.
(Civ. 3176.)

1. Bills and notes — 470—Complaint sufficient to allege nonpayment.

A complaint, alleging that $91 interest had been paid, but that no other or further sums had been paid thereon, is sufficient to allege nonpayment of the note involved; the expression "thereon" obviously referring to the note and not to the interest.

2. Bills and notes — 467(2)—Unnecessary to allege that payee of note in possession is owner.

As it is presumed that the payee of a note in possession is the owner, a complaint, alleging execution and delivery of a note to the payee, is sufficient to state a cause of action without alleging that the payee was the holder and owner.

3. Costs — 260(1) — Damages awarded for frivolous appeal.

Where defendants' appeal was wholly frivolous and could not have been taken with reasonable hope of success, damages should be imposed on affirmance of the judgment.

James B. McCracken, of South Pasadena, for appellants.

Waldo, Root & Dysert, of Los Angeles (George E. Waldo, of counsel), for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action upon a promissory note executed by defendants. Plaintiffs are the payees named in the note.

[1] Upon the trial, when plaintiffs sought to introduce their evidence, defendants objected upon the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action. It is claimed that there is no sufficient allegation of nonpayment. The complaint alleges that "$91.87, the interest on said promissory note to October 7, 1916, has been paid, and that no other or further sum has been paid thereon." Appellants contend that the word "thereon" modifies the word "interest," and that this allegation amounts to no more than an averment that no more has been paid on the interest than $91.87. We cannot assent to this construction of the plain and unambiguous language of the complaint. We think it quite clear that the word "thereon" refers to the words "promissory note," and that the allegation is equivalent to an averment that all the interest that accrued up to October 7, 1916, has been paid, and that no other or further sum has been paid on the note.

[2] There is no merit in the contention that the complaint should have alleged that plaintiffs are the "owners and holders" of the note. In an action by the payee against the maker, it is sufficient to allege the execution and delivery of the note to plaintiff, without alleging that he is the owner and holder. It will be presumed that the payee of a note, in possession thereof, is the owner. Bank of Shasta v. Boyd, 99 Cal. 604, 34 Pac. 337; Locke v. Klunker, 123 Cal. 231, 239, 55 Pac. 993; Yellow Jacket, etc., Co. v. Holbrook, 24 Cal. App. 687, 142 Pac. 128; 8 C. J. p. 886, title "Bills and Notes," par. 1159.

[3] The appeal is wholly without merit. It is inconceivable that it could have been taken with any reasonable hope of success. Because the appeal is manifestly frivolous, appellants, we think, should pay respondents such damages as may be just. We consider $100 a proper sum to be charged.

It is ordered that the judgment be affirmed, and that respondents recover of appellants the sum of $100 as damages.

HERZER v. LEE et al. (Civ. 3152.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 16, 1920.)

1. Pawnbrokers and money lenders — 9—
Plaintiff held not seller, but merely to have advanced funds to enable defendant to purchase automobiles.

Relative to usury in a transaction, evidence held insufficient to warrant finding that plaintiff sold automobile to defendants, but to show that he advanced funds to enable them to make purchase from another.

2. Pawnbrokers and money lenders — 6—
Where lender did not get broker's commission there was no usury.

Where plaintiff made a loan to enable defendants to purchase an automobile and defendants paid a broker a commission for procuring the loan, but it appeared that, while the amount of the commission was added to the amount defendants were to pay plaintiff, there was no showing that plaintiff received any benefit and the broker received the full amount of the commission, the transaction cannot be attacked as usurious within the Personal Property Broker's Act because of payment of commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by George A. Herzer against H. E. Lee and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore, Abe P. Leach, Curt C. Darrow, and Frank J. Gordon, all of Oakland, for appellants.

Carl F. Wood, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought by him to recover possession of an automobile.

As to the facts of the case there is very little, if any, dispute, and they may be briefly summarized as follows: The defendant Lee wished to buy an automobile, and went to one Nelson, a dealer in automobiles, for that purpose. Nelson had such a machine as he wished to buy, the purchase price of which was $962.50. Lee had $300 in cash, which he was ready to apply upon the purchase price, but desired time and terms for payment of the balance, which Nelson refused to give, insisting upon a cash transaction. Lee thereupon applied to one H. P. Drueke, who maintained an office for loans and investments under the name of Auto Securities Company, for assistance in completing the purchase of the car. Drueke looked over the machine, and agreed that he would finance the transaction for Lee for a commission of $75, to which Lee agreed. Drueke then went to the plaintiff herein who, while not in any way connected with the Auto Securities Company, was accustomed to loan money in aid of transactions for the purchase of automobiles. It was admitted at the trial that during the year prior to the transaction under review the plaintiff had made as many as 500 loans of this character through various brokers who, from time to time, applied to him for such loans. Drueke was among the number of these brokers, and he had frequently, though not exclusively, consummated automobile sales through the use of plaintiff's money. The plaintiff appears to have had confidence in the judgment of Drueke with respect to the value of the security offered in such transactions, but does not otherwise appear to have ever paid him commissions for placing his money nor to have in any way shared in such commissions as Drueke received from time to time in these matters. The plaintiff, having in the present case agreed to furnish the money needed to finance the purchase of the automobile by Lee, the parties, including the plaintiff, the defendants Nelson and Drueke, met at the office of the latter, whereupon the following proceedings were had: A bill of sale of the car in question from Nelson to Herzer was drawn up and executed by the former upon receipt by him of the sum of $300 in cash from the defendant Lee, and of the sum of $662.50 in the form of a check from Herzer to Nelson. A contract of conditional sale of the automobile from the plaintiff to the defendants was then executed, which recited that the purchase price to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff for the car was the sum of $1,037.50, upon which there was credited the sum of $300, and upon the balance of which, namely, the sum of $737.50, the defendants agreed to pay certain monthly installments, and also agreed to pay 2 per cent. per month interest upon deferred payments. Upon the execution of this contract Drueke received possession of the automobile from Nelson, who, shortly thereafter and on the same day, delivered the same to the defendants. The sum of $75, which Drueke was to receive as his commission for negotiating this transaction, was handed to him by the plaintiff, the same being the balance remaining in his hands after the payment of the sum of $662.50 to Nelson. The defendants having failed to make the payments required to be made by the terms of their contract with Herzer, he brought this action upon said contract and breach thereof to obtain possession of the car. The trial court entered judgment in his favor, and from such judgment the defendants prosecute this appeal.

The only contention which the appellants make upon this appeal is that the transaction, as between themselves and the plaintiff, was usurious within the meaning and effect of the act generally known as the Personal Property Brokers' Act, as approved

April 16, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 969), and as amended April 21, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 978). The gravamen of this contention rests upon two propositions: First, that the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants, while in form and upon the face of the writings a contract for the purchase of an automobile, was in truth and fact a loan by the plaintiff to the defendants of the sum required to make the actual purchase of the machine from its owner, Nelson, for which loan the conditional sales contract with the plaintiff was merely the security, and hence that the plaintiff must be held to have been a personal property broker within the intent and meaning of said act; second, that the payment of the sum of $75 to the broker Druke by the plaintiff, Herzer, as a portion of the total sum advanced by the plaintiff to the defendants, and upon which total sum they were required to pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month, rendered the transaction usurious within the meaning and intent of said act.

In deciding the case in favor of the plaintiff the trial court made its findings in which the facts, as above set forth, were briefly stated, but from which the court concluded that the transaction was one in which the plaintiff had agreed to sell an automobile to the defendants for the sum stated therein, and was not such a loan to the defendants upon security as would bring the plaintiff within the terms of the act mentioned.

[1] With this latter conclusion of the trial court we are unable to agree, for while in form the transaction was such as the court has described it to be, the undisputed evidence in the case shows that it was never the intent of the parties that the plaintiff should become the owner of or should sell the automobile in question to the defendants. He never for a moment had possession of or any control over said automobile prior to said transaction, or thereafter up to the time of the institution of this action. The defendants throughout were intent upon purchasing the automobile in question from said Nelson, and the amount in cash which they were prepared to pay, and did pay, thereon was paid by them directly to said Nelson. From every aspect this transaction impresses us as one in which the plaintiff was engaged, as he had been upon at least 500 occasions during the year preceding, in putting out his money to would-be purchasers of automobiles from other parties upon the security of the purchase of the machine.

If the decision of this case depended solely upon the correctness of the trial court's conclusion as to the nature of this transaction it would follow that the judgment which it entered should be reversed; but the decision of that court does not depend solely upon its conclusion upon the foregoing facts, but upon the further consideration as to whether or not the transaction was in fact usurious within the meaning and intent of the Personal Property Brokers' Act.

[2] The part of the transaction which would render it usurious under the appellants' contention is that which relates to the payment of $75 to the broker, Druke, for aside from such payment the plaintiff is not shown to have charged an amount of interest in excess of that permitted by said act. The appellants, however, contend that the broker Druke was the agent of the plaintiff Herzer in the transaction, and that the payment to Druke of said sum was none other than the payment of a commission due from the plaintiff to Druke for services rendered in the course of the transaction.

Neither the evidence in the case nor the findings of the court support this contention, since it clearly appears that the sum of $75 which Druke received from the plaintiff at the conclusion of the transaction was the amount which the defendants had agreed to pay him for his services in financing on their behalf the purchase of the automobile from Nelson; and it further clearly appears that while this payment to Druke came through the plaintiff and was included in the amount of his loan to the defendants, it was not made by plaintiff to Druke as a payment for any services rendered by him to the former, and that as to said payment the plaintiff himself neither received nor retained any portion.

Upon this state of facts we are unable to distinguish this case from the case of Niles v. Kavanagh, 179 Cal. 98, 175 Pac. 462, 1 A. L. R. 831, wherein the Supreme Court holds, upon a state of facts almost identical with those of the instant case, that the transaction is not to be held to be usurious by reason of such a payment having been made to the broker negotiating the loan unless it shall appear that the lender was in some way beneficially interested in the charge through either receiving back some portion thereof, or through having the same applied, in whole or in part, to commissions due from the lender to the broker for services rendered in the transaction. No such facts have been shown in the instant case. The total sum to be received by the plaintiff for his loan of the money in question was the 2 per cent. per month interest upon the principal thereof, and with the amount which the broker Druke was to receive as commission under his agreement with the defendants the plaintiff had neither interest nor concern except as the amount of said commission was to be included in the total sum due from the defendants upon said loan. This being so, while the conclusions of the trial court as to the nature of the transaction were, we think, erroneous, its judgment was correct. It should therefore be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

STANSBURY v. FRAZER et al. (Civ. 2106.)

1. Highways §113(4) — Materialman's lien good as against assignee who financed contractor.

Where a road contractor entered into an agreement whereby he assigned the contract to one who financed him and who was to receive a specified portion of the proceeds, the lien of one furnishing material to the contractor, and who filed with the county the notice of claim required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, entitles the materialman to bonds due from the county to the contractor as against the assignee.

2. Highways §113(4)—Assignment by contractor who took subcontract does not defeat lien for supplies to subcontractor.

Where a road contractor assigned his contract to one who furnished the money to finance it and took a subcontract under his assignee, one who furnished materials to the subcontractor is entitled to money due from the county as against the assignee.

3. Highways §113(4)—Assignee of principal contractor who had received full payment cannot contest lien of subcontractor.

An assignee of the principal contractor who had received all that he was entitled to claim under his assignment cannot contest the claim of one who furnished materials to the contractor to funds due from the county.

4. Judgment §683—Denial of injunction held binding on assignee.

A decree, denying an injunction, prayed for by a contractor and his assignee, to restrain the county from delivering bonds due under the contract to a materialman, bars subsequent contest by the assignee of the materialman's right to the bonds.

5. Judgment §950(1)—Admissible as bar to defense after court struck reply pleading bar.

After the reply pleading a former judgment as a bar to the defense set up in the answer was stricken by the court because no reply was required, the judgment was thereafter properly received in evidence, though ordinarily the bar of a judgment must be pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Charles Stansbury against James L. Frazer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John B. Haas, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The controversy is over the satisfaction of a claim of plaintiff for the sum of $2,332. On December 29, 1915, one James L. Frazer entered into a contract with the county of Los Angeles for the construction of a highway known and designated as "Road Improvement District No. 39." For the work to be done by said Frazer the said county of Los Angeles promised to issue its bonds in the amount of $19,495 as provided in the certain act known as the Road District Improvement Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806). The work was completed by Frazer, and was accepted by the board of supervisors of said county; the bonds were issued and the proper fund created, and all the bonds were delivered in payment for said work, except bonds for the amount of $4,000, which at the beginning of this action were in the possession of the county treasurer. After said contract was executed between said Frazer and said county an agreement was entered into between Frazer and the plaintiff herein, whereby plaintiff agreed to furnish teams, tools, and other appliances required in the construction of said highway. Plaintiff complied with his agreement, and the evidence shows without any controversy—in fact, it is virtually conceded by appellant—that said services were worth the sum claimed for them. Before said contract of Frazer and the county had been completed by the former and accepted by the latter, and while the said $4,000 in bonds remained as aforesaid in the possession of the county treasurer, plaintiff served a notice in proper form upon said county and the treasurer thereof of his said claim, and demanded that a sufficient amount of said bonds be withheld from the contractor to satisfy his said claim. Thereupon an action was brought by plaintiff against said Frazer, said county, said treasurer, and the Pacific Coast Casualty Company to secure judgment for said amount, and to subject said bonds to the satisfaction of said claim. Thereafter on motion of defendants one Fred Hoffman and one W. M. Ledbetter were brought in by order made by said superior court. The cause was tried before the court without a jury. Findings were filed and thereafter judgment rendered:

"That the plaintiff, Charles Stansbury, do have and recover of and from the defendant James L. Frazer the sum of $2,332, with interest from the 13th day of November, 1916, and that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendant James L. Frazer, and the intervener Fred Hoffman, costs in this behalf expended.

"That plaintiff has a lien on the highway bonds in the hands of the defendant, John N. Hunt, county treasurer of Los Angeles county, state of California, for the satisfaction of said judgment.

"That said bonds be deposited by said county treasurer with the clerk of this court, and on payment of the judgment rendered herein in favor of plaintiff, Charles Stansbury, and the satisfaction thereof, said bonds be delivered to the intervener, Fred Hoffman."

There are other provisions in the judgment, but they are not involved herein. The only appellant in the case is said intervener, Hoffman, and the principal point made by him is based on the position that he became the assignee of Frazer's contract with said county of Los Angeles, and that he was therefore entitled to the entire consideration that was to be paid for said work, to the exclusion of said Stansbury for services performed by him under said agreement with Frazer. The theory of Hoffman is that he virtually became, by said assignment, the contractor for the performance of said work; that he was so recognized by the said county of Los Angeles; that he entered into a subcontract with Frazer, who was to perform all the work for the same consideration, less $1,200; that there was no contractual relation whatever between appellant and respondent; and that respondent's notice to the county and the treasurer to withhold said bonds was without any force and effect whatever.

The written instruments by which it is claimed said assignment and subcontract were made between Hoffman and Frazer are set out in the transcript. We deem it unnecessary to reproduce them. It is sufficient to say that the court found that the contract was not assigned absolutely as claimed by appellant, but that the agreement was that Hoffman was to finance the work according to the terms therein set forth, and that in consideration therefor he was to be paid the sum of $1,200. It may be added that to secure Hoffman for the money to be advanced by him a bond was required from Frazer. This accounts for the fact that the Pacific Coast Casualty Company was made a party to the action. The judgment, however, was in favor of said company, and it is therefore not interested in this appeal.

[1] We think the court was entirely justified in so interpreting the contract between Frazer and Hoffman. There is no doubt that Frazer performed the work and was recognized by said county as responsible therefor. Plaintiff, therefore, having been employed to perform said services by said Frazer, by serving said notice upon the county he effected an equitable garnishment of the balance that remained due to said contractor from said county. Section 1184, Code Civ. Proc.; Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 205, 157 Pac. 5; Goldtree v. City of San Diego, 8 Cal. App. 509, 97 Pac. 216; Olson-Mahoney L. Co. v. Dunne Inv. Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 159 Pac. 178; Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co. et al., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 Pac. 702.

[2] But, if we grant that the lower court was in error in holding that the contract between Hoffman and Frazer did not amount to an assignment, then the result will be the same under a proper construction of said sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. It can make no difference to Stansbury whether Frazer remained the contractor or became a subcontractor. He would have in either case the same claim upon the fund remaining in the hands of the treasurer. Hoffman, by assignment from Frazer, could secure no greater right to the remaining bonds or fund than if he had been the original contractor. But if the contract had been made by him and the county and he had entered into a subcontract with Frazer, and the latter had employed Stansbury, would it not be equally true that plaintiff, by the notice which he gave, could subject the remaining fund to the burden of his claim? As far as plaintiff is concerned the legal effect of the two situations would be the same. In either case we would have a fund in the hands of the treasurer due for public work performed, but unaffected by any other claim or burden, and thereupon subjected to garnishment at the instance of one who had been employed either by the contractor or subcontractor to contribute to said public work. We feel satisfied that said statute, enacted to protect the interest of laborers and materialmen, is broad enough to cover such a case.

[3] Moreover, it appears without conflict that appellant has not been aggrieved by the judgment in favor of plaintiff. Upon either assumption as to his relation to Frazer, he was to make a profit of $1,200. The record shows that he has paid out, under his contract with Frazer, the sum of $15,550.75. Under the judgment herein he is denied only the sum of $2,332 out of the entire issue of bonds of $19,495. In other words, he obtains $17,163, or a profit of $1,612.25, an excess of more than $400 over the agreed consideration. In view of this situation he surely should not be permitted to contest respondent's claim for payment out of the residue of the fund.

[4] Again, the very question of the right of respondent to subject these bonds to the payment of his claim was litigated in a former action wherein Hoffman was plaintiff and Stansbury and others were defendants. The prayer of the complaint therein was:

"First. That a preliminary injunction be granted, restraining the said board of supervisors, John N. Hunt, treasurer of the county of Los Angeles, Cal., and Walter A. Lewis, auditor of Los Angeles county, Cal., from recognizing the said assigned claim of Charles Stansbury, or, in any way acting in accordance with the notice of claim filed by G. S. De Garmo, the assignee of Charles Stansbury, and restraining the said Charles Stansbury and G. S. De Garmo and James L. Frazer from asserting said claim or from interfering with the issuance of said bonds.

"Second. That the court adjudge the claim of Charles Stansbury as assigned to G. S. De Garmo void and of no effect as a claim against the bonds to be issued for the payment of the work as provided in the contract made and entered into by the county of Los Angeles with James L. Frazer, a copy of which is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A,' and that the court adjudge the claim of Charles Stansbury as assigned to G. S. De Garmo a claim against which said Charles Stansbury bound himself to hold said Fred Hoffman, plaintiff herein, harmless.

"Third. That the court grant a permanent injunction, restraining the acts for which a preliminary injunction is prayed for.

"Fourth. That plaintiff recover costs by him herein expended, and that the plaintiff have such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet and just."

Judgment was rendered therein in favor of defendants, and no appeal seems to have been taken. We deem it unnecessary to set out the pleadings in that case, but we think it is quite apparent that the foundation of the plaintiff's claim was identical with the basis of appellant's contention herein. The two actions, in other words, involved the same subject-matter, and exhibited all the identities that are required to constitute the former judgment a bar to a subsequent action. Freeman on Judgments, § 252; Sunkler v. McKenzie, 127 Cal. 554, 59 Pac. 982, 78 Am. St. Rep. 86; Suisun Lumber Co. v. School District, 19 Cal. App. 587, 127 Pac. 349; Krzepicki v. Krzepicki, 167 Cal. 419, 140 Pac. 13.

[5] The rule is that the party relying upon a former judgment in bar must plead it where he has an opportunity. Wixson v. Devine, 67 Cal. 341, 7 Pac. 776. Plaintiff herein endeavored to comply with the rule by setting up said former judgment in an answer to appellant's pleading, but the court struck it out upon the theory that no such pleading was required in response to an answer; in other words, that a plaintiff is not required to plead a judgment in bar of a defense set up by a defendant. As stated in Wixson v. Devine, supra:

"It was not necessary or proper for plaintiff to plead his former recovery. It operated by way of estoppel to the defense set up by the defendant, and, as we have in our system of pleadings no replication to the answer, the estoppel could not properly be pleaded. Clink v. Thurston, 47 Cal. 30; Flandreau v. Downey, 23 Cal. 358."

The judgment roll in the former action was, though, introduced in evidence without objection. It is true that there is no specific finding as to the bar, but appellant has not complained of that, nor, indeed, could he, as the finding must have been necessarily against him.

We can see no merit in the appeal, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

STANSBURY v. FRAZER et al. (Civ. 2119.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 10, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⇐440—Trial court cannot, pending appeal, release part of bonds deposited to secure payment of judgment.

Where the trial court had rendered judgment for plaintiff and required the deposit of certain bonds until the judgment was paid, it could not, pending appeal from the judgment, release a portion of the bonds in excess of the amount of the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Charles Stansbury against James L. Frazer and others. From an order releasing certain bonds theretofore required to be deposited with the clerk pending payment of plaintiff's judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hooker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John B. Haas, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. On the 29th day of July, 1918, on the application of respondent Hoffman, the superior court of the county of Los Angeles made the following order:

"The motion of Fred Hoffman, by his attorney, John B. Haas, for the release of certain bonds now in the custody of the clerk of this court, having come on regularly to be heard on the 27th day of July, 1918, and, it satisfactorily appearing to the court that there is now being held by said clerk, $4,000 of street bonds and interest coupons attached thereto to satisfy a judgment in the sum of $2,332 obtained in the above-entitled action; and it appearing to the court that said amount is excessive and unnecessary to satisfy said judgment:

"Therefore it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said clerk release and deliver to said Fred Hoffman, or his attorney, John B. Haas, bonds in the sum of $1,000 from those certain bonds now being held in custody by him, being bonds in road district improvement No. 39, Los Angeles county, together with all interest coupons attached to all of the bonds so held by said clerk, and that the bonds herein ordered released and delivered shall be those last maturing."

This order was based upon an affidavit of John B. Haas, the attorney for said Hoffman, in which it was stated that a judgment had been rendered in said action against the defendant James L. Frazer for $2,332, and that an order was made by said court that certain street bonds in the custody of the county treasurer be delivered to the clerk of said court, and that in pursuance of said order said bonds were so delivered to said clerk, and that they are now held by him, together with the interest coupons attached thereto, and "that said amount is far in excess of the amount necessary to satisfy said judgment against James L. Frazer; that the said defendant Fred Hoffman has appealed to the Supreme Court from the judgment rendered in the above-entitled action, and that said appeal is now pending. Wherefore, affiant asks that an order be made, directing the clerk to deliver to Fred Hoffman bonds in the sum of $1,000 and all interest coupons of the bonds now in his control and in his possession as aforesaid."

It is quite apparent that this order in effect modified the judgment in the action from which an appeal had already been taken to the Supreme Court. But it is equally apparent that, pending an appeal, the lower court is without power to proceed further as to matters embraced in the judgment. Ruggles v. Superior Court, 103 Cal. 125, 37 Pac. 211; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 103 Cal. 582, 37 Pac. 513; Stateler v. Superior Court, 107 Cal. 536, 40 Pac. 949. In other words, the jurisdiction of the lower court in respect to the judgment is entirely suspended while an appeal is pending in the higher court. Stewart v. Taylor, 68 Cal. 5, 8 Pac. 605; Barnhart v. Edwards, 128 Cal. 572, 61 Pac. 176; Estate of Dean, 149 Cal. 487, 87 Pac. 13. We may add that these propositions are advanced in the brief of appellant, and no reply has been made thereto by respondent, probably for the reason that he can find no answer to make.

The order is reversed.

SMITTON v. McCULLOUGH et al. (FABER, Intervener). (S. F. 8905.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 30, 1920.
Rehearing Denied April 29, 1920.)

1. Equity ⌘60—Liens ⌘12—Priority in time not controlling except where claims otherwise equal.

Where successive conflicting interests, purely equitable in nature, are in all other respects equal, the equity prior in time prevails (Civ. Code, § 2897), but priority in time is not decisive where otherwise unequal, and is the last element for consideration when determining the priority of equitable claims.

2. Equity ⌘56—As equity regards substance rather than form, parol lien is not inferior to one in writing.

Since equity regards substance rather than form, if equitable interests in a subject-matter have been created, no inequality will result from the form or mode of creation, and an equitable lien created by parol agreement will not be inferior to an interest created by written assignment.

3. Assignments ⌘87 — Notice to holder of funds necessary to preclude bona fide purchaser.

Where a person entitled thereto assigns a fund in the hands of a third person, notice to holder thereof is necessary to render the assignment valid and effectual as against a subsequent assignee without notice and for valuable consideration.

4. Assignments ⚡10—May operate on fund to be created if potentially existent.

Where pledgee of corporate stock was by pledgor's exercise of option required to purchase the stock, the fund in excess of the debt secured by the pledge was subject to assignment made by the pledgor to intervenor, of which the pledgee had notice, prior to the exercise of the option, since the fund, though not actually in existence at the time of the assignment, had a potential existence.

5. Corporations ⚡123(4)—Notice of subordinate lien to registered pledgee necessary but not notice to corporation.

Where, under Civ. Code, § 324, requiring entry of transferee's name on corporate books to make transfer valid against subsequent bona fide purchasers, the pledgee of stock having an option to purchase procured the same to be transferred to him as pledgee, other persons claiming subordinate equitable liens thereon were not required to give notice to corporation; notice to pledgee only being sufficient.

6. Corporations ⚡123(9)—Rights of assignee of stock first giving notice to pledgee superior to prior lien.

The preference which priority of creation of a lien might otherwise have given plaintiff's claim is overcome by the fact that intervenor, though a subsequent assignee, first asserted her right to possession by giving notice to defendant pledgee of the stock, provided intervenor was an assignee for valuable consideration without notice of plaintiff's prior claim.

7. Assignments ⚡87—Bills and notes ⚡358—Chattel mortgages ⚡139—Mortgages ⚡155—Pledges ⚡24—Antecedent indebtedness is "valuable consideration" for security.

An antecedent indebtedness constitutes a "valuable consideration," not only for a transfer in satisfaction and discharge thereof, but it is also a "valuable consideration," within the protection of the equitable doctrine of bona fide purchase, for a transfer merely as security for a pre-existing debt, as respects not only commercial paper, but also mortgages, pledges, and assignments.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Valuable Consideration.]

8. Liens ⚡15—Policy of law against secret liens.

The policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges to the injury of innocent subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff in this action sued to establish an equitable lien on certain personal property, alleged to have been created pursuant to the provision of a parol agreement of the parties thereto, and to have the same declared to be prior and paramount to other liens which had been imposed upon the same personal property. Briefly stated, the undisputed facts of the case as revealed by the pleadings and proof are these:

In the month of September, 1916, one McCullough was indebted for money loaned to Smitton, the plaintiff, in the sum of $20,125. During said month of September, 1916, Smitton threatened McCullough with suit upon said indebtedness and subsequently agreed with McCullough not to sue; the consideration for Smitton's agreement to forbear to sue on the original indebtedness being McCullough's execution of a promissory note to Smitton, dated September 13, 1916, in the sum of $20,125, and McCullough's promise to give Smitton a lien on 28,500 shares of certain specified corporate capital stock as security for the payment of the note. For the purpose of perfecting said promised lien, McCullough, at the time of the execution of the note and the promise to give the lien, further agreed orally to forthwith transfer by assignment to Smitton 20,000 shares of the said stock and hold in trust for Smitton the remaining 8,500 shares of said stock and, as trustee for plaintiff, to sell said remaining shares and apply the proceeds to the satisfaction and discharge of an existing lien in the sum of $8,250, which had been previously imposed upon all of McCullough's shares of said capital stock. McCullough died without transferring to the plaintiff any of said shares of said capital stock, and never, by the sale of any portion thereof or otherwise, satisfied and discharged in whole or in part the pre-existing lien. Just before his death, on May 27, 1917, McCullough executed a written assignment of his interest in all of the said shares of stock to Della E. Faber by way of pledge to secure the payment of an antecedent indebtedness evidenced by a promissory note dated January 27, 1917, and executed to her by McCullough in the sum of $3,850. Della E. Faber intervened in this action, pleading her claim of lien and praying that it be decreed to be a lien on said shares of stock prior and paramount to any and all other claims or liens thereon save that of defendant Phillips. It appears beyond dispute that defendant Phillips came into and held possession of 25,000 shares of said stock as pledgee pursuant to the provisions of a perfected pledge which was executed as security for and simultaneously with the execution of a promissory note to Phillips in the sum of $15,000. As a part of the same transaction and for the purpose of consummating the pledge, McCullough delivered to Phillips two certificates of the stock in question representing an aggregate of 25,000 shares of said stock, which then stood in the name of McCullough, unincumbered, on the corporation's books, and, at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, McCullough by an instrument in writing authorized and empowered Phillips to cause said stock to be transferred to him as pledgee on the corporation's books. Accordingly, and thereafter, there was issued to Phillips, in his name as pledgee, a stock certificate representing 25,000 shares of said stock, and the same was thereupon delivered into the possession of Phillips and all the while thereafter stood in his name on the books of the corporation. Coupled and executed simultaneously with the contract of pledge, McCullough gave in writing to Phillips an option to purchase the said 25,000 shares of stock at any time prior to the maturity of the promissory note for $15,000, which was the basis and consideration of the pledge, at the specified price of $25,000, and, by the same agreement, McCullough was given an option to require the purchase by Phillips of the said stock at the same price. The latter option, the evidence shows, was, subsequent to the death of McCullough, exercised by the defendant Virginia McCullough, as executrix, and Phillips accordingly purchased said stock at the price stipulated, which was $10,000 in excess of the sum due and owing to Phillips.

It is an admitted fact in the case that the lien of said defendant Phillips is superior to the claims of the plaintiff, Smitton, and the intervener, Faber. The defendant Virginia McCullough has no personal interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, and evidently was made a party to the action merely because of the fact that she, as executrix of the estate of McCullough, rejected the plaintiff's claim based upon the promissory note of the deceased which had been presented against the estate of the deceased. The trial court rendered and entered its judgment, based upon appropriate findings, establishing three liens upon the shares of stock in question in favor of (1) the defendant Phillips, (2) the intervener, Faber, (3) the plaintiff, Smitton, giving preference by way of priority in the execution and satisfaction of each lien in the order stated. The plaintiff alone appeals, and only from that portion of the judgment which declares that the plaintiff's lien "is inferior and subordinate to the lien of said intervener," and which further declares "that the proceeds of said shares of capital stock be applied to a discharge of said respective liens in accordance with and as ranked by the terms of the judgment." The record shows, and counsel for plaintiff concedes, that but a single question is involved in the appeal and that "the question is simply one of priority."

Admittedly the claims of lien in question were not perfected in accordance with the formalities required for the creation of statutory liens, but, apparently by the application of the doctrine of equitable liens, the trial court found that the claims in question had ripened into subsisting securities. This, of course, must have been upon the theory that every express executory agreement which contains a promise, or sufficiently indicated intention, to make some definitely described or identified property security for a debt or other obligation will be regarded in equity as creating an enforceable charge upon and against the specified property. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 3, §§ 1233-1235. Assuming, as we must upon the record before us, but not deciding, that both claims are entitled to enforcement as equitable liens, plaintiff's claim of lien is subordinate and inferior to that of intervener Faber.

[1] The fact that plaintiff's lien is prior in point of time is not, under the circumstances of this case, decisive of the question of priority. True, where successive conflicting interests, purely equitable in nature, are in all other respects equal, the equity prior in time prevails. Civ. Code, § 2897. The time of creation, however, is the last element for consideration when determining the priority of equitable claims, and plaintiff's claim can predominate by reason of antedating intervener's equity only if the two interests are in all other respects equal.

[2, 3] Interests are equal in equity when each is entitled to the same recognition and protection by reason of possessing to an equal degree those elements of right and justice which are recognized and aided by courts of equity. Since equity regards substance rather than form, if equitable interests in a subject-matter have been created, no inequality will arise based upon their form or mode of creation, and therefore in the present case if, as the trial court found, plaintiff has an equitable lien upon the subject-matter thereof, the mere fact that it was created by a parol agreement will not render it inferior to an interest created in favor of the intervener by an assignment in writing. Nor does the fact that the intervener acquired a subsequent interest without notice of the plaintiff's prior claim in and of itself give the intervener any right to preference. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, §§ 683, 684. Where, however, a person entitled thereto assigns a fund in the hands of a third person, the rule is established in this state that notice to the holder of the fund is necessary to render the assignment valid and effectual as against subsequent assignees without notice and for a valuable consideration. Graham Paper Co. v. Pembroke, 124 Cal. 117, 56 Pac. 627, 44 L. R. A. 632, 71 Am. St. Rep. 26; Widenmann v. Weniger, 164 Cal. 667, 130 Pac. 421; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 695. Such notice may be either written or oral. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 696.

[4, 5] Of course, there must be a specific fund, actually existing or to come into existence in the future, upon which the assignment may operate, but "the fund need not be actually in being if it exists potentially, * * * if it will in due course of things arise from a contract or arrangement already made or entered into" when the assignment is made. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 3, §§ 1280 and 1283. Defendant Phillips held the stock in question subject to certain options, previously noted, and the option to require the purchase of the stock by said defendant Phillips was exercised and consummated in due course in keeping with the purport of the pledge agreement. Clearly, the fund resulting from this purchase had a potential existence at the time of the assignment by McCullough to plaintiff and intervener, and therefore defendant Phillips was not a mere bailee, but the holder of a "fund" within the meaning of the above rule. Under the facts of this case notice to the corporation was unnecessary. By virtue of section 324 of the Civil Code, when certificates of stock are transferred the name of the transferee must be entered upon the books of the corporation to render the transfer valid as to subsequent purchasers without notice. Nat. Bank v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 573, 580, 108 Pac. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 139. This requirement was fulfilled by defendant Phillips. No certificates of stock were ever transferred to either plaintiff or intervener; both being, at most, claimants of purely equitable liens. The corporation was responsible to Phillips, the pledgee, nor could plaintiff or intervener have secured any right against the corporation by notice to the corporation, or thereby have prevented Phillips from becoming the owner of the stock in accordance with his agreement with McCullough. While ordinarily notice of the assignment of shares of stock must be given to the corporation (Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence [4th Ed.] vol. 2, § 696), we can see no reason for requiring notice to the corporation under the facts of this case, which involves merely the rights, as between themselves, of two assignees of equitable interests; for the assignments in question were not simple assignments of direct interests in shares of stock, but were assignments of interests subject to the peculiar rights of an intervening third party. The rights of this third party were of such a nature that he, and not the corporation, was the direct holder of the fund upon which the assignment operated and notice to the corporation would have served no purpose. Notice to be effectual must be given to the person responsible to the assignor (Stephens v. Green [1895] 2 Ch. 148), and in this case the defendant Phillips was that person. The evidence shows that he, as the holder of the fund, had notice of intervener's claim, and does not show any notice to him of plaintiff's claim of lien.

[6] The preference, therefore, which the priority of creation might otherwise have given plaintiff's claim of lien is overcome by the fact that the intervener, even though a subsequent assignee, was the first to assert her right to possession, as far as was within her power, by giving notice to Phillips, the holder of the stock, of the assignment to her of McCullough's interest therein. The efficacy of this notice for the purpose of perfecting a priority of claim is, of course, dependent upon whether or not the intervener was an assignee for a valuable consideration without notice of the prior equities of the plaintiff. Dearle v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1, 38 Eng. Rep. 475.

[7] It is conceded that neither plaintiff nor intervener had, prior to McCullough's death, any notice of each other's claim of lien, but appellant contends that, since the assignment to intervener was made and executed merely by way of security for a pre-existing debt, intervener cannot claim the benefit of the above-mentioned equity for the reason, it is urged, that, while an antecedent debt may be valuable as a consideration between the parties, it is not a valuable consideration within the meaning of the equitable rule affording protection to bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers for value. The Elmbank, (D. C.) 72 Fed. 610; Citizens', etc., Bank v. Judy, 146 Ind. 330, 43 N. E. 259. Whatever may be the rule in other jurisdictions, that is not the rule in California. The law in this state on this question is well settled to the effect that not only does an antecedent indebtedness constitute a valuable consideration for a transfer in satisfaction and discharge of said indebtedness, but it is also a valuable consideration, within the protection of the equitable doctrine of bona fide purchase, for a transfer merely as security for a pre-existing debt. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 749. The earliest cases in this state held that an antecedent indebtedness was a valuable consideration to support the transfer of commercial paper as security, and rendered the pledgee thereof free from equities between the original parties. Payne v. Bensley, 8 Cal. 260, 68 Am. Dec. 318; Robinson v. Smith, 14 Cal. 94;

Naglee v. Lyman, 14 Cal. 450; Jones' Pledges and Collateral Securities (2d Ed.) § 128; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) §§ 480 and 749. While these cases dealt with a bona fide purchaser under the law merchant, the reasoning there adopted for holding the antecedent debt a valuable consideration was not based upon the peculiar requirements of commerce and mercantile business, and in Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335, 342, the general rule was definitely laid down, and has never since been receded from in this state, "that a mortgagee, in a mortgage given for the security of a pre-existing debt, is to be regarded in this state as a purchaser for a valuable consideration," and a subsequent mortgage given in security for an antecedent debt was held to prevail over a prior unrecorded transfer. In Fowles v. Nat. Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 140 Pac. 271, after reviewing the authorities in this state, the court held that a pledgee of shares of stock which had been transferred as security for a pre-existing indebtedness was a pledgee for value, and as such had rights superior to the owner of the shares who had intrusted them to the pledgor. The rule that a transfer as security for a pre-existing debt is a transfer for value, not only as between the parties, but as to third persons as well, is too well settled in this state to be questioned.

[8] The policy of the law is against upholding secret liens and charges to the injury of innocent subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers. Palmer v. Howard, 72 Cal. 293, 13 Pac. 858, 1 Am. St. Rep. 60; Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 297, 53 Pac. 911, 59 Pac. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371; Ferguson v. Murphy, 117 Cal. 134, 48 Pac. 1018. The intervenor, having given notice to the holder of the fund, must, under the decisions in this state, be held, as against plaintiff, a bona fide incumbrancer for value, and the trial court therefore did not err in holding plaintiff's claim of lien inferior to that of intervenor.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ONG MON FOO. (Cr. 2266.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1920.)

1. Criminal law § 1160—Truth of evidence determined for appeal by verdict and denial of new trial.

Question of truth in evidence in prosecution for murder is conclusively determined for purposes of appeal by verdict of jury and action of trial court in denying motion for new trial.

2. Criminal law § 829(3)—Refusal of instructions as to identity of defendant adequately covered harmless.

In prosecution for murder in first degree, where controlling question was defendant's identity with person who committed fatal shooting, in view of charges that unless defendant's guilt was shown beyond all reasonable doubt jury must acquit, etc., refusal of requested instructions directed particularly to question of identification of defendant as person who committed the crime, etc., was not prejudicial error.

3. Criminal law § 407(1)—Accusatory statements in connection with defendant's conduct admissible to show admission.

In prosecution of one Chinaman for murder of another, accusatory statements of deceased and his wife in presence of defendant under arrest shortly after shooting, under such circumstances it might fairly be inferred he understood nature of charge made, held admissible in connection with conduct on his part from which acknowledgment of guilt might be implied, though not if defendant for any reason, as ignorance of language used, did not understand charge.

4. Criminal law § 1169(12)—Error in admission of evidence not reversible.

In prosecution of one Chinese for murder of another, any error in admitting evidence as to accusatory statements by deceased and his wife when defendant was brought into their presence under arrest after shooting, without sufficient inquiry as to whether defendant understood English, in which statements were made, held, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, not reversible error, in view of same evidence given by other witnesses without objection, and fact appellate court is warranted in assuming defendant did understand English.

5. Criminal law § 720(5), 730(8)—Conduct of district attorney in making statement improper but harmless.

In prosecution of one Chinaman for murder of another, conduct of district attorney in stating to court, when objection was made to question asked witness for defendant as to whether he was a member of a certain tong or society that he would attempt to show by cross-examination witness was member of the tong, that deceased was ordered killed by such tong, and witness was delegated by tong to testify for defendant, held improper, but harmless, where court instructed that statements of counsel did not constitute evidence.

6. Criminal law § 1037(2)—Request for admonitory instruction essential to consideration of prosecutor's improper conduct.

Where any possible prejudicial effect of district attorney's conduct would have been obviated by proper admonitory instruction, formal assignment of matter as misconduct and request for admonitory instruction are essential to consideration of matter in appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Ong Mon Foo was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder of the first degree for the killing of one Wong Kim Chong, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The deceased, who was a Chinese, was at work in his place of business, a small clothes dyeing and cleaning establishment on Clay street near Stockton street, San Francisco, between 5 and 6 o'clock p. m. on January 28, 1919, in the company of his wife and an employé, both Chinese, when a man, also Chinese, entered from the street and asked for a suit of clothes, giving his name as Mun Kee. The deceased instructed his employé to find the suit and turned again to his work at his ironing table with his back to the man. The man then produced a pistol and fired one shot at the deceased, the bullet entering the abdomen from the back and passing through the stomach, leaving his pistol on the floor, he then fled. Deceased died February 6, 1919, from septic peritonitis resulting from the wound so inflicted. There is no dispute as to these matters. The killing of the deceased was a deliberate and premeditated murder, and the man who thus visited his place of business on January 28, 1919, fired the shot that inflicted the mortal wound, and then fled therefrom, is guilty of this murder. The sole question in dispute on the trial was whether this defendant was that man. According to his story told on the witness stand at the trial, the defendant was not in or about the vicinity of the store of deceased on that day. He said that he had come to San Francisco from Oakland, where he resided, late that afternoon to see a Chinaman who was working at a place of business on Merchant street, near Sansome street; that he went to this place direct from the ferry landing at the foot of Market street; that he there saw and talked with this man; that he ran from there to take a car at the corner of Clay and Sansome streets to go to the ferry again; that in trying to get on a car in motion at that point going toward the ferry he fell and was hurt, and, the car then stopping, he succeeded in reaching it and getting aboard; and that he was taken from the car by the police officer. As to his visit to the place on Merchant street near Sansome street, he was corroborated by the Chinese whom he there saw. There was some other evidence tending to show that the person who fled from the place of business of deceased was not the defendant, and that this person ran across Clay street and into Spofford alley, where he disappeared, instead of up Clay street to Stockton and back via Stockton street, Sacramento street, Waverly place, Clay street, and on down toward the city front, matters upon which the identification of the defendant as the guilty person are, in material part, based. At the time of the homicide the influenza was epidemic in San Francisco, and the assailant had on an influenza mask, thus rendering identification more difficult. There was no evidence whatever tending to show any motive for the killing. On the other hand, the wife and the employé of deceased positively identified the defendant as the person who did the shooting, and another witness, one Ellicott, a white man, identified him as a man he saw in flight from Stockton street down Sacramento street, pursued by the deceased for a block or so, and whom he followed to the place of arrest. The defendant, whom the officers say was perspiring when arrested and apparently had been running, was brought back by them to the place of business of deceased within a very short time after the shooting, and both deceased and his wife, in his presence and hearing, declared him to be the man who had done the shooting.

[1] The evidence implicating defendant was sufficient, if true, to sustain the conclusion that he committed the murder, and, of course, the question of the truth of this evidence is conclusively determined for all the purposes of the appeal by the verdict of the jury and the action of the trial court in denying the motion for a new trial.

It is urged that the trial court erred in refusing to give two requested instructions directed particularly to the question of the identification of the defendant as the person who committed the crime, and the testimony of the witnesses who swore that he was the one who did the shooting. One of these instructions, after stating that to justify his conviction his identity as the guilty person must be proved beyond every reasonable doubt, told the jury substantially that they were not bound to believe that a witness was able to identify with certainty because he swore positively thereto, and that they should not so believe if they were satisfied from the circumstances proved that there was a reasonable doubt whether he "was able to and did identify the defendant as the guilty person," and that, if they believed from the evidence and the circumstances proved that there was a reasonable doubt whether the witnesses might not be mistaken as to identity, they would not be authorized to convict unless "the corroborating circumstances tending to establish his identity" are such as, with other testimony, produces a degree of certainty in the mind of the jury so great that they can say and feel that they have no reasonable doubt as to the identity of the defendant. The other was:

"The court instructs the jury that before they can convict the defendant in this case it must appear beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, and not somebody else, committed the offense charged in the indictment. It is not sufficient that the evidence shows that the defendant or somebody else committed the crime, nor that the probabilities are that the defendant, and not somebody else, committed the crime, unless these probabilities are so strong as to remove all reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant or someone else is the guilty party."

The defendant was not entitled to an instruction directed specially to the credibility of the witnesses who identified the defendant as the assailant. The members of the jury were fully and repeatedly instructed that they were the sole judges of the weight of the evidence and the sole and exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and in view of the charge it is clear that they were most explicitly informed that they were not bound to accept as true the testimony of any witness upon any subject simply because it was positively given under oath, but that it was for them to consider all the evidence, giving to the testimony of each witness just such weight as in their judgment under all the circumstances it should be accorded, and that they could not convict the defendant unless satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt by the evidence of his guilt. In so far as any question of weight of evidence or credibility of witnesses was concerned, the general instructions covered the ground as fully as defendant had any right to insist. It would have been entirely proper to instruct the jury in so many words, as requested in the first of these instructions, that, to justify defendant's conviction, his identity as the guilty person must be proved beyond every reasonable doubt. However, it is impossible for us to imagine that, in view of the general instructions given, they could have thought otherwise. These instructions were clear and explicit to the effect that, unless the guilt of the defendant was shown to the satisfaction of the jury beyond all reasonable doubt, they must acquit him, and that if, after a full and dispassionate consideration of all the evidence in the case, they entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant committed the crime, they must acquit him, and it does seem to us that, in view of these instructions and under the circumstances of this case, no juror could be so stupid as to think the defendant could be held guilty unless he was in fact the identical person who fired the fatal shot. The jury were also told by the court, in an instruction relative to defendant's defense that he was not at the place of business of deceased at the time of the commission of the crime, that "if, in view of all the evidence, the jury have a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant was in some other place when the crime was committed, they should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and find him not guilty."

[2] We are satisfied that, regardless of any question of their correctness, prejudicial error cannot fairly be based on the refusal to give either of the requested instructions.

[3] Over the objection of defendant, Officer Brady was allowed to testify to accusatory statements of deceased and his wife, made in the presence and hearing of defendant, when, immediately after being taken into custody, he was taken by the officers to the place of business of deceased, and to which he made no reply. According to Officer Brady, the deceased was lying on the floor, and, when confronted with defendant, said in the English language, pointing at defendant, "That man shot me," and defendant made no reply. Likewise decedent's wife, upon his entering the place with defendant, spoke first in Chinese, and then in English, pointing at defendant, saying in the latter language, "That man shoot my husband," and defendant made no reply. The objection was that the testimony was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and, substantially, that no foundation had been laid in that it had not been shown that the defendant understood the English language. While the defendant was then in the custody of the officers, he had not then been charged with the commission of any crime, and had been taken to the shop of deceased by the officers in order that they might ascertain what had happened there and whether any crime had been committed. While, of course, evidence of his then identification by the deceased or his wife as the person who had shot deceased was not in and of itself admissible, there being no claim that in so far as any statement of deceased was concerned it was by way of a dying declaration, the situation was such that any accusatory statement of either made in the presence and hearing of defendant, under such circumstances that it might fairly be inferred that he heard and understood the nature of the charge, was admissible in connection with evidence of conduct on his part from which acknowledgment or acquiescence or admission of guilt might reasonably be implied; the only legitimate purpose of such evidence being to show acquiescence or admission on the part of defendant in the face of the charge. See People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 Pac. 521; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794; People v. Lapara, 183 Pac. 545. Assuming that he understood what was said and done, the circumstances were such that the prosecution was entitled to prove that defendant remained silent in the face of the accusatory statements, as tending to show an admission of the truth of the charge; the value of the testimony in this behalf being altogether a question for the jury in view of all the circumstances. The authorities we have cited sustain this view, and sufficiently state the reasons therefor. In view of the decisions in this state, the mere fact that the officers had him in custody did not bar such evidence. But it is necessarily true that such evidence would not be admissible in the event that the defendant, because of ignorance of the language used, or for any other reason, did not understand the charge made against him. There is absolutely nothing in the record to indicate that the defendant did not have sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the words spoken by deceased and his wife, except the fact that when defendant was examined as a witness he testified through an interpreter. This is of little, if any, importance, as an interpreter might well be used notwithstanding defendant had sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand what was said by deceased and his wife. The record also shows that the wife, when called to testify, said she could not speak English, and testified through an interpreter. The witness Ellicott testified that when he overtook defendant he asked him "what he did back there in Stockton street," and defendant answered with the word "Nothing." No effort at all was made on the trial to show that the defendant did not sufficiently understand English to know, when taken to the place of business of deceased after the homicide, that he was accused by deceased and his wife of having shot deceased, and no attempt to explain why he remained silent in the face of the accusation testified to have been made. As we have seen, the only affirmative evidence on this question was that of Ellicott to the effect that defendant did have sufficient knowledge of the English language to answer with the word "Nothing" when asked in English what he had been doing. The record further shows that prior to the giving of Officer Brady's testimony Officer Miles had testified to the same effect as did Officer Brady without objection being made to the evidence, and that, after Officer Brady testified, Officer Wall gave substantially the same evidence without objection being made. So the matter of these accusatory statements and defendant's silence in the face thereof were before the jury from other witnesses than Brady, without objection, and without the slightest attempt at contradiction or explanation by defendant, who testified on the trial to a state of facts which, if true, completely exonerated him from the charge of having killed deceased.

[4] While it may be that, when the objection to Brady's testimony suggested that it had not been shown that defendant understood the English language, the trial court should have inquired further into the matter before overruling the objection, if the court committed error in this regard it is not such error as would warrant a reversal, both for the reason that the same evidence was given by the other witnesses without objection and without attempt at contradiction or explanation, and because, in view of the record, we are fully warranted in assuming that the defendant did sufficiently understand the English language to appreciate the nature of the charge made against him by deceased and his wife. The situation in this regard is such that the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution are clearly applicable.

[5, 6] In the opening brief it was claimed that the district attorney was guilty of such misconduct as requires a reversal, in stating substantially to the court when objection was made to a question asked one of the defendant's witnesses, "You are a member, are you not, of the Sen Suey Ying," that he would attempt to show by cross-examination that the witness was a member of the Sen Suey Ying tong, that the deceased was ordered killed by such "tong," and, the killing having been perpetrated, the witness was delegated by the "tong" to testify for the defendant. The objection to the question asked the witness was overruled, and the witness answered "No." In response to other questions he testified that he was not directed by any member of the Suey Ying tong to come to court to testify, that he had not discussed his proposed testimony with any member of such tong, and that his testimony was absolutely true. Of course, the district attorney had a right, on cross-examination, to inquire as to the interest of the witness and the reasons for his being in court as a witness, but we are somewhat at a loss to understand how he could reasonably have hoped to prove by this witness any of the matters set forth in his statement, except, possibly, his membership in the Sen Suey Ying tong. The statement was unnecessary, and, we think, improper. As to the particular question to which the objection had been interposed, viz. whether the witness was a member of the Sen Suey Ying, concerning which organization or its character there had not been a word of evidence, a simple statement that the question was merely preliminary would have sufficed. However, the district attorney did not assert as facts any of the matters embraced in his statement, simply saying that he would attempt by his cross-examination to prove them, and we think it must have been manifest to the jury, as it is to us, that the statement amounted to no more than an assertion that these things might be true. We do not see how the jury, instructed, as it was, that the case must be determined as to the facts solely on the evidence introduced, and that statements of counsel did not constitute evidence, could have been influenced thereby to the prejudice of defendant's rights. Moreover, although defendant objected to the statements, they were not formally assigned as misconduct, and an admonitory instruction asked, and in a case where, as here, any possible prejudicial effect would be obviated by a proper admonitory instruction, it is settled that such assignment and request are essential to a consideration of the matter in an appellate court. See People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 545, 117 Pac. 549.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In re RICCARDI. (Cr. 2302.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1920.
Rehearing Denied May 15, 1920.)

1. Courts — 90(4) — Law involved in decisions for 35 years will not be changed without legislative action.

Decisions construing Code Civ. Proc. §§ 287-289, as not justifying disbarment of an attorney for conviction of a felony pending his appeal from such conviction, which have been accepted by the people and the Legislature for 35 years, will be followed.

2. Attorney and client — 39—"Conviction" requiring disbarment is final conviction.

Within Code Civ. Proc. § 287, providing for disbarment of attorney on conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude, "conviction" means final conviction, not the mere plea or verdict of guilty, as is its ordinary meaning; since the conviction is made sufficient to require disbarment, which, being a separate proceeding, would not be affected by a reversal of the conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conviction.]

3. Attorney and client — 58—Court must disbar attorney convicted of crime of turpitude.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 299, an attorney who has been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude must be disbarred; the provision for suspension not being applicable to proceedings on that ground.

Olney, Lawlor, and Lennon, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding for the disbarment of C. Vincent Riccardi for conviction of a felony involving moral turpitude. Action deferred, pending appeal from conviction.

Rehearing denied; LAWLOR, LENNON, and OLNEY, JJ., dissenting.

J. F. Sullivan, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. [1] The disbarment of the attorney is sought in this matter upon production of a certified copy of the record of conviction of the attorney in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco of a felony involving moral turpitude. Sections 287, 288, 289, Code Civ. Proc. It is conceded in the learned and exhaustive brief filed by the president of the San Francisco Bar Association that an appeal from such judgment of conviction is pending in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District. The judgment of conviction, therefore, has not become final. We have, then precisely the case presented in People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 400, 5 Pac. 686, decided February 2, 1885. It was there squarely held that during the pendency of an appeal "there is not such a final conviction against the defendant as the law contemplates to justify his removal" merely upon "record of conviction," and that the proceeding there inaugurated had therefore been prematurely commenced. There has been no change in our statutes which is material in so far as this question is concerned; the law to-day being substantially as it was when this decision was rendered. The decision was unqualifiedly approved by the court in bank in McKannay v. Horton, 151 Cal. 711, 720, 721, 91 Pac. 598, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 661, 121 Am. St. Rep. 146. By these decisions a construction was given to the statutes relative to this matter that we do not feel warranted in disturbing, whatever our views might be were the question a new one. For over 35 years this construction has been accepted by the Legislature and by the people of the state as giving to the statutes the meaning intended in their enactment. To now adopt a different construction would savor of the enactment of legislation by this court. We are satisfied that under the circumstances the decisions should be followed, and that if a change in our law in this respect is deemed desirable that appeal therefor should be made to the lawmaking power and not to the courts. We are not to be understood as intimating that we are of the opinion that these decisions are erroneous. It cannot fairly be said that they are obviously wrong, or that a sound public policy suddenly requires a different construction at the hands of this court, if indeed, that is a matter pertinent to the discussion.

[2] Much is said as to the meaning of the word "conviction," as used in various other sections of our statutes, with a view of showing that "as ordinarily used" with relation to criminal proceedings "in our constitutional and statutory provisions" it means the entry of the verdict of "guilty" or the plea of "guilty." This was stated in the concurring opinion in McKannay v. Horton, supra; the statement being accompanied, in the very same sentence, by the words "and I can see no warrant for concluding that it was used in any other sense in the charter provision under discussion." The connection in which a word is used often sufficiently shows that it was used in a sense varying from that in which it is ordinarily used, and the effect of the decisions referred to is that it was used in these particular sections, providing for the absolute disbarment of an attorney upon the record of his conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, as meaning a conviction that has become final. Speaking of the Treadwell Case in McKannay v. Horton, supra, the court, speaking through Chief Justice Beatty, said: "The court held, and properly held, that the proceeding under section 288 of the Code of Civil Procedure could not be instituted until the judgment became final." And also: "The decision in Treadwell's Case was clearly right." While a plausible argument may be made in support of giving a different meaning to the word "conviction," as used in these sections, there are good reasons in support of the construction already given by the court, which, considering the procedure established by the statute and the effect of the judgment summarily given by the disbarring court upon the record of conviction in a superior court or before a justice of the peace, is certainly more in accord with the ordinary conception of fair play and the proper protection of the rights of individuals.

In the proceeding for disbarment based upon the record of conviction, the judgment which must be pronounced is one of absolute and final disbarment. This disbarment is not an "incident" of the conviction of felony or misdemeanor in the sense that such conviction ipso facto removes the attorney from his office, or is a part of the penalty prescribed by the law for the offense of which he was convicted. It is a separate and independent thing (see McKannay v. Horton, supra), and is not in the slightest degree affected by a setting aside or reversal of the judgment of conviction of felony or misdemeanor. So that unless a conviction that has become final was meant, notwithstanding that the judgment is reversed on appeal for substantial reasons, as, for instance, that evidence of guilt of any offense is absolutely wanting, or that the defendant has not been accorded a fair trial on the merits in the lower court, the judgment of disbarment based solely on the record of conviction still remains, and the attorney can be restored to his office as an attorney and counsellor only in the event that the court that has disbarred him sees fit to grant his application for restoration; something it is certainly not compelled to do solely because of the reversal or setting aside of the judgment of conviction. It will not do, in reply to this, to say that this court would have the power to restore and ought to restore in such a case, if it cannot be compelled to restore. Unless the attorney has the absolute enforceable right to be restored as a consequence of the setting aside or reversal of the judgment of conviction—in other words, unless the restoration ipso facto follows the setting aside or reversal of the judgment of conviction—he is dependent on the exercise in his favor of the discretion of this court, which may or may not be in his favor as he is looked upon as a fit or unfit person to practice law, entirely regardless of the matter of the conviction. Nor will it do to say that the rule that where a judgment is based on a previous judgment, and the previous judgment is reversed or set aside, the second judgment must be set aside, applies here. If the term "conviction" means, not the final judgment of conviction, but simply the rendition of a verdict of guilty or a plea of guilty, as is the whole contention of those who insist that People v. Treadwell, supra, was wrongly decided, the attorney is disbarred solely because of the rendition of the verdict or the plea of guilty, and those facts, viz., such rendition of verdict or plea, remain and constitute the basis of disbarment, whatever be the ultimate result in the case. There seems to us to be no answer to the proposition that the judgment of final disbarment would continue in force, notwithstanding the setting aside or reversal of the judgment pronounced on the conviction of felony or misdemeanor. It is unreasonable to assume that the Legislature intended to provide for obtaining this absolute and final disbarment of an attorney, thus permanently depriving him of a valuable property right, solely upon a conviction that is not final, and which in due course of review is subsequently declared invalid, in the absence of some provision for restoration as matter of course upon the conviction being set aside. The statute makes "the record of conviction" the basis of disbarment and conclusive evidence thereon. These words in this connection imply something other than the mere verdict of a jury, which may be vacated either by the trial court or an appeal, as entirely without support in the evidence. Under our settled practice of many years, they are considered as referring to the judgment pronounced by the trial court upon a conviction, and likewise, under our decisions, the statute is accepted as contemplating a judgment that has become final. To our minds this is not an unreasonable construction of our statutes on the subject, and no good reason appears for overruling the decision by which it was established and has been maintained for over 35 years.

[3] It has further been suggested that by reason of the language of sections 287 and 289, Code of Civil Procedure, "remove or suspend," the court may, upon the certified record of conviction, suspend the convicted attorney, instead of finally disbaring him. This claim has never been made before, and is not now made in the brief filed by the bar association. It has always been understood that conviction of an attorney of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude made disbarment incumbent, without any discretion in this court to give other judgment. And this, we think, must be so, in view of section 299, Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes exactly the judgment to be given in such a case, viz:

"That the name of the party shall be stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors of the court, and that he be precluded from practicing as such attorney or counselor in all the courts of the state," while in other cases the judgment "may be according to the gravity of the offense charged: Deprivation of the right to practice * * * permanently, or for a limited period."

We do not see how the Legislature could have more clearly expressed its determination that the only penalty in such a case is permanent disbarment. And certainly it would not be a wise rule that would invest the court with discretionary power in a matter where the sole evidence upon which it acts is a certified copy of a record of conviction. But we think the matter is definitely settled by section 299, Code of Civil Procedure. Of course, this matter goes only to the correctness of the argument we have made in support of the ruling in the Treadwell Case, for, whatever the penalty that may be imposed, that case holds that the proceeding therefor on the record of conviction may not be had until the judgment has become final.

It may freely be conceded that it would be advisable to provide for the suspension of an attorney as to whom a judgment on conviction of felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude has been given pending appeal or other review of such judgment. Of course, that is a question solely for the legislative department of the state, and the matter can easily be accomplished by appropriate amendment of the statute. All that is suggested as to the necessity of safeguarding the public, as well as the profession itself, so far as is practicable, against the admission or retention as members of the profession of unfit persons, is something upon which there can be no difference of opinion, and probably it would assist to some extent in the endeavor to attain this ideal if the law was so framed as to exclude an attorney from practice pending review of a judgment of his conviction pronounced in a superior court or by a justice of the peace. But we do not think that it would be just or proper to change the law in such a way as to require absolute and final disbarment upon a showing of judgment of conviction of a felony or misdemeanor in a trial court, notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal, unless at the same time provision is made for the restoration of the attorney as matter of course in the event of a reversal or vacating of such judgment.

It is ordered that action upon the certified copy of the judgment presented be deferred pending the determination of the appeal of the attorney from such judgment.

We concur: SHAW, J.; WILBUR, J.; KERRIGAN, Judge pro tem.

OLNEY, J. I dissent. The main opinion is based primarily upon the fact that the question involved is determined by People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 400, 5 Pac. 686. It also takes the position that that decision is not clearly wrong, advancing certain reasons in justification for it. It concludes that no good reason appears for overruling the decision. I can but take issue with the main opinion on all three of these points.

In the first place, the decision in the Treadwell Case is, it seems to me, directly opposed to a number of other decisions of this court upon the identical point involved, the meaning of the word "conviction," and that it is therefore not determinative now. In the second place, there is in my opinion no reasonable doubt but that the Treadwell Case is wrong. In the third place, I can see no doubt but that the rule it declares and the main opinion affirms is opposed to sound public policy, so that good reason does appear for overruling it. In addition, the rule it declares is not one under which rights have been acquired. Its overruling can have no other effect than that of now establishing definitely what, it seems to me, is plainly the right rule.

In regard to the first point: The final question is as to the meaning of the word "conviction," as used in section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an attorney shall be disbarred upon his "conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude." The Treadwell Case holds, in effect, that conviction does not mean the finding of a man guilty, but means the sentence which follows and is the final result and judgment which ensues upon the finding of guilt. Now, it is true that the Treadwell Case is the only decision of this court upon the meaning of the word as used in this particular section. But there is nothing whatever to indicate that as so used the word is used in any sense other than that in which it is repeatedly used in other sections of our Code. The word as used in our statutes has been construed a number of times subsequent to the Treadwell Case, and each time directly contrary to the ruling in that case.

Thus in Ex parte Brown, 88 Cal. 176, 8 Pac. 829, the defendant in a criminal action, who had been found guilty by the verdict of a jury, but upon whom judgment had not been pronounced, applied to be released on bail as a matter of right. He had this right unless section 1272 of the Penal Code provided differently. That section reads:

"After conviction of an offense not punishable with death, a defendant who has appealed may be admitted to bail: 1. As a matter of right, when the appeal is from a judgment imposing a fine only."

The defendant claimed that, not having been sentenced, he had not been convicted and did not come within the operation of the section. But, although the section is one very evidently intended to govern the matter of bail pending an appeal and an appeal cannot be taken until after sentence, so that the court might perhaps have been justified in concluding that conviction, as here used, meant the judgment from which an appeal could be taken, the court held upon a detailed discussion of the question that conviction meant the finding of guilt and not the appealable sentence or judgment.

Similarly, in People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372, a witness under examination was asked if he had ever been convicted of a felony. It appeared that he had been found guilty of a felony but not sentenced. Section 2051, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that by way of impeachment, it may be shown of a witness "that he has been convicted of a felony." It was objected that the witness had not been convicted within the meaning of the section, since he had not been sentenced. Again the court considered the matter at some length and again it decided that conviction meant the finding of guilt and not the sentence or judgment.

In McKannay v. Horton, 151 Cal. 711, 91 Pac. 598, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 661, 121 Am. St. Rep. 146, a city charter provided that an office became vacant "when the incumbent * * * is * * * convicted of a felony."

A similar provision was made by the Political Code (section 996). The mayor of the city had been found guilty of a felony, had been sentenced, and had taken an appeal, and the question was presented as to whether or not he had been convicted within the meaning of the charter and the Code, so that his office had become vacant, although an appeal was pending. In other words, the question is identical with the one presented here. But again it was held that conviction meant the finding of guilt, and not a final judgment, and that the office was vacant, although the appeal was pending. The main opinion in McKannay v. Horton attempted to distinguish the Treadwell Case, but the fact of the matter is that the conclusion reached by it is directly opposed to that of the Treadwell Case. The concurring opinion in Mc-

Kannay v. Horton, written by Justice Angellotti and concurred in by Justices Sloss and Shaw, makes no attempt to distinguish the Treadwell Case and sums the whole matter up thus:

"One is 'convicted' of a crime when a verdict of guilty has been so given and entered against him, or when a plea of guilty has been given and entered. This is the well-settled meaning of the term as ordinarily used in our constitutional and statutory provisions. * * *"

These decisions are subsequent to the Treadwell Case and are to my mind wholly irreconcilable with it. In view of them I do not see how it is possible to say with reason that the Treadwell Case must be taken as a final and determining authority in the present case. It does seem to me that its authority has been taken from it.

Second, in regard to the merits of the Treadwell Case itself: It is admitted in the main opinion here, at least impliedly, that "conviction" in the ordinary sense means conviction of guilt, not the sentence or judgment which ensues upon such conviction. In any case there can be no doubt but that such is the ordinary meaning of the word. It is an elementary rule of statutory construction that a word shall have its ordinary meaning unless there is something to show that it was used in a different sense. The Treadwell Case puts a meaning on the word "conviction" different from its ordinary meaning. What, then, are the reasons given for this? According to the main opinion they are two: First, that the connection in which a word is used often shows that it is used in a sense other than its ordinary one, the implication, not plainly stated, being that in this case the connection in which the word "conviction" is used shows that it was not used in its ordinary sense; and, second, that if a lawyer were convicted and disbarred for that reason pending an appeal and the conviction should be reversed, his disbarment would nevertheless stand, and that this would be most unjust.

In regard to the first reason, it is, of course, true that frequently the connection in which a word is used shows that it was not used in its ordinary sense. But the implication that the connection in which the word "conviction" in the Code section as to disbarment is used shows that it was used in other than its ordinary sense is not justified. There is nothing whatever in the Code section to indicate that the word was not used in its ordinary sense. The material portion of the section reads simply:

"Sec. 287. An attorney and counselor may be removed or suspended by the Supreme Court, or any department thereof, or by any District Court of Appeal, or by any superior court of the state, for either of the following causes, arising after his admission to practice: 1. His conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, in which case the record of conviction shall be conclusive evidence."

What is there in this language which indicates in any way that "conviction" means something else than conviction in its ordinary sense?

In this connection I would add that the word "conviction" is used time and again in the Codes and so far as I am aware always in its ordinary sense of the establishment of guilt by the verdict of a jury or a plea of guilty. In fact, it is so defined by section 689 of the Penal Code. In a great many of the code sections the distinction between "conviction" and the judgment or sentence which follows upon it is plainly made. Sections 1097, 1103, 1104, 1108, 1110, 1111, 1157, 1161, 1162, 1192a, 1193, 1197, 1203, 1207, 1217, 1218, and 1227, Pen. Code. The same use of the word is found in our Constitution. Article 1, § 20.

As to the second reason given in justification of the Treadwell Case, that the disbarment would stand, even though the conviction were reversed on appeal, and that this would be most unjust, the answer is that the disbarment would not stand in such a case. In the first place, this court has full power to reinstate an attorney once disbarred. It is a power that has been exercised even in the case of an attorney whose conviction of a felony was final. It seems incredible that the court, having the power of reinstatement, would not use it as of course in any case where it appeared that the conviction upon which the disbarment was based had been set aside.

In the second place, it is the rule that wherever a judicial order or judgment is based upon a previous judicial order, judgment, or act, and such previous order, judgment, or act is reversed on appeal or set aside, the subsequent order or judgment based upon it must be set aside as of course. The party affected is entitled to this as a matter of right and it cannot be refused. The most common illustrations of this are where the subsequent order is in the same proceeding as the previous order or act, as where a foreclosure sale is had on a decree which is appealed from but whose execution is not stayed. If the decree is reversed, the sale falls as of course. Carpy v. Dowdell, 131 Cal. 499, 63 Pac. 780; Cowdery v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, 73 Pac. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115; Turner v. Markham, 156 Cal. 68, 103 Pac. 319. But the rule is not limited to orders or acts in the same proceeding. Thus, where a money judgment is obtained against a person, and he appeals but does not stay execution, and pending the appeal an action is brought against him upon the judgment and a second judgment obtained, and then the first judgment is reversed on appeal, the judgment debtor is entitled to have the second judgment set aside as of course and of right. Heckling v. Allen (C. C.) 15 Fed. 196; Banning v. Taylor, 24 Pa. 297; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 38 Wis. 107; Mann v. Ætna Ins. Co., 38 Wis. 114. See, also, Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198.

There is no reason why this general principle would not be applicable to the case of an order of disbarment based and founded on a conviction subsequently set aside. On the contrary, such a case comes directly within the principle and there is every reason why it should apply. The main opinion attempts to take the case without the operation of the principle by two lines of argument. In the first place, it is said:

"This disbarment is not an 'incident' of the conviction of a felony or misdemeanor in the sense that such conviction ipso facto removes the attorney from his office or is part of the penalty prescribed by the law for the offense of which he is convicted. It is a separate and independent thing, and not in the slightest degree affected by a setting aside or reversal of the judgment of conviction of felony or misdemeanor."

Every word of this argument except the final conclusion that the disbarment would not be affected by the setting aside of the conviction is applicable to the case of a second judgment based upon a first which has been set aside, and yet the final conclusion, thoroughly well established, is just the opposite. The second judgment is not an incident of the first in the sense that it ipso facto follows upon it. It is a separate and independent thing. And yet it is not true that "it is not in the slightest degree affected by a setting aside or reversal of the judgment" upon which it is based. The rule is just the contrary.

In the second place, the main opinion says:

"Nor will it do to say that the rule that where a judgment is based on a previous judgment, and the previous judgment is reversed or set aside, the second judgment must be set aside, applies here. If the term 'conviction' means, not the final judgment of conviction, but simply the rendition of a verdict of guilty or plea of guilty, as is the whole contention of those who insist that People v. Treadwell was wrongly decided, the attorney is disbarred solely because of the rendition of the verdict or the plea of guilty, and those facts viz., such rendition of verdict or plea, remain and constitute the basis of disbarment, whatever be the ultimate result in the case." (The italics are those of the main opinion.)

The whole point of this is that when an attorney has been convicted by the rendition of a verdict or plea of guilty he remains "convicted," although the verdict or the plea, that is, the conviction, is subsequently set aside. But he does not so remain. The rule is elementary that when a conviction or other legal determination is set aside it is as if it had never occurred. In the eyes of the law, it does not exist. We are dealing here, not with a "conviction" as a mere historical happening, but as a matter of legal consequences and effects, and so far as legal consequences and effects are concerned a conviction set aside is no conviction. The matter may be tested in a very simple way. It is held in People v. Ward, supra, that a conviction which has not become final is yet a ground for the impeachment of a witness. But assume that a witness is on the stand who has once been convicted but whose conviction has been set aside. Is there any doubt that he would not be open to impeachment by a showing of such conviction? At any rate, this court has so held. Davis v. McNear, 101 Cal. 606, 36 Pac. 105.

Now, as to the third point advanced by the main opinion, viz., that no good reason appears for overruling the Treadwell Case. In the first place, the Treadwell Case is, in my judgment, plainly wrong. This is certainly some reason for overruling it, particularly as it is not a decision under which any rights have been acquired so that its overruling would work any injustice. But very much more important than this, the rule of the Treadwell Case is opposed to sound policy, and its affirmation and perpetuation is harmful and it should be done away with. An attorney who has been actually convicted in the criminal courts of a crime involving moral turpitude should not be permitted to exercise the high privileges of his profession as long as that conviction stands against him unreversed. There is no relation in life outside the family which is more confidential in its nature than that of an attorney. There is no one in whom more implicit confidence must of necessity be placed. There is no profession in which the strictest probity is more necessary. There is no profession of which it is more true that the only safeguard possible to the public against imposition and wrongdealing is the character of those pursuing it. The fact that a member of the profession has been actually convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude should alone be sufficient to disqualify him from pursuing his profession while such conviction stands. To permit him, nevertheless, to continue to hold himself out as a worthy member of the profession and to invite the public to intrust him with their confidences and their affairs while he pursues an appeal, and not unlikely a dilatory one, is to break down the standard of professional character which is the public's chief safeguard. It was to prevent just this very thing that, in my judgment, the Legislature provided that a lawyer should be disbarred upon "conviction," without a word to indicate that it was not the conviction alone which was sufficient. I cannot subscribe to the statement of the main opinion that sound public policy does not require that this construction be put upon the statute, so that a lawyer convicted of crime shall not be permitted to practice while his conviction stands. I do not mean by this, of course, that a man disbarred because of crime should be forever barred from the practice of the law. No matter how clear his guilt may have been or how just his conviction, it is fitting and right that he have the opportunity to demonstrate by his after life and conduct that he is again a worthy member of society and merits the respect and confidence of his fellow men. When the time comes that he does demonstrate this, then he should be readmitted to practice, not grudgingly, but gladly. But this is not the present case. Here the question is, Shall a lawyer convicted of crime be permitted to practice while the conviction stands but he pursues an appeal? On this question I can see but one true answer, and that is that to permit him to do so is opposed to strong reasons of sound public policy.

In view of the reasons I have stated, I can see no reason for not overruling the Treadwell Case as wrongly decided and adopting a different rule. To do so would not be to legislate as the main opinion intimates. If this were so, a court could never reverse a former ruling. But there is no rule, so far as I am aware, that a court may not correct an error into which it has fallen, and the right, and, indeed, the duty, of the court in a plain case to do this cannot be questioned.

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

LENNON, J. I dissent from the reasoning and conclusion of the prevailing opinion. Section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an attorney and counsellor may be removed or suspended by the Supreme Court" upon his conviction of a felony involving moral turpitude; and section 289 of the same Code provides "the proceedings to remove or suspend an attorney * * *" because of such conviction following the receipt by this court of a certified copy of the record of conviction. This court has said that—

"Section 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the suspension or removal of an attorney for various causes, including 'his conviction of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude.' * * *" Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 Pac. 322.

Section 299 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the judgment to be imposed "upon conviction in cases arising under the first subdivision of section 287," cannot be made, as the prevailing court opinion purports to do, the sole measure of this court's power in the premises without ignoring, as does the prevailing opinion, save for a casual reference thereto, the provisions of sections 287 and 289. To hold that section 299 is exclusively controlling of the power of the court is to say that the law giveth and in the same breath the law taketh away. The code sections first referred to cannot, it seems to me, be ignored without doing violence to a cardinal canon of statutory construction which requires that the legislative intent, when ascertained, must govern, and that in the ascertaining of such intent all of the various provisions of legislative enactment upon the particular subject should be construed together and given effect as a whole. I am constrained, therefore, to say, partly in the language of In re Kirby (D. C. 84 Fed. 606, 608, that "a proper respect for the public, the legal profession, and this court renders it imperative" that an attorney convicted of a felony should not be permitted thereafter to pursue the profession of an attorney and counsellor even while an appeal is pending from such conviction. I am also of the opinion, however, that if the appeal results in a reversal of the conviction of the attorney, the attorney thus convicted should be restored instantaneously to his privileges as an attorney and counsellor, for, obviously, it would be a grievous injustice to deprive him of his status as an attorney because he had been convicted in a trial court under circumstances which made it necessary for an appellate court to reverse the conviction.

It is not to be said that the record may show that the attorney is guilty, for, in that event, if the law allows it, he should be proceeded against, not upon the fact that he has been convicted, but upon the fact that he has been guilty of the conduct involved in the crime with which he was charged. I do not think his reinstatement upon a reversal of the conviction should depend upon the discretion of a court or judge. It should, in my opinion, occur automatically and of right.

If, therefore, this court had no power merely to suspend, but was limited to the power to disbar, I should concur in an order of disbarment only in the event that it contained a condition for its automatic revocation in the event the judgment was reversed on appeal. In view of the Code provisions which, to my mind, so plainly permit suspension, it would not be necessary to enter an order of disbarment. No good reason appears to me why this court should not adopt the practice of suspending attorneys immediately upon their conviction and of disbarring them when the conviction becomes final. The suspension, of course, should be during the pendency of the appeal only, and come to an end with the termination of the appeal, at which time there should be an order of disbarment upon affirmation, or an order revoking the suspension upon reversal of the conviction of the attorney. I feel that this court might very properly disregard anything to the contrary of the foregoing which may be found in People v. Treadwell, 66 Cal. 400, 5 Pac. 686, and McKannay v. Horton, 151 Cal. 711, 720, 91 Pac. 598, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 661, 121 Am. St. Rep. 146, as it cannot be said that rights have grown up under these decisions which should be protected under the doctrine of stare decisis.

In re O'CONNELL. (Cr. 2306.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1920.
Rehearing Denied May 15, 1920.)

In Bank.

Proceedings for the disbarment of Daniel O'Connell because of conviction of felony involving moral turpitude. Action deferred pending appeal.

Rehearing denied; Lawlor, Lennon, and Olney, JJ., dissenting.

J. F. Sullivan, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The facts in this case are in all material respects the same as those in the Matter of Riccardi (Cr. 2302) 189 Pac. 694. The conviction of the accused was in the United States District Court of the Northern District of California, and was for conspiring to violate the acts of Congress of May 18, 1917, and June 15, 1917, and the case is pending on writ of error in the United States Supreme Court.

It is ordered that action upon the certified copy of the judgment presented be deferred pending the determination of the appeal of the attorney from such judgment.

OLNEY, J. I dissent for the reasons given in the dissenting opinion in the companion case of Riccardi.

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

LENNON, J. (dissenting). For the reasons given in my dissent from the prevailing court opinion in the Matter of C. Vincent Riccardi, I dissent from the prevailing court opinion in the instant case.

BOWRING v. PRIME. (Civ. 2765.)

1. Corporations ⇨134—Attachment does not justify secretary in refusing to transfer stock.

An existing attachment furnishes no ground for refusal by the secretary of a corporation to make transfer of stock and issue new certificates therefor to escape liability under Civ. Code, § 324.

2. Corporations ⇨134—Party refused transfer on untenable ground could sue for penalty immediately.

Where secretary of corporation refused to transfer stock, when presented with proper indorsements, solely because of attachment thereon which did not in law prevent him from so doing, it was right of party requesting transfer immediately to commence action to recover penalty for refusal to transfer prescribed by Civ. Code, § 324.

3. Corporations ⇨134—Secretary refusing to transfer and sued for penalty cannot rely on matter not interposed to demand.

Where secretary of corporation when requested to transfer certain stock properly indorsed did not base his refusal on ground proper federal revenue stamps were not attached, fact is without influence in action by party requesting transfer to recover from secretary penalty for refusal prescribed by Civ. Code, § 324.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by Lynden Bowring against E. E. Prime. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Bernard Potter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles E. Salisbury, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal by the plaintiff from an adverse judgment.

Section 324, Civil Code, provides that, upon the refusal of any officer of a corporation to transfer shares of stock when required, such officer "shall be subject to a penalty of four hundred dollars, to be recovered as liquidated damages, in an action brought against him by the person aggrieved." Defendant herein was at the time material to the action the secretary of a corporation. The plaintiff was the transferee of certain shares in the same corporation and held certificate bearing proper indorsement of transfer. He presented the same at the office of the corporation and to the defendant, its secretary, who was in charge of the office, and requested the transfer to be made. At that time an action had been brought against the plaintiff and the transferor of the stock. Writ of attachment had been issued and served upon the defendant as secretary of the corporation. When the request for transfer of the stock was made by the plaintiff, the secretary communicated by telephone with the attorney for the plaintiff in the attachment suit and was advised by that attorney not to transfer the stock—that he had no right to do that. Defendant informed plaintiff of the situation and refused to make the transfer. Six days later the plaintiff served upon the defendant secretary a formal demand in writing requiring him to make the transfer requested. The defendant testified that thereupon he told the plaintiff that the situation was the same and that he did not think he could transfer it until he got further advice from the attorney; that he did consult with the attorney, and at the time summons in this action was served upon him, which was five days after the written demand had been delivered by the plaintiff, he was preparing or had prepared a letter to the plaintiff, which was dispatched that day, in which he stated his willingness to make the transfer. The trial court determined, in effect, that the defendant had a reasonable time as secretary of the corporation to investigate his rights and liabilities, and that he acted within such reasonable time by offering to make the transfer, and that no recovery of the penalty could be had.

[1-3] It is admitted that the fact of an existing attachment will furnish no ground for refusal on the part of the secretary of a corporation to make transfer of stock and issue new certificates therefor. Our Supreme Court has directly decided that question in an opinion by the court in bank, which was filed on December 15, 1917, and several months prior to the making of the demand in this case. Ramage v. Gould, 176 Cal. 746, 169 Pac. 670. In that decision it is announced as the law that shares of corporate stock are not negotiable; that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies upon the sale and transfer of the same; that the levying of an attachment may create a lien against the interest in the corporation of the holder of the shares, which lien will continue and follow the stock into the hands of whosoever it may go. Further, that the Code sections governing attachments of corporate shares differ from the provisions affecting the attachment of debts and credits generally, and that there is nothing in those provisions which authorize the secretary of a corporation to refuse to make transfers and issue certificates to transferees upon proper demand therefor. The decision cited clearly determines the right of the plaintiff to a judgment herein, unless it can be said that the secretary was authorized to take a reasonable time to make the transfer and issue the new certificates and that no more than a reasonable time was taken by the defendant here. Upon different facts a case might be presented where a delay of five or ten days from the time of demand until the issuance of new certificates would not be unreasonable; that is, assume, for instance, the case of a large corporation having an active market on its shares and where a great many transfers were being demanded and required of its secretary. Such a case might be presented and one which would show that the secretary had acted with reasonable promptness in complying with the demand where he diligently attended first to the making of the transfers in the order of request. But that is not this case. The secretary here was presumed to know that under the law the levying of an attachment against the stock furnished no impediment at all to the transfer of the same upon the books of the corporation or the issuance of new certificates therefor. It was solely because of the fact that such an attachment had been levied that the refusal was made, for by his own testimony the secretary showed that he was ready to have immediately made the transfer upon the first demand of the plaintiff had it not been for the fact that he believed the attachment prevented him from so doing. Under such a state of the case, upon the first refusal of the secretary based upon the ground asserted, we think it was the right of the plaintiff to have immediately commenced his action to recover the penalty prescribed. The court included in its findings a statement that at the time the demand was made revenue stamps required by the federal law were not affixed to the certificate or tendered. We attach no importance to that finding as interfering with the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action, because the refusal of the defendant to act was not based upon any such ground; the demand was treated as sufficient and admittedly would have been complied with except for the attachment condition.

Our conclusion is that the evidence does not sustain the findings.

The judgment is reversed.

BABSON v. SALISBURY. (Civ. 2714.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 10, 1920.)

Factors ⚙️63—Where property delivered to factor is sold owner cannot retake and convey title to third person.

Where the owner delivered automobile to a factor for sale, the factor was authorized to sell it under Civ. Code, §§ 2026, 2368, 2369, and the owner cannot, after the factor has sold the machine to a third person, lawfully retake the same and sell it to his own vendee, for while, if the factor, not having delivered possession after the first sale, sold to another, delivering possession, the prior sale would, under section 3440, be deemed fraudulent, and the last purchaser would be entitled to the car, that exception does not apply to the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by S. E. Babson against H. G. Salisbury. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. G. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas C. Ridgway, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action grows out of the following facts: Guy H. Campbell, as the owner of an automobile, left it with A. M. MacKusick, a dealer in used motor cars, with instructions to sell same for $500. MacKusick entered into a contract with Reese Bros. for a lease and conditional sale of the car, subject to payments therefor; the former retaining title and possession thereof. A few days thereafter he sold and assigned this contract to plaintiff, S. E. Babson, and at the same time made and delivered to him a bill of sale, transferring title to the car, possession of which was retained by the seller. Two or three days after this last transaction, and while the automobile was in MacKusick's garage, Campbell, while MacKusick was away, took it therefrom, and sold and delivered it to defendant Salisbury. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover possession of the automobile. Judgment went in favor of defendant, from which plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll, claiming the judgment is not supported by the findings.

The court, in effect, found that MacKusick's relation to Campbell was that of a factor; that the contract made by MacKusick with Reese Bros. was null, void, and ineffectual for any purpose; that MacKusick, by a bill of sale duly executed and for a consideration of $315, sold and transferred title to the automobile to plaintiff, who had no notice of the fact that Campbell was the owner of the car; that at no time was delivery of the automobile made to Babson, but the same was retained by MacKusick, who was offering the same for sale up to January 3d, on which day, in MacKusick's absence, Campbell took the car from the garage and sold and delivered it to defendant, who, as to the former transactions, was an innocent purchaser thereof; that on January 17th Babson, in proper proceedings therefor, caused the sheriff to take the car from Salisbury, who thereafter regained possession by filing with the sheriff the undertaking required by section 514, Code of Civil Procedure, and causing the sureties to justify on such undertaking, in which he employed an attorney to whom he paid the sum of $25, which was a reasonable sum for the service; that defendant was deprived of the use of the car from January 17th to January 20th, to his damage in the sum of $20.

There is no doubt, as appellant claims, that MacKusick, as factor in possession of the car, was, under sections 2026, 2368, and 2369, Civil Code, authorized to sell and deliver the same to Babson and receive payment therefor, and that by his act in so doing Campbell, as owner, was divested of all right, title, and interest therein, and the same was as fully vested in Babson as though the former had sold and delivered it. While no actual delivery of possession was made, nevertheless, as a constructive transfer, it was good and sufficient between vendor and vendee, as to whom the relation of bailor and bailee was created with the mutual obligations pertaining to such relation. With this, however, we are not here concerned; nor with the duty which MacKusick owed to Campbell, or that of the latter to Salisbury. The question presented concerns the right of Babson as against defendant. If the latter had as an innocent purchaser bought the car from MacKusick, in whose possession it was left, the prior transfer to Babson would, upon the facts shown and as provided by section 3440, Civil Code, be deemed fraudulent as to defendant, who therefore would be entitled to the car. But such is not the case. Defendant did not buy the automobile from MacKusick, and hence he is in no position to claim the benefit of this provision. He purchased the car from Campbell, who, as we have seen, had no right, title, or interest therein, and whose possession thereof at the time of his sale to defendant was by reason of his act in unlawfully taking it from the garage in the absence and without the knowledge of MacKusick, who was bailor for Babson as owner.

As we view the facts, the case is governed by the principle applicable to the purchase of stolen property. Campbell's act in taking the car, though not intended to be so, was as wrongful as would have been the unlawful taking thereof by an entire stranger. He had no title or interest therein, and hence nothing to transfer, and his purported act in so doing could no more divest Babson of his right and title to the property so unlawfully obtained by Campbell than had the purchase been made from a thief who had stolen the property.

The judgment is reversed.

WINTER v. DE SHIELDS, County Auditor.
(Civ. 2127.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 15, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 13, 1920.)

1. Counties ⇐3—Unconstitutionality of portions of charter does not affect other provisions.

Unconstitutionality of portions of charter of a county would not render whole charter void, and would have no bearing on question of validity of provision fixing salary of assessor.

2. Courts ⇐91(1) — Decision of Supreme Court as to effect of unconstitutionality of portions of county charter binding on appellate court.

Decision by Supreme Court that whole charter of county cannot be declared void because it contains certain provisions inconsistent with the Constitution of the state is decisive of such matter when before the appellate court.

Application for writ of mandate by Louis Winter against George M. De Shields, as Auditor of Tehama County. Writ denied.

H. D. Jerrett, of Red Bluff, for petitioner.
M. J. Cheatham, of Red Bluff, and Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. The petitioner is the assessor of Tehama county and makes this application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as auditor of said county, to draw his warrant in his favor for the sum of $300, which amount is claimed by the petitioner as his salary as such assessor for the month of December, 1919.

The petitioner contends that his salary is $3,600 per annum as assessor of said county, as fixed by section 4266 of the Political Code, Tehama county, being a county of the thirty-seventh class. He bases this contention on the ground that the charter of said county adopted by the electors in 1915 and ratified by the Legislature in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1877), fixing the assessor's salary at $2,000 per annum, is unconstitutional, for the reason that the said charter "is inconsistent and does not substantially conform to section 7½, art. 11, of the Constitution."

It would serve no useful purpose and would unnecessarily prolong this opinion to enter into an examination of the many objections raised by the petitioner to the constitutionality of this charter. The character of these objections may be shown by the following brief statement of the reasons that he advances in dealing with the provisions of the charter, relative to the board of supervisors, to wit: That the charter makes no substantial provision for the constitution, regulation, and government of the board of supervisors, nor for the qualifications of the members of said board, as required by subdivision one of section 7½, article 11, of the Constitution, and that section 4 of article 2 of the charter is not a substantial compliance with subdivision 4 of said section 7½, in this, that it does not set out in full the powers and duties of the board, and that sections 5, 9, 10, and 11, of article 2 of the charter are unconstitutional in that they contravene subdivisions 4 and 5 of said section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution. Upon these and other objections not necessary to be enumerated the petitioner contends that the entire charter should be declared null and void.

[1] Without entering into an examination of the objections raised by the petitioner to the charter, it is sufficient to say, that, even if these objections possessed merit, still they would not render the whole charter of the county null and void and would have no bearing upon the question of the validity of the provision of the charter which fixes the salary of the assessor at the sum of $2,000 per annum.

The rule is well settled in California that, while a charter should be consistent with the Constitution of the state, the whole charter cannot be declared null and void because it may contain certain provisions that are inconsistent with the Constitution of the state at the time of its adoption. In the case of Brooks v. Fischer, 79 Cal. 173, 21 Pac. 652, 4 L. R. A. 429, an attack was made upon the charter of the city of Los Angeles. At the time the decision in that case was rendered the Constitution then provided that the charter to be formed for a city government must "be consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state." The court, in passing upon the objection to the charter, said:

"It is contended by the petitioner that certain provisions of the charter are inconsistent with existing general laws, and particularly that it is in conflict with the general law with reference to the improvement of streets. It may be that certain of its provisions are inconsistent with present laws, and that so far it cannot be effective as against such laws, but this is a matter that it is unnecessary for us to determine. It is enough to say that the whole charter cannot be held to be invalid because of the fact that a few of its provisions may conflict with general statutes now in force."

[2] This decision by the Supreme Court is decisive of the matter now before us, and the charter of Tehama county, having fixed the salary of the assessor of that county at the sum of $2,000 per annum, is conclusive. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued should be vacated and the application for a peremptory writ of mandate be denied; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. NORTHCOTT. (Cr. 869-2309.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 2, 1920. Rehearing Denied Feb. 28, 1920; Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing, April 2, 1920.)

1. Homicide ☞23(1), 308(5)—Instruction as to murder held unnecessary when not in issue.

In a prosecution for homicide under the abortion statute, the court was required to instruct only with reference to the crime of murder in the second degree, and failure to instruct as to murder was not error, since homicide resulting from an unlawful operation is murder in the second degree.

2. Criminal law ☞814(2)—Instructions should be based on facts proved.

In criminal prosecutions instructions are to be given with reference to the facts of the case proved.

3. Criminal law ☞438—Photographs of place where body was found relevant.

In a prosecution for murder in the second degree, defendant being charged with performing an unlawful operation, a photograph of a secluded canyon or ravine where the body was found was properly admitted in evidence to explain the conditions under which the body was found; it being the theory of the state that it was necessary for the state to prove that the operation was unlawful, and not a necessary operation to preserve the life of the patient.

4. Criminal law ☞1169(1)—Presence of lizard in picture of place where body found not prejudicial.

The presence of a small lizard upon a rock in a photograph of a ravine where the body of deceased, the subject of an unlawful operation, was found, was not prejudicial to accused in a prosecution for second degree murder, the picture being taken after the body had been removed, where the state, on objection, offered to permit the clerk to mark it off.

5. Homicide ☞338(1)—Proof of more than required not prejudicial error.

Assuming that the burden is not upon the state in the first instance in a prosecution for murder in the second degree, by reason of death following an alleged unlawful operation, to show that the operation was unlawful, it was not prejudicial error for the court to permit the state to introduce evidence of the secluded ravine where the body was found as tending to show that the operation was unlawful.

6. Criminal law ☞438—Photograph of body admissible in prosecution for second degree murder as tending to prove venue.

In prosecution for second degree murder under the abortion statute, where defendant raised a question about the manner in which the body had been handled before being thrown into a ravine for the purpose of establishing that it was possible for the body to have been brought a long distance and from another county and yet be in the condition as testified to by a physician, provided it had been carefully handled and properly bandaged, the state was properly permitted to introduce in evidence a photograph of the body showing bruises on the head and face, as indicating that it had not been carefully handled, and that the unlawful operation took place within the county.

7. Criminal law §438—Photograph of body admissible as tending to show cause of death.

In a prosecution for second degree murder, defendant being charged with performing an unlawful operation upon a female, where it appeared in evidence that certain abrasions were found upon the face and head, and a physician testified that they were inflicted after death, a photograph of the body was relevant to indicate that the nature of such bruises and injuries was not such as to have contributed to the death of the deceased.

8. Criminal law §438—Photograph of body admissible to identify body by showing clothing worn.

In a prosecution for murder, a photograph of the body fully clothed, showing a coat and hat which were identified in the courtroom by a sister of the deceased as having been the garments worn by her sister when she was last seen by her, was admissible in evidence as tending to connect the body found with the clothing identified as having belonged to the sister of the witness.

9. Criminal law §1169(1)—Not prejudicial to introduce in evidence ghastly photograph of body.

One accused of homicide cannot be heard to complain that, because a photograph of the body as it was found in a ravine was not pleasant to look upon, he was prejudiced because of the revulsion that may have been caused by the picture, the entire record being a succession of revolting, verbal pictures, the ghastly facts of the case being an inseparable part.

10. Homicide §169(1)—Visit of alleged victim of unlawful operation to another physician held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder in the second degree, defendant being alleged to have attempted an unlawful abortion, testimony of another physician that prior to the date of the alleged unlawful operation the deceased had visited him and asked him to perform an abortion upon her, and that he had refused, and had given her the name and address of the defendant, was admissible upon the question of her physical condition and her desire to be relieved thereof.

11. Criminal law §372(4)—Homicide §160—Evidence of preparation of place to perform abortions held admissible.

In a prosecution for murder in the second degree, defendant being alleged to have performed an unlawful operation upon deceased, testimony of another physician to the effect that defendant had discussed with him the preparation of a place for the handling of abortion cases was admissible, if the securing of the place in question entered into the crime, and it did not become inadmissible by reason of the fact that it might have been used by the defendant for a number of similar operations if he had not been detected after the performance of the one in question.

12. Criminal law §424(1)—Statement of co-conspirator or accomplice after accomplishment of conspiracy inadmissible.

The statements of a coconspirator or accomplice after the object of the conspiracy has been accomplished are inadmissible.

13. Criminal law §1169(7) — Introduction of statements of accomplice not prejudicial.

Admission in evidence of contradictory statements of one who was supposed to be an accomplice or coconspirator, which could not even by implication connect defendant with the crime was harmless.

14. Criminal law §371(4)—Evidence of other crimes admissible to show intent in abortion case.

In a prosecution for murder in the second degree, defendant being charged with having performed an unlawful operation, evidence of previous abortion operations performed by the defendant was admissible to show the intent of the defendant to perform an unlawful operation in the case in question.

15. Criminal law §1169(1)—Not prejudicial to prove more than necessary.

In a prosecution for second degree murder, defendant being alleged to have performed an unlawful operation, it was not prejudicial error for the state to introduce evidence to negative the idea that the operation may have been necessary, assuming that the state was not called upon to do so.

16. Homicide §142(5), 325 — Variance between information and proof as to name of deceased not reversible.

The fact that by inadvertence the name of deceased in a prosecution for murder was given as "Elizabeth Inez Reed" in the information, while the evidence gave the name as "Inez Elizabeth Reed," could not have prejudiced the accused, and does not call for a reversal; defendant not making any motion in the trial court based upon the alleged variance, when it might readily have been explained and corrected.

17. Criminal law §507(1)—Physician not accomplice of person performing unlawful abortion.

A physician who refused to perform a unlawful operation did not become an accomplice of another who performed an abortion, resulting in death, by simply giving the deceased the name of such other physician as one who might perform the operation for her.

18. Criminal law §824(7) — Failure to instruct as to accomplice testimony not error in absence of request.

It was not error for the court in a prosecution for murder to fail to instruct as to accomplice testimony, where no such instruction was requested.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

19. Criminal law ⇨ 1179—Hearing in Supreme Court refused where record leaves no doubt of guilt.

Where the opinion of the District Court of Appeals states that "the record * * * leaves no doubt of the guilt of the defendant," the Supreme Court would not be warranted in ordering a hearing in such court, after an affirmation by the Court of Appeals, on account of erroneous admission of evidence, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Ephraim Northcott was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed in appellate court, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, and Harry I. Stafford, Frank J. Mannix, William J. Kelly, Maxwell McNutt, and Edwin McKenzie, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. [1, 2] This is an appeal by the defendant from a conviction of murder in the second degree. A great number of alleged errors are urged by the attorneys for the appellant upon a record which leaves no doubt of the guilt of the defendant. The first contention is that the jury was not instructed as to what constitutes the crime of murder. The court instructed the jury with reference to the crime of murder in the second degree, and that was all that was necessary under the facts of this case. In the case of People v. Wright, 167 Cal. 5, 138 Pac. 351, our Supreme Court has said:

"Under our law, where death results from the performance of an unlawful abortion, the crime is murder in the second degree (Pen. Code, § 189), so if a defendant thus charged rests simply upon a denial of the offense, and no evidence of a lesser offense is before the court and jury, the instructions should go simply to murder in the second degree, and the verdict should be either guilty as charged or not guilty."

Instructions are to be given with reference to the facts of the case proved. People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 206, 207.

[3, 4] The next objections are to the introduction of certain photographs in evidence. One of the photographs was identified as showing the place where the body was found, with the surrounding brush and trees. Appellant objects that evidence of the place where the body was found had no relevancy. There was testimony from the physician who examined the body after it had been found that death had been caused by reason of the unsuccessful performance of an abortion operation. It was the theory of the respondent that it became necessary for the state to prove that the operation was unlawful; that is, that it was not a necessary operation to preserve the life of the patient. Upon this theory, as indirect evidence of this fact, it was relevant to show that the body had been placed in a secluded spot, where it was unlikely that it would be found. The circumstances surrounding the finding of the body all indicated that a crime had been committed, and that the woman had not died as the result of a lawful operation; for it is reasonable to suppose that, if the operation had been lawful and proper, the body of the woman would not have been found in a secluded canyon or ravine. The photographs were therefore relevant to explain the conditions under which the body was found. The particular objection of the defendant is that one of the pictures shows a small lizard upon one of the rocks. We see nothing prejudicial to the defendant in this. The picture of the scene was taken after the body had been removed. We have examined it with some care to find the lizard complained of, and by no stretch of the imagination does it conjure up any of the horrors which the attorney for the appellant fears may have resulted in the minds of the jurors. Furthermore, when objection was made to this picture the district attorney stated:

"Just a minute. There was an objection raised, and I want to say that there was an objection raised or made because of something crawling on this picture and I don't care about that. I didn't know it was there and it may be stricken off. I am willing to have the clerk mark it off or have her paste something over it."

[5] This objection, as well as several others urged by the appellant, involves the question of whether the state had the burden of establishing in the first instance that the operation was unnecessary for the purpose of preserving the life of the mother, or whether the burden of proving the affirmative of that proposition rested upon the defendant as an affirmative defense. It is therefore necessary for us to discuss that question here. In the case of People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 260, 76 Pac. 1017, the only case we have been able to find in this state upon this subject, the court says that there is a wide divergence of authority upon the question as to whether under a statute such as ours the burden of establishing that the abortion was actually necessary is an affirmative defense, or whether the proposition is to be negated in the first instance by the prosecution. That case then proceeds upon the assumption that it was necessary for the prosecution to establish the fact that the operation was not necessary to preserve the life of the woman, and decides that, even though that be true, yet in the case under consideration "the irresistible inference from the testimony is that it was not necessary to destroy the child to preserve the life of the mother." It appears, therefore, that this precise question has never been definitely decided in this state. We deem it unnecessary to decide the question here, for, assuming that the burden was upon the state in the first instance, the pictures introduced showing the conditions under which the body was found were relevant as circumstantial evidence; and if this burden was not upon the state, we merely meet the proposition that the state has done more than was required of it in its proof. This in itself cannot be a ground of reversal, and we find nothing in the pictures themselves which could have been prejudicial to the defendant.

[6] The other photograph objected to is that of the body taken shortly after it was found. As pointed out by the district attorney, this photograph was introduced only after the defendant had raised a question about the manner in which the body had been handled, as having some bearing upon the distance the body had been carried before being thrown down the embankment. It was necessary for the prosecution to show that the crime had been committed in the county in which the body was found and where the trial was had. The only apparent purpose of the line of questions pursued by the defendant upon this subject was to establish that it was possible for the body to have been brought a long distance and yet be in the condition as testified to by the physician, provided it had been carefully handled and properly bandaged. The photograph was then introduced by the state showing bruises on the head and face as indicating that the body had not been carefully handled, and that it was therefore unlikely that it could have been brought for any considerable distance without the loss of much of the blood that was found in the abdomen by the physician who examined the body.

[7] Furthermore, when the question of the manner in which this woman met her death was in issue and evidence appeared that certain abrasions were found upon the face and head, it became important to explain whether or not these abrasions were in any way connected with the cause of her death. The prosecution introduced testimony of the physician who examined the body to the effect that they were inflicted after death, and a picture taken after death, showing the face and trunk of the body, fully clothed, was introduced. We think it was relevant, to indicate that the nature of these bruises and injuries was not such as to have contributed to the death of the deceased.

[8, 9] And, furthermore, the defendant was not injured, because the picture was admissible for another reason: The body was fully clothed, and the picture clearly shows the coat and hat which were identified in the courtroom by a sister of Miss Inez Reed as having been the garments worn by her sister when she was last seen by her. The picture was of value in connecting the body found in the ravine with the clothing identified as having belonged to Miss Reed. The defendant cannot be heard to complain that, because the photograph is not a pleasant one to look upon, he was prejudiced in the eyes of the jury because of the revulsion of feeling that may have been caused by this picture. The entire record is a succession of most unpleasant and revolting verbal pictures, and whatsoever is ghastly in the facts of this case inheres in and is an inseparable part of such facts, and the defendant may not complain thereof.

[10] The next objection is to the testimony of Dr. Jordan that Inez Reed had visited his office some time during the week ending March 1st, and at that time she had told him she was in a condition of pregnancy of four or five months' duration, and she had asked him to perform an abortion upon her; that he had refused, and had given her the name and address of the defendant which she had written in his presence upon a card. This testimony was not admitted for the purpose of proving the abortion, and it is conceded that it is not relevant for such purpose. The district attorney stated that the purpose was to prove the intention of Miss Reed when she left Dr. Jordan's office. The trial judge stated in his charge to the jury that—

"The declarations as to where the deceased was going prior to the act charged therein were not admitted in evidence as proof of the commission of the crime of abortion, but simply as to the condition of the woman and the purpose of her visit, if she made one, if they do show any light thereon."

In People v. Wright, 167 Cal. 1, 8, 138 Pac. 349, the court says, in speaking of the admission of similar evidence, that it is not proper as direct proof of the commission of the abortion; but it is properly admitted as evidence establishing the condition of the woman and the avowed purpose of her visit. The appellant argues that the purpose of deceased's visit to Dr. Jordan's office does not tend to prove her purpose in visiting the defendant, if she did visit him. This may be conceded, but the testimony is nevertheless relevant upon the important question of her physical condition shortly before her death and her desire to be relieved thereof. For such purposes, we think the testimony complained of in the present case was properly admitted.

[11] Defendant next objects to the testimony of Dr. Jordan to the effect that the defendant had discussed with him the preparation of a place "down the peninsula" for the handling of "long-time (abortion) cases." As the objection is stated in the appellant's brief, we gather that it is made upon the ground that such a project is larger in its scope than the commission of the one abortion operation under examination here, and therefore it should not be admitted, because it is evidence tending to prove that the defendant was preparing to commit abortions generally. If the securing of this place entered into this particular crime, evidence in regard to it cannot become inadmissible by reason of the fact that it might have been used by the defendant for a number of similar operations if he had not been detected after the performance of the first one.

[12, 13] It is contended that the police should not have been permitted to testify as to the actions of Frances Cronin on the night of the arrest of the defendant, when she slipped up the elevator to the fourth floor of the building in which defendant's office was located, and then walked down to the second floor and entered defendant's office, and to the statements made by said Frances Cronin when questioned by the police officers, to the effect that she had never been to the house in San Mateo, where the crime was supposed to have been committed, and as to her conduct and appearance at the Hotel Turpin at about 2 o'clock in the morning of March 9th. The same objection is urged against the testimony concerning the statement of Miss Cronin when she was shown a pair of her shoes which she had left at the San Mateo house. This latter testimony was that Miss Cronin denied ever having been to the house in San Mateo, and, when shown her shoes, at first denied that they were her shoes, and, when the detective suggested that she try them on, admitted that they were her shoes and that she had been to that house. There was also testimony to the effect that, when she was asked about what she had been doing, she replied, "Oh, the only thing to do is to take a dose of poison." Appellant's position upon this question is that the statements of a coconspirator or accomplice after the object of the conspiracy has been accomplished are inadmissible. The correctness of this general statement is, of course, undisputed. While the language of our own Supreme Court in the case of People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 Pac. 351, might suggest that the efforts of coconspirators to "avoid detection and keep themselves out of the state prison" were a part of their conspiracy, we think the situation presented in the present case does not bring it within the meaning of the Rodley Case; but, even conceding appellant's claim that this was error, nevertheless it appears from an examination of all the testimony objected to upon this ground that Frances Cronin did not say anything which had any relation to the defendant or that could have been prejudicial to him. The questions of the police officers were directed to whether or not Frances Cronin had been to a certain house in San Mateo, and her answers were all a denial of this until she was shown a pair of her shoes which she had left at this house. In the case of People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 331, 57 Pac. 1069, it was said in speaking of the testimony of police officers as to their conversations with a man who had been a coconspirator of the defendant in an attempt to rob a hotel:

"Yet, upon a careful examination of those declarations, we find nothing therein stated which in any way was prejudicial to defendant. His name was not mentioned. Nothing whatever was said by Raymond which even by implication connected him with the crime. * * * Therefore the admission of this evidence was purely abstract, and furnished no ground for a new trial."

We have carefully read all the testimony covered by these assignments of error, and we are of the opinion that the error was not such as to call for a reversal of the case.

[14] Further objection is made to the testimony of Catherine Fisher in which she told of other abortion operations performed by the defendant previous to this case. While it is true as a general rule that upon a trial for a particular crime evidence which tends to show the commission of another and distinct offense by the defendant is inadmissible, the defendant has himself recognized and stated the exceptions to this rule, one of which applies to the present case. The exceptions are where it becomes necessary to show identity, intent, motive, etc. In the present case this evidence was introduced to show the intent with which the operation was performed, its motive, in order to negative the possibility that it was a legal operation necessitated by reason of the health of the woman. Because of the fact that the defendant denied ever having seen the woman, and because of the difficulties surrounding the proof in these cases generally, it was not possible to prove that this was a criminal operation except indirectly and by circumstantial evidence. Evidence was therefore introduced to show that the defendant was engaged generally in this business, and that he had previously performed other illegal operations. The precise point was discussed in the case of People v. Hagenow, 236 Ill. 514, 86 N. E. 370. The court there said:

"It was therefore necessary that the proof show and the jury find, in order to convict the plaintiff in error, that the miscarriage or abortion which was caused or produced upon Annie Horvatic was not caused by plaintiff in error to save the woman's life; and while the jury would have been justified in finding, from the condition of the woman when she went to the plaintiff in error's place and the testimony of the physicians who made the post mortem examination, that no cause existed for the causing of a miscarriage or the producing of an abortion upon Annie Horvatic to save her life, the state was not required to rely upon this class of testimony alone, but had the right to show, if it could, that the plaintiff in error was not carrying on a hospital in a legitimate way for the treatment of women who were pregnant, but that she was a professional abortionist, for the purpose of rebutting the presumption that she in good faith caused the miscarriage or produced an abortion upon Annie Horvatic to save her life, and for the purpose of showing that she must have known Annie Horvatic was pregnant, and that she operated upon her with a criminal knowledge and intent to cause her to miscarry or to abort. * * * We think the view above expressed is fully sustained by this court in Scott v. People, 141 Ill. 195 [30 N. E. 329], Hagenow v. People, 188 Ill. 545 [59 N. E. 242], and Clark v. People, 224 Ill. 554 [79 N. E. 941], and by numerous text-writers and adjudicated cases. 1 Ency. of Ev. p. 54; Underhill on Crim. Ev. § 345; Regina v. Dale, 16 Cox's Crim. L. C. 703; and other cases cited.

In the case of People v. Seaman, 107 Mich. at page 357, 65 N. W. 203, 61 Am. St. Rep. 326, the court held that evidence similar to that objected to in this case was admissible. To the same effect is the case of People v. Sessions, 58 Mich. at page 601, 26 N. W. 291.

[15] It is conceded by both the appellant and respondent that this evidence is admissible in this class of cases where the burden is upon the state to negative the idea that the operation may have been necessary. But the appellant contends in this connection, as in the connection hereinbefore discussed, that the burden of establishing the fact that the operation was a necessary one to preserve the life of the mother was upon the defendant, and that, as he did not put this defense in issue, and denied that he had performed any operation upon the deceased, or, indeed, that he had ever seen her, the state was not obliged to go into the question of the illegality of the operation, but the illegality would be presumed upon proof of the operation. But, since the appellant concedes that the proof is proper where the state is called upon to do more than appellant contends it is called upon to do in the present instance, we are in the position, as stated before, where the state has sustained a greater burden than required. There is no failure of proof, but merely an excess of proof. Assuming that the proof was sufficient to connect the defendant with the performance of the operation upon deceased, the facts in evidence leave no doubt that there was no legal justification for the performance of the operation. They raise an "irresistible inference," as said in People v. Wright, supra, of the criminal character of the operation. And surely, in view of the constitutional provision against setting aside judgments because of the improper admission or rejection of evidence unless it shall appear from an examination of the entire record that there has been a miscarriage of justice, we would not be justified in setting aside a verdict of the jury because the district attorney has proved more than was necessary in order to make out his case.

A number of errors are alleged upon the admission of evidence which was of minor importance, and we shall not discuss these matters in detail. It is sufficient to say that we consider these errors, if any, to be without prejudice to the defendant.

[16] Another assignment of error is predicated upon the fact that by inadvertence the name of the deceased was given as "Elizabeth Inez Reed" in the information, while the evidence gave the name as "Inez Elizabeth Reed." The defendant had been charged before a committing magistrate with the crime of the murder of "Inez Elizabeth Reed" in San Mateo county on or about March 7, 1919. He was held over, and later the information was filed with the name written as "Elizabeth Inez Reed" instead of "Inez Elizabeth Reed." A sister of the deceased, Mrs. Stevens, connected the two names in her testimony. She was asked if she knew Elizabeth Inez Reed in her lifetime, and she answered: "My sister's name was Inez Elizabeth Reed." There is no reason of which we are aware why the defendant was prejudiced by this inadvertence, or hindered thereby in any way in the preparation of his defense. In the case of People v. Lockwood, 6 Cal. 205, the court said:

"The only argument that could be adduced in favor of a contrary rule is that judgment in this proceeding would not be a bar to a future prosecution for killing J. T. Beatty. In such a case I apprehend it would be competent for the accused to establish by evidence aliunde that J. P. and J. T. Beatty were one and the same person. * * * In addition to all this, the statute requires that these cases should be disposed of on appeal, without regard to technicalities. Under our system we are disposed to regard the error assigned as more nice than substantial."

See, also, People v. Fick, 89 Cal. 149, 26 Pac. 759; People v. Ah Sun, 160 Cal. 791, 118 Pac. 240.

Furthermore, it appears that the defendant did not make any motion in the trial court based upon the alleged variance, when it might have been readily explained and corrected.

[17, 18] The further contention is made that the evidence shows Dr. Jordan to have been an accomplice, and that the jury should have been so instructed. The record does not show that this question was ever raised at the trial, and does not show that any request for such an instruction was made, and it would appear that the contention that the testimony of Dr. Jordan proves him an accomplice is being made for the first time upon appeal. While we are of the opinion that the record does not show facts sufficient to make Dr. Jordan an accomplice under the language of People v. Balkwell, supra, yet it is unnecessary for us to decide this point here, because failure of the court to give an instruction where such instruction is not asked is not ground for reversal. People v. Ah Wee, 48 Cal. 236, 239; People v. Fice, 97 Cal. 459, 460, 32 Pac. 531; People v. Haun, 44 Cal. 96, 100.

Under the entire record before us we are convinced that there has been no miscarriage of justice, and that none of the alleged errors complained of warrant a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, we withhold any expression of opinion as to the admissibility, under the circumstances of this case, of the testimony of the witness Catherine Fisher concerning other abortion operations performed by the defendant previous to the alleged abortion involved in this case.

[19] In view of the fact that the opinion of the District Court of Appeal states that the "record * * * leaves no doubt of the guilt of the defendant," and in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we would not be warranted in ordering a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal affirming the judgment of the lower court, on account of the admission of such evidence if the same was erroneously admitted.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

All concur.

MAXWELL v. WESTERN AUTO STAGE
CO., Inc., et al. (Civ. 2707.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1920.)

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 397(1)—Finding on issue of contributory negligence made necessary by pleadings and evidence.

Where defendants were charged with negligence in the operation of an automobile stage with which plaintiff's car collided, defendants' plea of contributory negligence raised the issue of plaintiff's negligence for decision, and, there being evidence of such negligence, it was improper for the court to fail to find on the issue.

2. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1071(6) — Highways $\hookrightarrow$ 184(2) — Evidence sufficient to warrant finding that plaintiff was negligent; failure to find on issue raised by evidence reversible error.

In an action by plaintiff, whose automobile struck defendants' motor stage, evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and hence the failure of the court to dispose of that issue, which was raised by the pleading, was reversible error.

3. Highways $\hookrightarrow$ 184(2)—Evidence sufficient to warrant finding that driver of automobile stage was negligent.

In an action by a motorist whose car collided with an automobile stage, evidence held sufficient to warrant finding that the driver of the stage was negligent.

4. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1050(1) — Erroneous admission of evidence held harmless in view of other evidence.

Where statements by the driver of defendants' automobile stage made after the accident agreed with his testimony on trial, the admission of such statements against the owner was harmless, even though technically erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by J. R. Maxwell against the Western Auto Stage Company, Incorporated, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Mattison B. Jones, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This appeal was taken from a judgment awarding damages to the plaintiff. It was alleged in the complaint that a collision which occurred between an automobile driven by the plaintiff and one driven by appellant Dukelow was the result of the negligent acts of Dukelow, who was employed as a driver by his codefendant. In their answer defendants denied the charge of negligence, and affirmatively alleged particular acts of negligence on the part of the plaintiff as contributing proximately to cause the alleged damage. The trial court found the facts in accordance with the allegation of the complaint, but failed to make any finding upon the issue tendered by the defendants as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Several grounds are urged for a reversal, chief among which are: (1) That the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court as to the negligence of the defendants; (2) that the court erred in admitting testimony of statements made by defendant Dukelow immediately after the accident; (3) that the court erred in not making an affirmative finding upon the issue as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

[1, 2] Immediately before the accident occurred, defendant Dukelow, driving an automobile in service as a stage, was traveling northward along a straight road in a suburban community. He approached a point where the road upon which he was traveling was entered by another highway from the right.

This latter highway gave entrance to and from the road upon which Dukelow was driving the stage, but did not cross it. Plaintiff, operating an automobile, was traveling down this connecting highway and was approaching the point where Dukelow's vehicle would pass the point of connection between the two roads. Dukelow turned his machine toward the left-hand side of the road upon which he was traveling, with the purpose of avoiding contact with the plaintiff's automobile, but the latter vehicle struck the stage, with the result that the stage was completely turned over, and the automobile of the plaintiff was damaged. The testimony of plaintiff was, in substance, that as he reached the point where the road upon which he was traveling entered the main highway, he looked to the left first and saw the vehicle of defendants approaching at a distance of about 150 or 160 feet; that, intending to turn to the left and down the main highway, he proceeded across the middle thereof for the purpose of making the turn, and that the defendants' automobile, having reached that point, swerved to the left and the collision resulted. He testified that he was traveling at a moderate rate of speed. On the other hand, Dukelow testified that just previous to reaching the point of the accident he had been traveling at a speed of 25 to 30 miles an hour, and that as he approached the corner where the two roads met he began to slow down, and that when he was about 20 feet from the nearest curb on the second highway he saw the plaintiff's automobile; that, considering that there was ample room for him to pass, he bore to the left-hand side of the roadway in order to allow the plaintiff sufficient space; that the plaintiff appeared to slow down at first, but that his machine suddenly shot forward as the stage was passing and struck the latter, with the result already mentioned; that it appeared to him that plaintiff was an incompetent driver, and that, instead of putting on the brakes of his machine, as he evidently intended to do, he had pressed the gasoline throttle which had the reverse action and caused plaintiff's machine to dart forward and so produce the collision. This brief, but incomplete, sketch of the evidence is sufficient to illustrate the propositions involved on this appeal. We think that it sufficiently showed that there was conflicting evidence, and that the case was of such a character as would have justified a decision for the defendants upon the ground that plaintiff committed acts which would amount to negligence contributing proximately to cause the damage suffered. By this we mean to say only that a case was presented which called for a decision of the court, not only upon the proposition of defendants' negligence, but as to plaintiff's also.

This particularly to the point made by the appellants that the court failed to find upon a material issue. A plea of contributory negligence presents such an issue. There was evidence which, if believed by the court, would have been sufficient to sustain it. The claim for error on this ground is therefore well taken. Tucker v. United Railroads, 171 Cal. 702, 154 Pac. 835; Huntington v. Vavra, 36 Cal. App. 352, 172 Pac. 166.

[3, 4] On the statement made, the finding as to the negligence of the defendants is sustained by the evidence shown. Assuming the situation to have been as claimed by the plaintiff, plaintiff, approaching a point of crossing at the right of defendants' stage, had the right to cross in advance of the stage, and should have been allowed by the driver of the latter sufficient time to make the crossing. Had the stage been under such control as to enable the driver thereof to bring it to a stop before crossing the entering road, the collision doubtless would not have occurred. There was a hedge at the first right-hand corner which the stage was approaching, and the driver admitted that this obscured his vision of vehicles which might be coming from that direction. As before noted, he testified that he was within 20 feet of the first curb line when he first saw the automobile of the plaintiff. Upon all the evidence, it was for the trial court to say as to whether, under the circumstances, there was negligence on the part of either plaintiff or the defendants. Judged by the record before us, that question was solely for the trial judge; for no such clear case is presented as to make it appear as a matter of law that there was negligence or lack of it either in the conduct of the plaintiff or that of the stage driver. It is complained that the testimony offered and received as to statements made by the stage driver to third persons shortly after the collision occurred was incompetent, and that in admitting the same the court committed error. The testimony doubtless was incompetent as to the employer of the stage driver; but we find nothing in it which differed in material respects from that offered at the trial in the driver's deposition. At any rate, were the appeal to be determined by a solution of that question alone, we would unhesitatingly say that the error was not such as to indicate that justice had miscarried. The failure, however, of the court to find as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was a matter which cannot be thus answered, and for which defendants are entitled to a new trial.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

46 Cal. App. 532

CONTINENTAL NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. STOLTZ et al. (Civ. 3216.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1920.)

1. Interpleader § 8(2)—Fund held an escrow, entitling holder to interplead claimants.

Where money was paid into a bank under an agreement that an individual should be credited with 5 per cent. thereof and the balance held for a corporation until a specified sum was procured, and thereafter the corporation notified the bank to withhold all further payments to the individual pending a settlement, such payments were held by the bank under the escrow agreement, not as a deposit by the individual, so that the bank could bring interpleader against the parties claiming the sum.

2. Appeal and error § 174 — Objection that plaintiff was interested in fund is waived by failure to plead it in trial court.

The objection that plaintiff is not entitled to interpleader because it was interested in the fund is waived, where none of defendants raised it by motion or answers, and the pleadings were made up and claims determined on the theory that the fund was held by virtue of an escrow agreement.

3. Appeal and error § 907(3)—On judgment roll appeal, insufficiency of findings cannot be reviewed.

Where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, so that the evidence is not before the court, the objection that the findings do not cover all of the issues raised by the pleadings cannot be considered.

4. Appeal and error § 1071(5) — Indefinite finding as to immaterial issue does not require reversal.

The objection that certain of the findings were indefinite does not require reversal of the judgment, where those findings related to an issue which was not material under the pleading.

5. Trial § 395(3)—Where no affirmative defenses were raised, general findings held sufficient.

In an action of interpleader, where no affirmative defenses were interposed to the cross-complaint claiming the fund, findings which merely stated that the evidence supported, or failed to support, the cross-complaint and the answers are sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Interpleader by the Continental National Bank of Los Angeles against E. P. Stoltz, Corporate Finance Company, W. A. Reed, and others. From a judgment allowing defendant Reed to satisfy his judgment against defendant Stoltz out of the fund as against the claim of the Corporate Finance Company as assignee thereof, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. McDill, of Los Angeles, and Ray P. Saffold, of San Francisco, for appellant. John W. Maltman and Ira F. Thompson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This is an action in interpleader, brought by plaintiff to determine the title to the sum of $2,080, which plaintiff claims to hold in escrow. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant and cross-complainant W. A. Reed. Defendant Corporate Finance Company, a corporation, appeals, and the appeal is presented on the judgment roll.

The action was originally commenced against the defendants E. P. Stoltz, Continental Producing Company, a corporation, Robert Goldstein, and S. Goldstein, to require them to interplead and litigate among themselves as to the ownership of said $2,080. Afterwards W. A. Reed, a judgment creditor of the defendant Stoltz, caused a writ of garnishment to be levied on said fund, and thereupon plaintiff filed an amended complaint in interpleader, for the purpose of bringing in as parties defendant said judgment creditor Reed and appellant Corporate Finance Company, the latter claiming to be the assignee of Stoltz. All of the defendants answered the amended complaint. The defendant Reed, besides answering, filed a cross-complaint, in which he alleged that the assignment from Stoltz to the Corporate Finance Company was a fraud. Defendants Stoltz and Corporate Finance Company answered the cross-complaint by denying the fraud. The other defendants, viz., Continental Producing Company, Robert Goldstein, and S. Goldstein, defaulted. The defendants Continental Producing Company, Robert Goldstein, and S. Goldstein finally filed a disclaimer, in which it was alleged that they had made a settlement with Stoltz and the Corporate Finance Company, whereby the Corporate Finance Company, as the assignee of Stoltz, was paid all of the disputed money except the sum of $600, which was retained by plaintiff subject to the rights of the cross-complainant Reed. The controversy was thereby narrowed down to two issues: First, whether or not the plaintiff was a mere stakeholder of an escrow fund; and, secondly, whether or not the assignment from Stoltz to the Corporate Finance Company was a fraud as against Reed. Neither the answers to the amended complaint nor the answers to the cross-complaint present any affirmative defenses. They consist merely of denials.

The judgment decreed that plaintiff held said sum of $600 in escrow, and that it was the property of E. P. Stoltz. It further decreed that the assignment of said fund from Stoltz to the Corporate Finance Company was a fraud upon and void as against the cross-complainant Reed, and that Reed was entitled to satisfy his judgment, which amounted to $492 with costs and interest, out of said escrow fund of $600.

[1] Appellant first contends that plaintiff cannot maintain this action as an interpleader, for the reason that the money involved in the action does not constitute an escrow fund, but that it belonged to the defendant E. P. Stoltz, as a depositor in said bank, and that said deposit was afterwards assigned by Stoltz to appellant. This contention is without merit. A copy of the escrow instructions under which the money was received and held by plaintiff is attached as an exhibit to the amended complaint. Said instructions were signed by the defendant Continental Producing Company, a corporation, and were delivered to plaintiff by said corporation and the defendant Stoltz, together with the stock certificate book of said corporation. According to said instructions, it was the duty of plaintiff to issue said stock to purchasers and to receive the money therefor, 5 per cent. of which was to be deducted and paid to "E. P. Stoltz or order, the fiscal agent of said corporation," and the remaining 95 per cent. to be held in escrow by plaintiff until that sum reached $75,000, at which time said sum was to be delivered to said corporation, provided it reached that amount on or before September 1, 1916, and in the event that said sum did not reach the sum of $75,000 on September 1, 1916, plaintiff was to redeem the stock for the amount written across the face of said stock by plaintiff.

The amended complaint contains certain allegations, which the court found to be true, as follows: That prior to August 30, 1916, the proceeds from the sale of said stock reached the sum of $34,400, of which 5 per cent. was paid to the defendant Stoltz; that "shortly prior to said 30th day of August, 1916," said corporation notified plaintiff that its contract with said Stoltz had been abrogated and annulled, and demanded that plaintiff pay no more money to said Stoltz; that "on or about said 30th day of August, 1916," the defendants Robert Goldstein and S. Goldstein purchased stock aggregating $43,680, and paid plaintiff the purchase price therefor; that under the terms of said escrow instructions there would have been due said Stoltz the sum of $2,080, and "that said Continental Producing Company, in order to protect the said plaintiff from any loss on account of the claim of said E. P. Stoltz, left on deposit with plaintiff the said sum of $2,080, with the understanding and agreement that the said sum shall be left with plaintiff until such time as a dispute between the said Stoltz and said Continental Producing Company should be adjusted."

The facts and circumstances above narrated presented a complete case for interpleader. Woodmen of the World v. Rut- ledge, 133 Cal. 640, 65 Pac. 1105; Freitas v. Freitas, 31 Cal. App. 16, 159 Pac. 611; Jory v. Supreme Council A. L. H., 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Youtz v. Farmers', etc., Nat. Bk., 31 Cal. App. 370, 160 Pac. 855.

There is nothing in the pleadings which indicates in the slightest way that the position of the defendant Stoltz was at any time considered that of a depositor. All of his rights in said escrow fund were shown to have originated in the terms of said escrow instructions, and were governed by them.

[2] The contents of the judgment roll discloses that neither appellant nor any of the other defendants ever made any objection, by demurrer, motion, or answer, to the trial court to the nature of the proceeding. The entire pleadings were made up, and the claims of the litigants were heard and determined, upon the theory that if Stoltz was entitled to any part of said sum of $2,080 he was entitled to it as a commission under the terms of said escrow instructions. By the acquiescence of Stoltz and of the appellant in the respects above mentioned they waived any objection they might otherwise have urged to the right of plaintiff to maintain the action as an interpleader. San Francisco Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 Pac. 708; Woodmen of the World v. Rutledge, supra; Myers v. McDonald, 68 Cal. 162, 8 Pac. 809.

[3] The second contention made by appellant is that "the findings are insufficient, too vague and conflicting to support the judgment." In other words, it is claimed that the findings do not cover all of the issues raised by the pleadings. Appellant has taken this appeal in such form, however, as to render this point unavailable. The appeal here is upon the judgment roll alone. The evidence is not before the court, and it is the rule that a judgment will not be reversed for want of a finding unless it appears that there was evidence, or lack of evidence, which required the court to make a finding in favor of appellant. Terry v. Southwestern Bldg. Co., 185 Pac. 212; Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 529, 51 Pac. 848. In Hertel v. Emircek, 178 Cal. 534, 174 Pac. 30, it is said:

"Besides, the issues which, as appellant claims, were not answered by findings were raised by its own affirmative allegations. The evidence not having been brought up, we must assume that the defendant offered no proof in support of these averments. The want of findings thereon is accordingly no ground for reversal. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Roberts v. Hall, 147 Cal. 434, 82 Pac. 66; Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 671, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844, 118 Pac. 441.

Notwithstanding that appellant has doubtless forfeited this point by its form of appeal, we have nevertheless examined the findings, in connection with the pleadings, and we are of the opinion that the findings are sufficient in both form and substance.

The first finding is that all of the allegations of the complaint are true and are supported by evidence, excepting that the escrow fund was reduced from $2,080 to $600.

[4] The second finding, to which appellant particularly objects, is "that all of the allegations of the cross-complaint of defendant and cross-complainant, W. A. Reed, are true and are supported by the evidence, except that there is no evidence to support the following allegations, and the same are not true, to wit: The allegations to the effect that Corporate Finance Company has been or now is a mere dummy holding company for David Stoltz," and then follows a recital in abbreviated form of several allegations of fraud charged against said David Stoltz, and the finding concludes, "But said allegations are true in so far as the same are applied in the cross-complaint to the defendant E. P. Stoltz." That part of the finding concerning David Stoltz is predicated upon a number of immaterial and irrelevant allegations contained in the cross-complaint, wherein David Stoltz and E. P. Stoltz are jointly charged with fraud in this and other transactions, all of which allegations doubtless would have been stricken out by the trial court had proper motions been presented therefor. David Stoltz was not a party to this action, and, so far as the pleadings show, was not interested in any part of the fund in dispute. Therefore that part of the above finding which relates to him is of no consequence or importance. The essential issue was the alleged fraud of E. P. Stoltz in making said assignment. The court found that those allegations were true, which was all that was necessary for the court to do in order to render its decision in the case.

The third finding is "that none of the allegations of the answers of defendant and cross-defendants E. P. Stoltz and Corporate Finance Company is true or is supported by the evidence," and the fourth finding is "that defendants Continental Producing Company, a corporation, Robert Goldstein, and S. Goldstein have filed an answer to the amended complaint in interpleader herein, disclaiming any interest in or to the moneys referred to in said complaint."

[5] As above stated, the only issues of fact raised by the pleadings, and upon which the decision of the case turned, were the legal status of plaintiff as custodian of the fund and the charge of fraud against the defendants E. P. Stoltz and Corporate Finance Company, and since the answers of the defendants last named to the amended complaint and to the cross-complaint presented no affirmative defenses, the general findings adopted by the court were sufficient. Chatfield v. Continental Bldg. Ass'n, 6 Cal. App.

HENNING v. CLARK. (Civ. 2690.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1920.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1920.)

1. Partnership ⚡64 — Partners after agreement for dissolution held entitled to file certificate of names.

Though partners doing business under a firm designation not containing the names of all had agreed on the terms of dissolution, they may make and file and publish the certificate showing the names of all the partners as required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, and recover on a partnership demand.

2. Appeal and error ⚡1011(1) — Conflicts in the evidence to be determined by trial court.

Where an action is tried to the court, it has the right to resolve conflicts in the evidence.

3. Attorney and client ⚡166(1) — Agreement fixing fee held not conditional on rendition of future services.

In an action by the trustee of persons who had formerly composed a firm of attorneys against a client, evidence held to establish that the client and the attorneys had agreed that the attorneys should receive and the client pay the sum of $600 for past services and that it was not conditional on the attorneys' rendition of future service.

4. Account, action on ⚡6(3) — Where action is on agreed settlement, particulars need not be furnished as required in action on account.

Where the action was on an agreed settlement between attorneys and their client, plaintiff is not bound to furnish a bill of particulars of the items of account pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 454; the action being based on the settlement and not on the account.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by E. J. Henning, as trustee for A. J. Morganstern and others, against Rex B. Clark. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Kidd, of Los Angeles (Eugene D. Williams, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

L. S. Arnold, of Los Angeles, and W. H. Wylie, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant has appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the principal sum of $650.

[1] It is alleged in the complaint of the plaintiff that Morganstern, McGee, Henning, Hendee, and Casebeer, prior to the 1st day of February, 1915, as attorneys and counselors at law, were engaged in the practice of their profession as copartners in the city of San Diego; that appellant Clark had been a client of the copartnership, and on the date mentioned a large amount of money was due the firm from appellant as fees for services rendered; that on August 6, 1915, the members of the copartnership settled and adjusted the accounts existing between the firm and appellant, and agreed that the indebtedness of Clark then was the sum of $650. It is further alleged that prior to the commencement of the action the individual members of the prior existing copartnership assigned and transferred to Henning, one of the members, all their right, title, and interest to the claim against Clark. The further essential allegation is contained in the complaint that demand had been duly made upon Clark for payment of the money and such demand had been refused. The name under which the firm of attorneys had been practicing contained the name of each of the copartners, except Casebeer. The complaint showed that fact, and further showed that prior to the commencement of the action a certificate, as required by section 2466 of the Civil Code, was duly executed, acknowledged, published, and filed in the office of the county clerk, showing the names of all the partners composing the copartnership. While the truth of the latter allegation was admitted by the answer, we may call attention here to the fact that the evidence showed that such certificate was filed on May 13, 1915, and published for the requisite number of times; the last publication being June 10, 1915. As one of the points made by appellant is that this action could not be maintained because the certificate had not been filed and published during the time that the copartnership was engaged in business, that matter may be first disposed of. It has been held that a copartnership, the trade designation of which does not include the names of all the copartners, may satisfy the requirements of sections 2466 and 2468, Civil Code, by making, filing, and publishing the certificate showing such names, even after suit brought and before answer. Rouillard v. Gray, 175 Pac. 479. The fact that the copartners had agreed upon a dissolution of the firm prior to the filing and publishing of the certificate referred to, we think, does not create a different legal situation than was considered in the case cited. To hold to the contrary would mean that under the facts none of the debts due to the copartnership could ever be collected by suit. Plainly the Code provisions were not designed to work that result. We pass, then, to the other questions presented.

[2, 3] It is contended in the main that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding as made by the trial court that the sum of $650 was agreed upon between the copartners and Clark as being immediately payable on August 6, 1915. In this regard the contention of appellant is that the evidence showed that his agreement to pay the $650 was contingent in that said amount was not to be paid until some alleged unfinished matters then in the hands of the law firm were concluded, and that the evidence showed there had never been performance of this obligation on the part of the law firm. This contention appears to us to be without merit. Appellant was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, and he testified that a meeting of this firm of lawyers of which he had been a client was held in his office in San Diego on August 6, 1915, and that the matter of his indebtedness to the firm, which was then being dissolved, was taken up; that he had been charged on the books of the firm with an indebtedness largely in excess of $650; and that, after discussing and considering the various items of his account, a final figure of $650 was reached. In response to questions by the court, he made the following replies:

"Q. What was that amount made up of, of the undisputed items? A. That was all for undisputed—for items that were justly charged to me. Q. For items that were justly charged to you and for services they had rendered? A. Yes, sir. Q. I understand you that a balance was struck there between you for services, what you did actually owe them of $650? A. Yes, sir. Q. For services? A. Approximately $650. We agreed on $650 as an even amount."

On cross-examination by his own counsel, the witness proceeded to qualify his former positive statement by adding the condition that his agreement to pay was contingent upon the performance of further services by the members of the firm. Several letters were introduced in evidence, as to the competency of which we have no doubt. One letter, under date of December 23, 1916, was written by Mr. McGee, a member of the former firm, to appellant, in which payment of the $650 was asked and in which the writer stated to the appellant that—

"After a very lengthy discussion, in which you questioned certain items, we agreed positively and definitely to accept $650. This you agreed to pay within a very short time, saying that you did not then have the available cash."

No reply was made to this letter. On February 6, 1917, the same writer again addressed a letter to appellant in an endeavor to secure payment of the money. This letter, among other things, contained the following statement:

"You know as well as I do that you agreed to pay $650 on a bill that was more than twice that amount. We have not desired to bother you. * * * But you must be convinced that our only desire was to settle the matter amicably, and that is the reason we made the compromise in the first instance. And that is the reason, also, that you promised to pay it on several occasions."

This letter was replied to by appellant, and in this reply for the first time, so far as the record of the correspondence shows, the appellant raised the question that there was the matter of the clearing of the title to some property which the law firm should do before he was compelled to pay. Mr. McGee answered this letter, denying that there was any such qualification to the agreement on the part of appellant to pay the money. The court was authorized to take the first statement of appellant, as given upon his direct examination, as being true, which was in effect that he had agreed to pay the $650 as a compromise amount on the claim made against him by his attorneys, and that such promise was without the qualification later sought to be attached to it. On the direct examination the court's question was specific and the answer positive, when it was asked, "For items that were justly charged to you and for services they had rendered?" the answer being, "Yes, sir." The court, too, not without warrant, attached significance, as is shown by the judge's statement made at the trial, to the fact that, in response to the first letter written by Mr. McGee to appellant after the compromise settlement had been made, in which letter Mr. McGee demanded payment of the $650, appellant made no reply whatsoever. That a person from whom money was demanded in that manner, and who claimed that payment of the same rested upon conditions unperformed, should not immediately make denial of the debt or call attention to the alleged contingencies affecting the time of payment, was a circumstance to be given such weight as the court might attach to it in determining the facts in connection with appellant's testimony. The sole question here is as to whether there was substantial evidence to support the finding of the court which is attacked. There was substantial evidence, we think, and the duty of resolving any conflict was one which rested solely with the trial judge, with the decision of whom upon the facts we have not the right to interfere.

[4] A demand for a bill of particulars had been made prior to the trial, and, such bill not being furnished, objection was made to the introduction of any testimony; appellant insisting that such objection should have been sustained because of the provisions of section 454, Code of Civil Procedure. That section, in part, provides as follows:

"It is not necessary for a party to set forth in a pleading the items of an account therein alleged, but he must deliver to the adverse party within five days after a demand thereof in writing, a copy of the account, or be precluded from giving evidence thereof."

Plaintiff here did not sue upon an account, but upon a settlement agreement arrived at after a consultation between the parties. Appellant by his own testimony admitted the amount agreed upon; hence an examination of the items which were considered in compromising the claim could not have been properly gone into at the trial. An examination of those items was foreclosed by the very fact that the parties agreed upon a sum total after reviewing the account, excluding certain items and determining a balance. The case of Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 15 Pac. 371, is in point against the contention of appellant. The whole controversy as submitted to the court was not as to the correctness of any charges made prior to the compromise settlement, but only as to whether the $650, admittedly agreed to be paid by appellant, was payable on demand or after some further services had been performed. We think that the evidence fully supports the findings and judgment, and that no error appears entitling appellant to a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. BRADFORD, Dist. Atty., v. BURCH et al. (Civ. 1987.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 2, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1920.)

1. Nuisance §83—Requisites of complaint under Red Light Abatement Law stated.

An action under the Red Light Abatement Law is not one for the abatement of prostitution, or of assignation, or of lewdness, but a civil action for the abatement of a public nuisance, permitted or maintained by the habitual practicing in a building, or in or on any premises, of acts of prostitution, assignation, or lewdness, and it is not necessary, in a complaint or information charging that lewdness was practiced on the premises, to describe the specific acts constituting the lewdness.

2. Nuisance §83—Evidence of sale of intoxicating liquor admissible in proceedings under Red Light Abatement Law.

In proceedings under the Red Light Abatement Law, directed against a theater and dance hall, it was not error to admit evidence of the sale of intoxicating liquors on the premises.

3. Nuisance §83—Finding that nuisance existed at time of commencement of abatement proceedings sustained.

In a proceeding under the Red Light Abatement Law, evidence held sufficient to show that a nuisance existed on the premises at the time of the commencement of the action.

4. Witnesses  372(2)—Cross-examination as to compensation of detectives held proper in proceedings under Red Light Abatement Law.

In a proceeding under the Red Light Abatement Law, it is proper to permit detectives employed by a law enforcement organization to testify on cross-examination that they were paid for their services and as to the precise amount of their compensation.

5. Appeal and error  1048(6)—Refusal of cross-examination as to compensation of detectives in nuisance proceedings held not prejudicial.

In a proceeding under the Red Light Abatement Law, the refusal to permit cross-examination of detectives employed by a law enforcement organization as to the amount of their compensation held not prejudicial error.

6. Appeal and error  1050(i)—Evidence by nonresidents as to general reputation held harmless error.

In a proceeding under the Red Light Abatement Law, admission of evidence by nonresidents as to the general reputation of the building as maintained by defendants, if error, held harmless.

7. Nuisance  84 — Procedure under Red Light Abatement Law to accord with general and elementary rules of evidence.

Proceedings under the Red Light Abatement Law are to be conducted according to the general and elementary rules of evidence, by which disputed questions of fact are to be determined in courts of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Proceeding by the People, on the relation of Hugh B. Bradford, District Attorney, against Charles T. Burch and another, to enjoin the use of certain premises under the Red Light Abatement Law. Decree for relator, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Hughes, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The action was brought under the "Red Light Abatement Law" (St. 1913, p. 20); the property affected being a one-story brick building known as No. 119 K street, in the city of Sacramento. The property was owned by the estate of Mary Sweeney, deceased, and Charles T. Burch was the owner of the personal property situate in the premises, which was known as the Casino Theater and Dance Hall. The judgment enjoined the use of the premises "for the purpose of acts of lewdness," directed the sheriff to close the building and keep it closed for one year, and also directed him to remove and sell all of the furniture, fixtures, and musical instruments in said building. The appeal is by said Burch and Ella Ryan, as executrix, etc., named in the complaint as respondents, and who will hereinafter be referred to as the appellants.

The first point advanced by the appellants is that three separate and distinct causes of action are stated in the complaint, but not separately stated, and that for that reason said pleading was faulty, and the demurrer thereto should have been sustained. It is further contended, in this connection, that the acts constituting the "lewdness," the practicing of which the complaint charged and the court found constituted the nuisance maintained in and at the premises complained of, should have been specifically set forth. As to this proposition, counsel for the appellants say:

"The complaint, we believe, was sufficient so far as a general demurrer was concerned, for it contained the essential allegations to charge that the premises constituted a nuisance because of the alleged acts of prostitution and assignation; but it did not contain a sufficient statement of facts to establish a nuisance based on the ground of lewdness. Had the court sustained the special demurrer on the ground that the complaint contained three causes of action, which should have been separately stated, appellant would then have been entitled to interpose a general demurrer to each count, and a general demurrer to the count alleging lewdness would have been well taken, in the event respondent had seen fit to plead it in the same language made use of in the complaint now before the court. How different would the judgment have been in such event? Respondent would have been denied relief, because adequate proof was wanting on the counts charging prostitution and assignation, and the demurrer would have been sustained to the third count, alleging lewdness, because respondent could not have pleaded sufficient facts to make out a case on that ground. Judgment therefore, would have gone for appellant. This must be so, because the record discloses evidence of no single act which could be termed lewd, unless we include evidence of facts transpiring long after the pleadings were settled."

[1] The reply to both the above-stated propositions and the argument of counsel in support thereof is to be found in the case of People ex rel. Bradford v. Laine, 182 Pac. 986, a petition for a hearing of which by the Supreme Court was denied, and to which we refer for a full discussion of said points. We may say, however, that in the case named it was pointed out that an action under the "Red Light Abatement Act" is not one for the abatement of prostitution, or of assignation, or of lewdness, but one for the abatement of a public nuisance committed or maintained by the habitual practicing in a building, or in or on any premises, of acts of prostitution, or assignation, or lewdness, and that it is a civil, and not a criminal, action. We may add that, if it were a distinct crime to practice lewdness in any manner in which acts of lewdness may be committed, then in a complaint, or an information, or indictment charging such offense it would be necessary to describe the specific acts constituting the lewdness. But, as stated, the situation in a case of this character is entirely different, the thing directly aimed at by the action being the nuisance. The cases cited in the Laine Case, supra, sustain this view. See, also, People v. Peterson et al., 187 Pac. 1079, and cases therein cited.

[2] Another point raised in the present appeal is that evidence of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Casino Dance Hall was improperly admitted. Our decision in the Laine Case, supra, also disposed of this point adversely to the contention of appellants.

It is next urged that, as the complaint alleged and the answer denied that a nuisance existed at the commencement of the action, a determination of the issue thus raised was necessary, and that the court did not determine the question. The allegation of the complaint, which was filed September 24, 1917, in this particular, was:

"That on or for some time prior to the 15th day of September, 1917, and ever since that date, said premises were and now are used for the purposes of lewdness," etc.

[3] The court found that certain facts existed, among which were certain enumerated acts of lewdness practiced by the inmates of the building complained of, the dates of the commission of said acts being specifically given. One of the dates on which it was found that acts of lewdness were committed by female inmates of the place was September 15, 1917, before the date of the institution of the action. Other dates on which said acts were found to have been practiced by such female inmates were December 11, 1917, and December 22, 1917, which were subsequent to the filing of the petition in the action, said petition having been filed and the action thus commenced on September 24, 1917. Furthermore, the court finds generally that there "was conducted in said building and on said premises what is termed a dance hall, with two bars and many boxes; that intoxicating liquors were sold in said dance hall," etc.; and then proceeds to find that certain acts of lewdness were practiced therein by the women and the men frequenting the same. We think it is clear that the implication from the findings, when considered, as they must be, in their entirety and by the light of the averments of the complaint, is that a nuisance existed in and on the premises complained of at the time of the commencement of the action, and that thus the proposition was determined by the court.

Counsel for appellants cite the case of People v. Dillman, 37 Cal. App. 415, 174 Pac. 951, as supporting the obviously sound proposition that, if a nuisance has been suppressed or abated before action to abate it has been commenced, and does not exist at the time of the commencement of the action for its suppression, then in that case such action has no foundation for its support, inasmuch as there would be no nuisance in existence to abate. But in the Dillman Case it was also said:

"If there had been evidence sufficient to support a finding that the nuisance had been abated before this action was commenced, we doubt not that the court below would have dismissed the proceeding or found against the averments of the petition."

In the present case there is no evidence to which our attention has been called or which has, on reading the transcript, arrested our attention that the nuisance complained of had been abated at the time of the commencement of the action. To the contrary, there is some evidence in the record tending to show that there was no ellipsis in the maintenance of the nuisance at and on the premises from the time that acts of lewdness were shown to have been practiced there before the filing of the petition for the abatement of the nuisance to a day or two prior to the day on which the trial of the action was begun.

The legal propriety of certain rulings of the court interdicting the cross-examination of certain witnesses for the plaintiff with regard to the question of their interest in the case in behalf of the plaintiff, and allowing testimony as to the general reputation of the premises complained of, is challenged and said rulings denounced as having been prejudicial in their effect upon the rights of the appellants. Of these, the first called to our attention involve a refusal by the court to allow the appellants to ask several witnesses, on cross-examination, how much they were paid for their services by the organization known as the "State Enforcement and Protective League," by which they had previously testified that they were employed as detectives or agents to secure proof against places in which prostitution or assignation or lewdness, or all these acts, were habitually carried on, and that they were fully paid for their services in prosecuting that work. Each of said witnesses was asked that question, to which the court sustained the objection interposed in each instance by the district attorney.

It has been held that it is proper cross-examination, as affecting the credibility of the testimony of a witness who, as a detective, has procured evidence and testified against a person charged with crime, to ask such witness how much compensation he is paid for his services as such detective, even after he has testified that he has been fully paid for such services. People v. Loris, 131 App. Div. 127, 115 N. Y. Supp. 236; State v. Carroll,

We can readily perceive the importance of bringing out, on cross-examination, if thus it can be done, the fact, if it be a fact, that a detective employed to procure evidence in a case is to be paid for his services as such only upon the contingency that the result of the trial is favorable to the side by which he is so employed, but we cannot perceive how the amount of his compensation, where not contingent or to be paid only upon his success in procuring evidence sufficient to gain a victory of the issue for his side, can be of any special consequence as affecting his credibility as a witness, since it may well be assumed that, where he is not shown to be otherwise personally interested in the case, he is receiving or to receive compensation for his services. Indeed, in this case, the detectives who testified for the petitioner stated, as seen, that they were compensated for their services, and this consideration could just as effectually have been pressed upon the court as revealing an interest in the case as against the appellants which alone should be regarded as of a character to affect, according as the trier of the facts might view it, the credibility of the detectives as witnesses as if the precise amount of their compensation had been shown, which fact is all that the question disallowed as cross-examination called for.

[4, 5] But, while we think it would have been the proper course to allow that question to be answered, and further to permit the cross-examination to be extended to an inquiry as to whether the compensation of the detectives for their services in procuring evidence sufficient to establish a case against the appellants was contingent upon their success in that behalf, still we are not convinced that we would be justified in holding that the errors involved in the disallowance of the cross-examination referred to were prejudicial, or, in view of a consideration of the entire record, operated to produce a miscarriage of justice in the case. The judge who tried the case, for some reason—perhaps from a consideration of the overwhelming evidence directly showing that acts of lewdness were practiced in the building—was undoubtedly of the opinion, as we may assume from his rulings, that what precise compensation the detectives received, or whether their compensation was contingent upon the establishment of a case under the law, would be a matter of no consequence one way or the other in the determination of the ultimate issue in the case, and from all this we may well assume that, if the cross-examination had been allowed and it had thus been developed how much compensation each of the detectives received for his services or that his compensation to some extent was made to depend on whether the premises, as maintained, were sufficiently shown to be a nuisance to warrant an adjudication to that effect, the result would not have been affected thereby or have been any different from what it was as indicated by the decree. But, at all events, the evidence seems to show conclusively that acts of lewdness—such as the exposure of their nether limbs to males by the female inmates and the general use of obscene language and the solicitation, addressed by the women to the male frequenters of the place, and expressed in the most vulgar words conceivable, to indulge with them in sexual acts for money—were habitually practiced in the place. Therefore, as before stated, we think it is very clear that no miscarriage of justice resulted from the errors complained of in the rulings disallowing the cross-examination referred to. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

The next point urged is that witnesses who were nonresidents of the county of Sacramento were permitted by the court, over appellants' objections, to testify concerning the general reputation of the premises in question. It is provided in the statute that—

"Evidence of the general reputation of the place shall be admissible for the purpose of proving the existence of said nuisance."

Among the witnesses who were permitted, against objection by the appellants, to testify to the general reputation of the premises, were Edwin E. Grant, executive officer of the State Law Enforcement and Protective League, an organization established for the special purpose of seeing that the Abatement Act is enforced, who once resided in Sacramento for a brief period, and who had since frequently visited said city; Harold F. Gray, state health officer of the Northern district of the state board of health, residing at Chico, but who had visited Sacramento several times during each of the several preceding years; S. J. Holsinger, secretary of the Church Federation of Sacramento, who testified that he had resided in Sacramento for the period of one month previously to the trial.

The objection here urged to the testimony of these witnesses is that "general reputation," being what people in a community commonly say about a thing existing or a person residing in such community, the witnesses named, since they were not residents of the city of Sacramento but made only sporadic visits thereto, were not competent to give testimony relative to the general reputation of the premises in question. As supporting this objection, counsel for appellants cite the case of Tingley v. Times-Mirror Co., 151 Cal. 1, 27, 89 Pac. 1097, 1107, and certain cases referred to in the opinion therein. The testimony excluded by the trial court in that case was in the form of a deposition by a party who had gone to the city of Boston for the express purpose of investigating the character and standing in that city, where she once resided, of the plaintiff; the witness making the deposition having gone to Boston for the purpose stated "with a special bias," as the court said, against plaintiff. Upholding the action of the trial court in refusing to receive the deposition and permit it to be read in evidence in the case, the Supreme Court said:

"As general reputation consists of the estimation in which one is held in the community in which he resides, it can only properly and safely be testified to by a member of the community; it is the opinion of a member of a community as to the estimation in which another who moves in it is held generally by that community. Such member has the means of knowing what that general reputation is and can properly speak of it. It would be extremely dangerous to enlarge the rule so as to permit a stranger to a community, entering into it with special bias against another (as this Boston witness showed he was against plaintiff), to testify as to his opinion of the reputation of that other, based upon an interview with a limited number of persons in the community, possibly equally as prejudiced as himself. Under such circumstances it could not be said that he was testifying from his knowledge of the general reputation of the party, or that he was expressing his own opinion on the subject. He would be but stating his conclusion from the statements of others, derived from specific inquiry—a conclusion which would amount to but hearsay evidence at most. (State v. Forshner, 43 N. H. 89, 80 Am. Dec. 134; Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. 352, 20 Am. Dec. 616.)"

[6] No just adverse criticism of the rule as it is above stated can be suggested; and, while we are not prepared now to say that what is said in the above extract from the case named applies with all its force to testimony of the general reputation of a building as a place where acts of lewdness are customarily practiced, we are prepared to say that the testimony as to that matter was wholly unnecessary in this case, if the court below, as we may assume that it did, attached full credit to the other testimony directly showing that such acts were, and had been for some time prior to and down to the time of the commencement of this action, customarily practiced in the building, for, as before declared, the direct testimony referred to is amply sufficient to support the findings and the decree. And it is for this reason that we are precluded from holding that the error, if it was error, in admitting the testimony of the general reputation of the building as maintained by the appellants was prejudicial in its effect upon the rights of appellants or resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

There are some other assignments involving the claim that prejudicial error was committed by certain rulings bearing upon certain evidence; but those, even if the assignments are well made, we regard as of such minor consequence as to justify us in concluding that they could not have affected or changed the result arrived at by the trial court upon the ample direct evidence showing or strongly tending to show that in the building involved herein acts of lewdness were habitually committed by both the female and male frequenters of the place.

[7] We may well conclude this opinion by calling attention to the fact that we have before taken occasion to say that it is no part of the duty of a prosecuting officer to establish a case, either criminal or one arising under the "Red Light Abatement Act," by means of improper testimony (People v. Dillman, supra), and that in a case of either kind there should be no desire to accomplish a victory for the people unless there is available to the prosecutor sufficient competent testimony to justify a conviction or a judgment. The purposes of the Abatement Act, laudable though they may be, have in no way changed the general and elementary rules of evidence by which disputed questions of fact are to be determined in courts of justice, and we can conceive of no reason why they should be departed from in the proof of a case under said act. Indeed, since the statute authorizes the court in a case of this character to deprive, by its decree, the owner of a building of which complaint is made under said statute of its use for any purpose for the period of one year from the date of the decree, and further likewise authorizes the confiscation of the personal property used in the building, it is eminently proper that the trial of such an action should, if anything, be prosecuted with greater care and consideration of the rights of such owner or owners than is the ordinary civil case.

The foregoing suggestions are prompted by the conviction, crystallized from an examination of records on appeal in many of the cases prosecuted under the Abatement Act which have come to this court on appeal, that there appears to be a disposition to sustain the complaints therein by means of incompetent as well as competent evidence, and we are constrained to say that the record before us justifies us in declaring that this case does not appear to be altogether free from this criticism.

However, for the reasons herein given, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CUDDAHY v. GRAGG et al.
(Civ. 3166.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 16, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨103—Order granting motion to strike demurrer from files not appealable.

An order granting a motion to strike a demurrer from the files on the ground that it was not filed within the time allowed by law, that it was not served within time, and was frivolous, is not appealable.

2. Judgment ⇨107—Default cannot be entered where pleading is on file though filed after time.

A default judgment cannot be entered where there is a pleading as demurrer on file, though it was filed after expiration of time.

3. Pleading ⇨352—Where a pleading is filed after expiration of time allowed, it may be stricken.

Where a demurrer is filed by defendant after expiration of the time for pleading, it may be stricken because filed out of time.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1042(1)—Striking demurrer from files harmless error, where defendant could have answered or again demurred.

Where the court would have been warranted in overruling defendant's demurrer filed after expiration of time without leave to answer, defendant cannot complain that his demurrer was stricken from the files where default was not entered until almost three months after the motion to strike was granted, and meanwhile defendant on proper showing could have moved for leave to file an answer or even another demurrer.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1031(1)—No presumption of injury from error.

Since the adoption of Const. art. 6, § 4½, injury is no longer presumed from error, but must affirmatively appear from an examination of the record or from the extrinsic nature of the error itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. H. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Martin P. Cuddahy against C. P. Gragg and others and Clyde L. Connor. From an order striking his demurrer from the files as well as a judgment of foreclosure, the last-named defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Harry Ellis Dean, V. J. Cobb, and W. L. Pollard, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. C. Hall and Hogan & Carlson, all of Bishop, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property in Inyo county. Defendant Connor appeals from the decree of foreclosure, given and made after the entry of his default.

[1] Plaintiff, the holder of the mortgage and the promissory notes secured thereby, filed an amended complaint, making parties defendant, besides the mortgagor and maker of the notes, the defendant Connor and others, who, the complaint alleges, claim to have some interest in or lien upon the mortgaged premises as subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers. The summons was served upon Connor in Inyo county on January 25, 1917. Return on the summons was not made until February 12, 1917. Meanwhile, on February 7, 1917, or three days after the expiration of the 10 days afforded him by the law within which to appear and answer or demur, Connor filed a demurrer to the amended complaint. Service of the demurrer was made on February 5, 1917, by mailing it at Los Angeles, addressed to plaintiff's attorney at Bishop. Thereafter, on notice duly served and filed, plaintiff moved to strike the demurrer from the files upon the grounds: (1) That it was not filed within the time allowed by law; (2) that it was not served within the time allowed by law; and (3) that it is sham and frivolous. At the time noticed, viz., April 10, 1917, the motion to strike was granted on the ground that the demurrer was not served or filed within the time allowed by law. On July 5, 1917, Connor's default was entered by the clerk, and on July 13, 1917, the foreclosure decree was entered. Appellant appeals both from the judgment and the order striking the demurrer from the files. The order is not appealable, and the appeal therefrom must therefore be dismissed.

It is contended that the court erred in striking appellant's demurrer from the files and in entering judgment against him on his default. As we think the order was warranted by the fact that the demurrer was not filed in time, we shall not consider whether it is justifiable on either of the two other grounds stated in the notice of motion.

[2, 3] Appellant has cited a number of cases wherein it is held that a default for failure to answer or demur cannot be entered if, at the time of the entry of default, an answer or demurrer be on file, even though it was filed out of time. That a court has no authority to enter the default of a defendant if, when it is entered, he has a pleading on file, even though it was filed out of time, is a proposition supported by an almost unbroken line of decisions. The pleading, though filed out of time, is not a nullity; and until it has been disposed of by motion, or in some appropriate manner, no judgment by default can be entered. Tregambo v. Comanche M. & M. Co., 57 Cal. 501; Reher v. Reed, 166 Cal. 525, 137 Pac. 263, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 737; Hestres v. Clements, 21 Cal. 425; Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 Pac. 907; Bertagnolli Bros. v. Bertagnolli, 23 Wyo. 228, 148 Pac. 374; Kerney v. Hatfield, 30 Idaho, 90, 162 Pac. 1077; Ann. Cas. 1915C, p. 738, note to Reher v. Reed, supra. But while it is true that a defendant's default may not be entered until his demurrer or other pleading, though filed after the time permitted by law, has been disposed of, nevertheless it is a proper practice in such case to move to strike the pleading from the files. The plaintiff has no absolute right to have the pleading stricken from the files merely because it was not filed in time; and, on the other hand, the defendant has no absolute right to have his belated pleading remain in the files; for a defendant cannot, as of right, answer or demur after the expiration of the time prescribed by statute. It is a proper practice, therefore, for the plaintiff to move to strike the pleading from the files; and, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the court very properly may grant such motion to strike. Pett v. Clark, 5 Wis. 198; Bowers v. Dickerson, 18 Cal. 420; Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 219, 220, 27 Pac. 193; Lunnun v. Morris, supra; Bertagnolli Bros. v. Bertagnolli, supra; Ann. Cas. 1915C, p. 738.

"If pleaded out of time, or if leave was not obtained, or if there was any reason why the defendant ought not to have been allowed to plead, the proper practice would have been to move to strike the plea from the files. Having done so, and the motion having been sustained, the default could be entered. * * *" Pett v. Clark, supra.

[4, 5] Moreover, even if striking the demurrer from the files could be regarded as an irregularity, at most it could be regarded as harmless error only—an irregularity not resulting in a "miscarriage of justice." The complaint does not appear to be demurrable on any of the grounds set forth in the demurrer. At any rate, appellant has not called to our attention any defect in the complaint; and we perceive none. The case seems to be one where the court would be warranted in treating the demurrer as frivolous, interposed to gain time, and in overruling it without leave to answer. Seale v. McLaughlin, 28 Cal. 669; Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 95. The result to defendant would be the same whether his demurrer were overruled without leave to answer, or stricken from the files. Nay, in the instant case, striking the demurrer from the files was less disadvantageous to defendant than if it had been overruled without leave to answer. His default was not entered until almost three months after plaintiff's motion to strike was granted. Meanwhile, on making a proper showing, by affidavit, of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, appellant had he been so advised, could have moved the court for leave to file an answer or even another demurrer. This he did not elect to do. Since the adoption, in its present form, of section

4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, injury no longer is presumed from error, but must appear affirmatively upon an examination of the record or from the intrinsic nature of the error itself. We fail to see how appellant could have been harmed by the course pursued by the lower court, even if we should concede, which we do not, that striking the demurrer from the files was not a proper disposition to make of it.

The appeal from the order is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

FISK v. POPLIN. (Civ. 3262.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 16, 1920.)

1. Trial — 165 — Motion for nonsuit admits truth of plaintiff's evidence.

Conflicts in the evidence could not be considered on motion for nonsuit.

2. Municipal corporations — 706(5) — Findings of pedestrian's care and automobile driver's negligence as cause of accident supported.

In action for injuries when struck by defendant's automobile while crossing a street, plaintiff's testimony held sufficient to support findings that plaintiff exercised ordinary and proper care for her own safety, and that negligent acts of defendant were proximate cause of accident.

3. Negligence — 3 — Law fixes no exact standard of care.

The law fixes no exact standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in the particular circumstances.

4. Damages — 43, 160 — Medical expenses may be recovered; proof of incurring physician's bill inadmissible under allegation of payment.

One cannot prove that he has incurred a physician's bill under an allegation in his action for injuries that he has paid it, but under a proper pleading, where such fact is averred in the complaint, recovery may be had for medical services for which one has become liable.

5. Damages — 148 — Allegation insufficient to cover liability for medical, hospital, and nursing expenses.

In action by woman for injuries when struck by defendant's automobile, allegation of complaint that plaintiff had been forced to expend $300 in doctor's bills, hospital bills, medicines, and X-ray pictures, no part of which had been paid, and would be compelled to expend a larger sum, held insufficient to cover any liability for medical, hospital, and nursing expenses.

6. Damages — 130(2) — $500 for injuries to kneejoint not excessive.

In action for injuries to woman when struck by plaintiff's automobile allowance of $500 damages for pain and suffering and present and possible future disability from injury to a kneejoint required to be strapped to keep it from slipping held warranted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Clara H. Fisk against John S. Poplin. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed, subject to remittitur.

H. L. Poplin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. E. Morris, Frank Karr, and Nat B. Browne, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. [1] This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $682.75, recovered by the plaintiff as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent driving of defendant's automobile, which resulted in a collision between it and the plaintiff, causing her injury. The appellant assigns as error the ruling of the trial court in denying his motion for nonsuit, made at the end of plaintiff's case, and also assigns as error certain findings of the trial court, under the claim that such findings are not sustained by the evidence. Both contentions may be considered together, as both involve a discussion of the evidence appearing in the record, which is favorable to the contentions of the plaintiff. Conflicts in the evidence could not be considered upon a motion for nonsuit, and, in view of the findings of the trial court, which were favorable to the plaintiff, we are not concerned with the evidence which may appear in the record to support the defendant's contentions, as our examination of the evidence must end upon finding therein substantial support for the findings of the trial court.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was crossing Hill street at its intersection with Sixth street, in Los Angeles. Hill street runs north and south and crosses Sixth street at right angles. There are double street car tracks on each street. The plaintiff was crossing Hill street from east to west on the north side of Sixth street. When she had reached a point on the north-bound tracks on Hill street, she was struck by defendant's automobile, which was going north on Hill street. The court found that the plaintiff exercised ordinary and proper care for her own safety, and that the negligent acts of the defendant were the direct and proximate cause of the accident.

[2] These findings are supported by plaintiff's testimony that, when near the curb on the east side of Hill street, she looked up and down the street and saw no vehicles whatever coming; that she looked ahead at the street car coming to a stop on the tracks on the west side of Hill street, "except I looked both ways as I stepped from the curb, and there were no vehicles whatever within my sight." It is contended by appellant that this testimony is contradicted by the physical facts. Appellant assumes, without any evidence in the record therefor, that defendant's automobile was on the south line of Sixth street at the instant that the plaintiff started to cross the street, and then he argues that if plaintiff had looked she must have seen it. He further argues, in this connection, that the finding of the court and the testimony of the several witnesses that the defendant was going at the rate of 15 miles an hour are contradicted by the physical facts. He points out that, if the machine had been going at the rate of 15 miles an hour and had left the south line of Sixth street at the instant plaintiff started across the street, it would have passed the point of collision before plaintiff reached it in view of the admitted measurements of the street, and the admitted speed at which plaintiff was walking. We may not, however, assume that the automobile left the south line of Sixth street at the instant plaintiff started across the street, in the absence of evidence upon this point, and in contradiction of the findings of other facts made by the trial court. The motorman on the south-bound car that had just stopped at the north line of Sixth street at the time of the accident testified that he saw the automobile first when it had about reached the center of Sixth street. The traffic policeman, who stood in the center of the street at the intersection of the two streets, testified that he saw the automobile when it passed in front of him; that plaintiff was almost at the east rail of the north-bound track when he first saw her, and the automobile was just then passing in front of him. There is other testimony to the same effect. There is no testimony establishing the basic fact of appellant's argument. Indeed, if we proceed along the chain of logic from the finding of the court that the defendant was going at the rate of 15 miles an hour, and take into consideration the admitted facts with regard to distances and the rate of speed at which plaintiff was walking, we arrive at the inevitable conclusion that the automobile was some distance south of the south line of Sixth street when plaintiff started to cross the street.

The trial court found that the defendant was traveling in his automobile north bound on Hill street and near the center of said street, and that the said defendant negligently failed to keep any proper lookout for pedestrians, and negligently failed to give any warning of his approach to the place of accident, and that at said time he was traveling at about 15 miles per hour, and that such rate of speed was negligent under the circumstances, that at said time and place there were no other vehicles or other pedestrians to have prevented defendant from driving on the right-hand side of said street and near the curb thereof, and that he negligently drove near the center of said street. It is true the defendant testified that there was a wagon on the right-hand side of the street which made it necessary for him to drive in the center of the street in order to pass the same, but there is testimony of several other witnesses from which the court might conclude that this wagon was not in a position to interfere with defendant in driving to the right of the center of the street at that place and that time.

[3] It would serve no useful purpose to answer all the arguments made by the appellant to show that the defendant was in the exercise of proper care, and that the plaintiff was not. These are questions of fact for which there is no precise and unvarying measure. As was said in the case of Scott v. San Bernardino V., etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677, cited by both parties here:

"The law has fixed no exact standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in the particular circumstances. Hence in ordinary cases it is peculiarly a question for the jury or court trying the cause to decide as a matter of fact whether or not the person was culpably negligent."

[4, 5] The other objection of the appellant is made in regard to the damages allowed. It is contended that, as the proof shows that the doctor's bill of $100 has not yet been paid, and as the proof also shows that the bill for hospital and nurse was paid by plaintiff's son, with whom she lives, therefore it was improper to allow the same under the allegations of the complaint, as these sums were not expended by the plaintiff. It is true that the cases hold that one cannot prove that he has incurred a physician's bill under an allegation that he has paid it. Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, 79 Cal. p. 76, 21 Pac. 546. But it is also true that under a proper pleading, where that fact is averred in the complaint, recovery may be had for medical services for which one has become liable. Donnelly v. Hufschmidt, supra; McLaughlin v. Railway Co., 113 Cal. 592, 45 Pac. 839. It would appear, however, that in this case the allegations of the complaint are not sufficient to cover such liability. The allegation of the complaint is that plaintiff "has been forced to expend the sum of $300 in doctor's bills, hospital bills, and medicines and X-ray pictures, no part of which has been paid, and will be compelled to expend a larger sum in the future, the exact amount of which cannot at this time be determined."

[6] The court, in allowing damages in the sum of $682.75, evidently allowed $100 for the doctor's bill, which was at that time unpaid, and $82.75 for hospital bills, etc., which had been paid by the plaintiff's son, and $500 for damages for pain and suffering and present and possible future disability. The physician testified that it was hard to say whether or not the injury to the knee was permanent; that it had not improved much in four months, and that it might remain weak for an indefinite time, and that he thought it might be a permanent injury; that plaintiff had been in the hospital from October 16 to November 20, 1917; that she suffered considerably for a few days as a result of the injury; that he had examined her knee on May 14, 1918, and found inflammation of the bone where the bone had been fractured, and also found that there was too much play from side to side of the bones of the knee-joint when she would use her knee; and that he had made plaintiff a leather strap around the knee to keep it from slipping. The evidence of the plaintiff and her son was to the same effect, and plaintiff also testified that she was using the brace provided by her physician up to the time of the trial. Under such circumstances, it would seem that the allowance of $500 damages for pain and suffering and present and possible future disability was fully warranted. The $82.75 paid by the son as the hospital bill for his mother was a proper allowance. We may assume in favor of the findings of the court, that this amount was paid by the son as agent of his mother. The mother was an elderly woman, and when she was ill at a hospital her son, with whom she lived, would naturally pay her bills for her. Under the holding of the cases cited herein, it appears, however, that the introduction of evidence of the unpaid doctor's bill was improper under the pleadings. The objection of the defendant to this evidence that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and did not tend to prove any issue made by the pleadings, was sufficient objection.

In the case of McLaughlin v. Railway Co., 113 Cal. 592, 45 Pac. 839, where a similar situation arose, the court reversed the judgment and remanded the case with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint to include therein an allegation covering expenses incurred, as well as expenses paid. This would have to be the order in the present case but for the suggestion and request of the plaintiff and respondent that, if this court should decide that the allowance of the amount of the doctor's bill was erroneous, it order the plaintiff to remit that amount of the judgment. Under the circumstances, we can see no reason for sending the case back for a new trial, resulting in delay and expense, for an error, the effect of which can be corrected upon appeal so as to protect the rights of the defendant and at the same time be satisfactory to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff and respondent is therefore ordered to remit $100 of the judgment obtained, and, when said amount has been remitted, the judgment will stand affirmed.

Courts ⇨476—Original application to appellate court to enforce private rights, denied.

Where a petition for mandamus is based on private rights only, and does not show any peculiar emergency or exigency justifying the issuance of the writ by the appellate court in the first instance, it shows no sufficient reason why it should not have been made to the superior court, and the application will be denied.

Original application for mandamus by S. N. Clark and another against L. E. Shepherd and others. Application denied.

Alfred H. McAdoo, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandamus. The application is based upon private rights only. The matters to be litigated are not publici juris. Nor does it appear that some peculiar emergency or exigency exists, such as would justify the issuance of the writ by this court in the first instance. The petition shows no sufficient reason why the application should not have been made to the superior court, and the application for the writ is therefore denied.

1. Divorce ⇨91—Residence giving jurisdiction must be alleged and proved.

Under Civ. Code, § 128, it is the fact of residence which gives the court jurisdiction to grant divorce, and such fact must be alleged and proved.

2. Divorce ⇨152—Finding of jurisdictional fact of residence not necessary before court can deny decree.

Finding of the fact of residence giving the court, under Civ. Code, § 128, jurisdiction to grant divorce, is not required before the court can deny a decree, particularly when both allegation and proof thereof are amply sufficient to meet every demand.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(6)—Failure to find harmless in absence of evidence on which finding could have been made.

Failure to find on issue is not ground for reversal, where record discloses no evidence on which a finding favorable to the complaining party could properly have been made.

4. Divorce ⇨146—Order for submission of cause not erroneous as depriving plaintiff of fair trial.

Plaintiff in a divorce action held not deprived of fair trial by action of court in ordering cause submitted after hearing defendant's and plaintiff's testimony and receiving depositions.

Action for divorce by James Arlington Loudon against Sarah Hancock Loudon. From judgment denying divorce, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank C. Collier, John Schlegel, and Louis F. Laberere, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an action for divorce brought by the plaintiff upon grounds of desertion and extreme cruelty. Defendant denied the allegation of the complaint, and by way of recrimination charged the plaintiff with many acts of alleged cruelty, inflicted upon her by the plaintiff, and with failing to properly support defendant and the two minor children of the marriage. She prayed for the custody of the children, for a division of the community property, and for counsel fees and expenses of maintaining the action. The trial court made full and explicit findings, the ultimate facts found being that the defendant left the plaintiff, by reason of the harsh and cruel treatment of the defendant, and said minor children, by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was guilty of extreme cruelty toward the defendant, in that he caused her grievous mental suffering.

The plaintiff was denied any relief, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant that she recover, from the plaintiff, the sum of $200, as her reasonable attorney's fee, also her costs of court and all moneys necessarily expended by her in defense of the action, taxed at and allowed for the sum of $285.50. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

Appellant first attacks the finding of the trial court as to the residence of the parties. The original complaint was filed January 29, 1918, and the amended complaint was filed March 11, the same year. It is granted by appellant that in each of these pleadings the averment of residence was sufficient. The truth of the allegation was admitted in the answer, and appellant further concedes, and the record discloses, that the fact of the jurisdictional residence of the parties was clearly established and amply corroborated by the testimony taken at the trial in the court below. The finding is:

"That the plaintiff and defendant have each been, and now are, residents of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, for more than one year last past."

The findings were filed August 8, 1918. Appellant contends that this is not a finding that the parties, or either of them, resided within the jurisdiction of the court for one year, next preceding the commencement of the action, but is "a finding of no jurisdiction for want of residence." He reasons, "Of course, plaintiff's divorce must be denied on such a finding, which is contrary to the evidence." On this ground he demands a reversal.

[1-3] It is the fact of the residence which gives the court jurisdiction to "grant" a divorce. Section 128, Civ. Code. That fact must be alleged and proved. While a finding, similar to the one above quoted, was held insufficient to support a decree of divorce, in Coleman v. Coleman, 23 Cal. App. 423, 138 Pac. 362, the Supreme Court has since pointed out that there is no statutory provision making express findings essential to the jurisdiction of a court to grant such relief. Flynn v. Flynn, 171 Cal. 746, 749, 154 Pac. 837. We know of none requiring such a finding, as that called for by appellant, to be made before the court may "deny" a decree, particularly when, as in the case at bar, both allegation and proof were amply sufficient to meet every demand. Furthermore, the failure to find on an issue is not ground for reversal where the record discloses no evidence on which a finding favorable to the complaining party could properly have been made. Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571, 573, 166 Pac. 330.

Appellant specifies a number of particulars in which he claims the findings of fact are general, not warranted by the evidence, and not sufficient to support the judgment. A reading of the entire findings, however, and an examination of the voluminous record of the testimony, indicates that appellant, in making this contention, has only picked out isolated portions of the findings. He also fails to print in his appendix a large portion of the record which respondent has called our attention to, and which fully supports the findings attacked. As a whole the findings are complete and properly dispose of the issues presented by the pleadings and proof.

[4] Appellant contends that he was deprived of a fair trial by the action of the court in ordering the cause submitted, as it did. The record does not bear him out in this particular. In the opinion of the trial judge the plaintiff was failing to make out a case. He so stated, giving reasons which appear to be sound, and directed the attention of counsel to some of the testimony on which he based his opinion. In order to cover one feature of the alleged desertion of plaintiff by the defendant, the latter was called to the stand, by the court's permission, and with consent of counsel. She was being cross-examined by the attorney for the plaintiff, when the court suggested that immaterial matters were being gone into, and that owing to other court business the case would be closed at noon on that day. When the cross-examination was finished, counsel for the plaintiff offered, and there were received, in evidence five depositions in rebuttal; it being stipulated that the court, at its own convenience, might read the same. The plaintiff was then recalled as a witness in his own behalf, and testified in rebuttal at some length. The court thereupon stated that any further evidence would be merely cumulative; that with the permission of the parties he would take the case under submission, read the depositions, and decide the matter in the course of a few days. The record indicates that this course was agreeable to all the parties and that with that understanding the case was submitted. Plaintiff's affidavit, used on motion for a new trial, to the effect he was surprised by the action of the court, finds no support in the record, and presents no matter of such compelling force as to indicate he did not have ample opportunity to fully present every phase of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

KOEBERLE v. COIT. (Civ. 3174.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 28, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 553(2)—Statutes authorizing appeal on typewritten transcript do not provide for presenting evidence by bill of exceptions.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 953a, 953b, and 953c, providing for an appeal on typewritten transcript, make no provision for presenting the evidence by a bill of exceptions, and it is only where the proceedings on trial have been reported and can be reproduced in full by the reporter's transcript that this form of appeal can be resorted to.

2. Chattel mortgages $\S$ 72—Note and chattel mortgage given to avoid lawful levy of execution is valid.

A note and chattel mortgage given to avoid lawful levy of execution on property not shown to be exempt and to avoid annoyance and humiliation are valid and enforceable.

3. Chattel mortgages $\S$ 79—Evidence insufficient to show that note and mortgage were obtained by threats to make invalid levy.

In an action on a note and chattel mortgage given by a judgment debtor who asserted that they were obtained by duress and menace by means of threat to levy execution upon exempt household furniture, and to cause the judgment debtor humiliation, evidence held to warrant a finding that the property proposed to be levied on was not exempt, and that the note and mortgage were not procured through fraud or menace.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by William Koeberle against Kathryn Coit. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Thompson and J. H. Creighton, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Horace S. Wilson and Frank Lillard, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought upon a promissory note and chattel mortgage securing the same. The note and security had been given in satisfaction of a judgment against defendant on a store account. The defense was that the note and mortgage had been obtained by duress and menace, by means of a threat to levy execution under the former judgment upon defendant's exempt household furniture, and to set the same out in the street in front of defendant's home so that the neighbors would see that defendant's household goods were being taken under process of law. The trial court found against defendant's contention, and gave judgment for plaintiff on the note and mortgage, from which judgment defendant has appealed. The ground relied on for a reversal is insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment.

[1] The record is brought up on what purports to be a typewritten transcript under the alternative method of appeal, and consists of the judgment-roll and what is denominated a "bill of exceptions," and comprises a list of exceptions and objections to the jurisdiction of the court, to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and a brief synopsis of the evidence, in narrative form, followed by a certificate of the trial judge that—

"Because the foregoing evidence does not appear of record, I, the undersigned, the judge who tried the said action, have, on due notice, settled this bill of exceptions, to the end and for the purpose that the same may be made a part of the record herein."

Sections 953a, 953b, and 953c, Code of Civil procedure, providing for an appeal upon the typewritten transcript, make no provision for presenting the evidence by a bill of exceptions. It is only where the proceedings on the trial have been reported and can be produced in full by a reporter's transcript that this form of appeal can be resorted to. Clemens v. Gregg, 34 Cal. App. 272, 167 Pac. 299; Harpold v. Slocum, 168 Cal. 364, 143 Pac. 609; Bush v. Allen, 172 Cal. 102, 155 Pac. 456; Allen v. Conrey, 22 Cal. App. 409, 134 Pac. 730. Respondent has, however, interposed no objection to the sufficiency of the transcript. To what extent, if at all, this may constitute a waiver of the defects pointed out we will not stop to consider, since we are satisfied that the evidence as presented does not show such a failure of proof with respect to any of the material findings as to justify a reversal.

[2, 3] The only material issue of fact in controversy is whether plaintiff procured the execution of this note and chattel mortgage by fraud, duress, or menace.

Defendant, in her testimony, avers that plaintiff and an associate representing himself as a constable appeared at her home demanding payment of the amount due on the original judgment against defendant, and, upon her expressing her inability to pay at that time, threatened then and there to take her household goods on an execution unless she gave a note and chattel mortgage for the amount due and owing, stating that in case of her refusal they would set the goods out on the street where her neighbors would be informed that defendant's goods were being seized for debt; and that to prevent such levy she consented to execute the securities demanded. Plaintiff and his witness, the constable, testify that they went to defendant's home with an execution, demanded payment of the judgment, and, on defendant's failure to pay, were about to levy upon some pictures that were in defendant's house, but offered to give defendant further time if she would give a note for the amount, secured by mortgage upon certain articles of furniture, which defendant claimed to be her separate property; that defendant consented; and that it was under this state of facts that the note and mortgage were given.

There is no evidence in the record offered that the pictures referred to were "hanging pictures," "oil paintings or drawings painted or drawn by any member of the family," or "family portraits," or otherwise exempt from execution under section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court seems to have accepted plaintiff's version of the transaction. There was nothing unlawful in threatening to take on execution any property of defendant not exempt from execution. And if the note and mortgage were given to avoid a lawful levy, and any annoyance or humiliation attending such enforcement of collection of a valid debt, the defense offered in this case cannot be maintained.

We cannot say that the court was not justified in accepting the plaintiff's evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

NUSSBAUM v. TRAUNG LABEL & LITHOGRAPH CO. et al. (Civ. 2114.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 15, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations — 706(5)—Evidence justifying finding automobile driver was negligent.

In action against two corporations and employé of one of them, selling agent for the other, for injuries to plaintiff when struck by automobile driven by the employé, evidence held to justify finding employé was negligent, and that it was his negligence which directly caused plaintiff's injury.

2. Master and servant — 300—Master responsible for damage to third persons by torts of servant.

Master is responsible to third persons for damage caused by wrongful acts or omissions of his servant in course of employment.

3. Master and servant — 302(1)—Liability for negligence of servant depends on authority.

Test of master's liability for negligence of servant in all cases depends on question whether injury was committed by authority of master, expressly conferred or fairly implied from nature of employment and duties incident, having regard to object, purpose, and end of employment.

4. Master and servant — 302(6)—Master not responsible for act of servant in his own behalf.

When servant acts without reference to services for which he is employed, and not to perform his employer's work, but for an independent purpose of his own, the employer is not responsible for his acts or omissions.

5. Master and servant — 330(1)—Burden on injured party to show servant acted within master's "business."

To establish liability of corporation for consequences of negligence of employé, burden rests on plaintiff, the injured party, to show that, when accident occurred, employé driving company's automobile was about its "business"; that is, engaged in doing some act within sphere of his duties as salesman for the company, or incident thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Business.]

6. Master and servant — 330(3) — Evidence held not to warrant finding salesman driving automobile was within scope of duties.

In action against corporation for injuries to plaintiff struck by company's automobile driven by its salesman, evidence held not to warrant finding that at time of accident salesman was acting within scope of his duties as such, or that act of returning automobile to place where he was to report in the morning was incident to his duties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Carl F. Nussbaum against the Traung Label & Lithograph Company, a corporation, the Union Lithograph Company, a corporation, and R. W. Hornbeck. From judgment for plaintiff against defendants Union Lithograph Company and R. W. Hornbeck, they appeal. Judgment against defendant Hornbeck affirmed; judgment against defendant Union Lithograph Company reversed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants, Ray E. Nimmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for personal injuries. The case was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment was awarded the plaintiff for the sum of $439.25 against the defendants the Union Label & Lithograph Company and R. W. Hornbeck. The defendant Traung Label & Lithograph Company was acquitted by the court of any culpability in connection with the cause of the injuries complained of by plaintiff, and was accordingly awarded judgment for its costs. The appeal here is by the other defendants, the Union Label & Lithograph Company and Hornbeck, from the judgment against them.

The Union Label & Lithograph Company

was, at the time the injuries complained of by plaintiff were received by him, the agent in Southern California of the Traung Label & Lithograph Company for the purpose of selling the latter's labels in that part of California. The defendant Hornbeck was in the employment of the Union Company (as for the sake of brevity we will hereafter refer to said corporation the Union Label & Lithograph Company) as a salesman. For the purpose of facilitating the discharge of Hornbeck's duties as a salesman of said articles, the Union Company furnished him with an automobile. It appears that the automobile so furnished was the property of the Traung Company, but had been let or turned over by said company to the Union Company for the latter's use.

The general facts of the accident resulting in the injuries to the plaintiff are substantially as they are given in the following findings of the court:

"That on or about the 6th day of October, 1917, at the hour of about 8:55 o'clock in the forenoon of said date, while plaintiff was walking across Broadway at the north side of the intersection of Eighth street, in a westerly direction, in the city of Los Angeles, the defendant R. W. Hornbeck, who was then and there an agent and employé of the defendant corporation the Union Lithograph Company, and who was then and there operating and driving an automobile * * * for the use and benefit of said defendant corporation the Union Lithograph Company, did then and there willfully, negligently, wantonly, carelessly, and with wanton and reckless indifference to the safety of said plaintiff, drive and propel said automobile against said plaintiff and knocked him down, and in order to save himself from severe injury and while in the act of falling said plaintiff grabbed the left fender of said automobile, and was then and there dragged by said automobile for a distance of upwards of 10 feet before said automobile came to a stop, and thereby sustained the following injuries: [Describing them.]

"That plaintiff, upon entering the crossing of said intersection, did look in both directions to see whether or not there were any approaching motor vehicles, and did observe the said automobile driven by said defendant R. W. Hornbeck approaching from a southerly direction and about 200 feet away and proceeded to cross said intersection until he was obliged to stop by reason of the fact that there was on the westerly street car tracks a street car which was slowly proceeding in a southerly direction on such street car tracks, but, while plaintiff did not use ordinary care in that he failed to look both ways after proceeding across said intersection, yet the negligence of the said defendant R. W. Hornbeck was the proximate cause of the injuries so sustained by said plaintiff, in that he did not attempt, after discovering the location of said plaintiff in the middle of said street, to avoid the collision by stopping the said automobile; that he had control of said machine; that he saw plaintiff when at a distance of not less than 25 feet away from him; and that he could have stopped said automobile had he not been entirely indifferent to the safety of said plaintiff, and could have avoided striking plaintiff."

The general contentions of the appellants are that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and that the evidence without conflict shows that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the injuries he sustained.

The court, it will be observed, found that, while the plaintiff, in attempting to make the street crossing, failed to exercise that degree of care which is required of a pedestrian when in the act of passing over or across streets or highways, the evidence nevertheless disclosed that Hornbeck saw the plaintiff in the act of crossing the street at a sufficient distance from the automobile he (Hornbeck) was driving in ample time to have enabled him, by the exercise of ordinary care, to avoid a collision of the machine with the plaintiff, and that it was the want of such care that was the proximate cause of the accident and its consequences; in other words the court held that the facts developed a case to which the doctrine known as the last clear chance or opportunity applied.

[1] We are satisfied, from an examination of the evidence, that the court was therefrom clearly justified or warranted in finding that Hornbeck was negligent, and that it was his negligence which was responsible for and directly caused the injuries to plaintiff. Hornbeck admitted that he saw the plaintiff in the act of crossing the street, and that, although as he approached him he slackened the speed at which he had previously been traveling, he did not stop the machine until it struck the plaintiff. And from the testimony of other witnesses who saw the accident it is clear that Hornbeck saw the plaintiff in the street in time to have stopped his machine before reaching him, and therefore knew that plaintiff was in a position of peril.

The plaintiff testified that, as he started across the street, a street car was going in the direction of where he was in the street, and that he took a position between the two car tracks and stood there until the car had passed, and that before he had time to move from that position he was hit by Hornbeck's machine. One Marshall, who witnessed the accident, testified that he observed Hornbeck as he approached the spot where the plaintiff was standing when struck, and that he was driving at approximately the rate of 20 miles an hour. He said he saw another automobile going south (Hornbeck was traveling north), and Hornbeck swerved his car to the left to avoid the other automobile, and then proceeded on at a pretty lively rate of speed until his machine struck plaintiff. Marshall, addressing Hornbeck immediately after the accident occurred said, "Young man, I drive a car myself, and you was driving entirely too fast past this corner." Hornbeck replied: "Yes; I know I was, and I tried to pass that car."

But it is not necessary to proceed further in a review herein of the testimony so far as it relates to the conduct of Hornbeck in the matter. As above declared, the findings that, notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff in not looking to see whether an automobile or other vehicle was approaching the spot where he was standing, Hornbeck saw plaintiff in a position of more or less peril in the street in ample time to have avoided the accident, if he had exercised ordinary care, and that his negligence in failing to exercise such care was the proximate cause of the injuries received by the plaintiff, are sufficiently supported. It follows that the judgment, as to Hornbeck, must be sustained.

But a more serious question, and one the decision of which has not been altogether free from difficulty, is whether Hornbeck was, at the time the injuries were received by plaintiff through the former's culpable negligence, acting within the scope of his duties as an employé of the appellant, the Union Company.

[2-4] It is, of course, an old, and indeed an elementary, doctrine:

"That, where the relation of master and servant exists, the master is responsible to third persons for the damage caused by the wrongful acts or omissions of his servants, in the course of their employment." Shearman & Redfield on the Law of Negligence (6th Ed.) § 141.

But, while the scope of the rule as thus abstractly given is clear and easily understood, it is often difficult to determine whether it does or does not have application to a certain given state of facts; that is to say, whether the evidence does or does not show that the servant, when he committed or omitted to do the thing which caused the damage, was acting in the course of his employment. And, as is said by Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts, vol. 2 (3d Ed.) p. 1030:

"The test of liability in all cases depends upon the question whether the injury was committed by the authority of the master, expressly conferred, or fairly implied from the nature of the employment and the duties incident to it; and, in determining the question of authority, we are to regard the object, purpose, and end of the employment."

Again, the learned author, at pages 1032 and 1033 of the same work, states the obvious proposition that—

"When a servant acts without any reference to the service for which he is employed, and not for the purpose of performing the work of his employer, but to effect some independent purpose of his own, the master is not responsible in that case for either act or omission of the servant."

The question here, then, is: Was Hornbeck at the time he committed the tort complained of by the plaintiff about the business of his employer; that is, was he engaged in some act or the execution of some purpose which, while not of the actual duties of his employment, was an incident to his duties as an employé of the Union Company? After a painstaking examination and analysis of the evidence, we have not been able to persuade ourselves that an affirmative answer to that question can justly be returned.

Before proceeding to a presentation and examination herein of the evidence bearing upon the proposition now in hand, we call attention to the fact that there is absolutely no evidence in the record justifying the finding that the accident and resultant damage occurred at 8:55 of the forenoon of October 6, 1917. The plaintiff testified that the accident occurred between a quarter to and 8 o'clock. The witness Marshall fixed the same hour as the time of the accident. The witness Bush, for the defendants, said he thought it occurred near or about 8 o'clock. The official report of the accident made by Hornbeck to the police department of Los Angeles states the time as 7:55, and we will assume that that hour, instead of 8:55, was approximately the time of the occurrence, and that the finding that it occurred at the time last stated was due to an inadvertence.

Recurring now to the question whether Hornbeck was about the business of the appellant the Union Company or acting within the scope of his duties under his contract of employment with said company at the time the plaintiff was injured as a result of his negligence, we here present the testimony upon a consideration of which that question must be determined. We may add that the only testimony received at the trial disclosing the nature or terms of the contract of employment between the appellant corporation and Hornbeck was that of the latter. He testified, giving his testimony in part by question and answer:

"Q. Mr. Hornbeck, you are one of the defendants in this action? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you remember the accident on October 6, 1917? A. Yes. Q. You were driving the machine at that time? A. I was. Q. Whose machine was that? A. Traung Label & Lithograph Company. Q. One of the defendants in this action? A. Yes. Q. And by whom were you employed at that time? A. Union Lithograph Company. Q. What were your duties? A. Salesman. Q. Salesman? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. How long have you used this machine? A. Since the first of the year 1917. Q. You have used it daily? A. Yes, sir; except Sundays. Q. In what line of work? A. Selling lithograph labels. * * * Q. You were in lawful possession of the car that morning? A. I was; yes. Q. And you were performing your duties at that time as an employé of the Union Lithograph Company? A. I was going to the office at that time. Q. What was your habit in getting the machine mornings? A. When I got up at the hotel I usually went down to the Tenth street garage, where I kept my car, and drove down to the cafeteria and got breakfast, and went over to my office. Q. That was a part of your duty and employment? A. No; it wasn't a part of my duty and employment, but I always used the car to do it, though."

Hornbeck further testified that his hours of work for the appellant corporation were from 8 o'clock in the morning until 5 o'clock in the evening. He also testified, in reply to questions by the attorney for the plaintiff:

"Q. What were your instructions with reference to getting that car? What were your hours of work? A. 8 o'clock in the morning until 5 at night. Q. Was it a part of your duty to get the machine from the garage and take it down to work? A. Yes; I couldn't use the car unless I got it. Q. That was a part of your employment? A. Yes. Q. That is one of your instructions? A. I never was instructed. The car was given to me to use in my selling, and I kept it in the garage, as any one would."

It was further made to appear that the appellant corporation paid the expense of keeping the automobile in the garage.

We have now presented all the testimony disclosed by the record bearing upon the terms of Hornbeck's contract of employment with the Union Company and the nature of his duties under said contract.

[5] To establish the liability of the defendant the Union Company for the consequences of Hornbeck's negligence, the burden rested upon the plaintiff to show that, when the accident the consequences of which to plaintiff are complained of here occurred, Hornbeck was about this employer's business, that is, engaged in doing some act within the sphere of his duties as a salesman for said corporation or which was an incident thereto. In our opinion, the evidence addressed to that issue, when imparting to it its full face value or credit, shows that the plaintiff failed to maintain that burden.

It is not disputed that the duties incumbent upon Hornbeck under his contract of employment were those of a salesman. It is not disputed that the hours during which he was required under his contract to discharge those duties were from 8 a. m. until 5 p. m. of each working day. It is also clear from the testimony, the finding of the court to the contrary, notwithstanding, that the injuries to the plaintiff were received prior to 8 o'clock a. m., and before the time at which Hornbeck was required to report for duty at the appellant corporation's place of business. Hornbeck testified that the act of taking the automobile to the garage in the evening after his hours of employment had expired and the act of returning it to the appellant corporation's place of business the following morning were no part of the duties of his employment. From all this testimony (all that there is in the record bearing upon that question) it is clear that, when in the act of taking the machine to the place of business of his master on the morning of the accident, he was not engaged in discharging his duties as as salesman of his employer; in other words, the evidence fails to show that the injuries complained of by the plaintiff were "committed by the authority of Hornbeck's master, expressly conferred." Cooley on Torts, supra.

The question now to be considered, then, is: May it be said that it is fairly implied from the nature of Hornbeck's employment and the duties incident to it that the injuries to plaintiff were inflicted while Hornbeck was about the business of the appellant corporation? In other words, may it be fairly implied from the nature of his employment and the duties incident to it that the purpose for which Hornbeck was using the machine at the time of the accident was within the scope of his contract of employment or any part of his duties under said contract? It seems to us that none but negative replies may, consistently with the evidence, be returned to these questions. In considering these questions, we will first direct our attention to what clearly appears to our minds from the evidence to have been the particular mission Hornbeck was on from the time he got the car out of the garage to the time of the accident, although, as will later appear, we are convinced, upon the general proposition, that the act of taking the machine from the Union Company's place of business to the garage and thence to the former place between Hornbeck's working hours as a salesman was not an act incident to his duties as a salesman within the contemplation of the contract of employment as shown by the evidence.

Hornbeck testified, it will be remembered, that it was his habit or custom, after leaving the room at the hotel at which he was residing, to go to the garage, procure the automobile, and then go to breakfast at a cafeteria, thence to his office. It will not be disputed that when going to his breakfast before the time at which he was to report for duty in the mornings he was not thus engaged in the performance of an act having any connection, either directly or indirectly, with the duties required of him under his contract of employment. Such act cannot, upon any possible course of just reasoning, be regarded as of the essence of the object, purpose, and end of his employment; and, as declared, the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that, when the accident happened, Hornbeck was then engaged in executing some act or purpose connected either directly or indirectly with the duties he was under contract to perform for his employer; and, he having testified that it was his habit each morning, before the hours of his employment began, to use the automobile for the purpose of going to a cafeteria to get his breakfast, it became incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that on the morning in question and at the time of the accident he was not going to his breakfast, or using the machine for that purpose, assuming, of course, that Hornbeck's custom of taking the machine to the garage and back to the place of business of his employer after and before his working hours each day involved acts coming (impliedly) within the scope of his duties. Now, the only testimony in the record upon that subject is that of Hornbeck himself, who testified that, when the accident occurred, he had not had breakfast. It is true that he did not say in so many words that he was then on his way to breakfast, but there is not a word of testimony in the record that he was not then on his way to his morning repast. Therefore it is clear that, when his statement that he had not had breakfast at the time of the accident is considered in connection with his uncontradicted statement that it was his habit to procure the car in the mornings, go to his breakfast in it, and then go to the office—that is, the place of business of his employer—the only fair and reasonable inference from the testimony is that when the accident occurred he was on his way to his breakfast. But, conceding that it was alone with the trial court to determine that question, the proposition remains that the custom of Hornbeck to go to his breakfast in the machine before the hour in the morning at which he was to report for duty as a salesman, for which specific services he was employed, was established by his own testimony, and that the plaintiff failed to show that he was not in the act of following that custom when the accident happened. But, as before stated, upon the general proposition we do not think the evidence fixes liability for the accident against the appellant corporation.

Counsel for respondent, as in support of their theory that the acts of Hornbeck in taking the machine after and before the commencement of his working hours to and from the garage were in the line of his employment, lay much stress upon the following testimony given by Hornbeck in reply to questions by them:

"Q. Was it a part of your duty to get the machine from the garage? A. Yes; I couldn't use the car unless I got it. Q. That was a part of your employment? A. Yes."

We perceive no special significance in the answers thus made by Hornbeck to the questions asked, so far as they may be regarded as throwing any light on the question whether the taking of the car to and from the garage was among the duties for which Hornbeck was employed by the appellant corporation. The situation, as it is clearly disclosed by the testimony of Hornbeck, was simply this: The car had been turned over to Hornbeck by his employer to be used by the former in discharging his duties as a salesman during the hours of the day that he was required under his contract to perform those duties, to wit, between the hours of 8 a. m. and 5 p. m. of each day; that between the hours of 5 p. m. of any day and 8 a. m. of the following day he was not required to perform, nor did he perform, said duties, and, while it is true that he maintained control or in a measure physical possession of the car after his day's work as a salesman was completed, there is no evidence showing or tending to show that he used the car at any time between the hours of 5 o'clock p. m. and 8 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of carrying out or executing the requirements of his contract of employment with his employer. Of course, as he said, it was his duty to return the car from the garage to the place of business of his employer or "his office," as he called it, in order that he might use it in discharging his duties as a salesman. Indeed, it was necessary for him to do so for that purpose.

[6] Thus we think it is very clear that there is no just warrant in the evidence for the finding that, when the accident occurred, Hornbeck was acting within the scope of his duties as a salesman for the appellant corporation, or that the act of returning the automobile to the place where he was to report for the discharge of the duties for which he was employed was an incident to his duties as a salesman. As counsel for the appellant corporation well say, so far as the circumstances of this case are concerned:

"If the rule be extended to hold the master liable for the negligent acts of a servant while on his way to report for duty in the morning, the master would also be liable for the negligent acts of the servant while preparing his dinner pail before leaving his home, because he is then preparing, or, in a sense, on his way, to report for duty; and also the master, under such a rule, would be liable for the negligent act of a servant from the time he arose from his bed in the morning in preparation to report for his day's duties. The statement of such a rule reduces it to an absurdity."

The case of Mauchle v. Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. and L. I. Fulcher, 37 Cal. App. 715, 174 Pac. 400, cited by appellants and elaborately considered in the briefs of counsel on both sides of this controversy, seems to us to be exactly in point here. In that case the defendant Fulcher, who was superintendent of grounds of the exposition company, having finished his day's work, started to his residence in an automobile which was the property of the exposition company and kept on the grounds of said company. He was himself driving the machine, and when he reached a certain point on one of the streets in the city of San Francisco his machine struck the plaintiff in the back, and with great violence forced the latter over a handcart which he at the time was pushing over and along the street. The plaintiff obtained a judgment for damages against both defendants. On appeal it was contended in behalf of the exposition company:

"That there was no showing that the defendant Fulcher at the time of the accident was performing any duty which he owed to the exposition company."

The appellate court of the First district reversed the case as to the exposition company upon the facts, and the facts were, as shown by the testimony of Fulcher: That the automobile used by him on the occasion of the accident was owned by the exposition company and used by him for the purposes of his employment on the grounds, that it was also his custom to use the machine as a means of conveying himself to his home after his day's work was done, and that he kept it in front of his house until about 10 o'clock, when it would be called for by his night foreman and by him taken back to the exposition grounds, where the machine was used for the purposes of the company all night. On some occasions, Fulcher said, he would himself take the machine back to the grounds. He had at his home no garage in which to keep an automobile. The court said:

"The foregoing testimony [referring to the testimony of Fulcher as synoptically stated above], being the only evidence quoted in the attempt to show responsibility on the part of the exposition company, seems to us to fall far short of so doing."

Then the court refers to and distinguishes from that case the cases of Chamberlain v. California Edison Co., 167 Cal. 500, 140 Pac. 25, and Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 18 Cal. App. 350, 123 Pac. 219; thereupon further saying:

"The evidence above quoted does not show that Fulcher was in any way serving the exposition company at the time of the accident in this case; nor does it present any evidence tending to so show."

It will be noted that in the Mauchle Case against the exposition company and Fulcher the automobile was in use either by Fulcher or his night foreman at the exposition grounds for the purposes of the exposition company at all times, day and night. In the present case the use of the automobile for the purposes of the appellant corporation was at an end after 5 o'clock in the evening of each day, and that situation as to the machine continued until the defendant Hornbeck returned it to the appellant corporation's place of business the following morning when he reported for the performance of those duties for the discharge of which he was employed. Therefore, if there be a difference between the general facts of the two cases, the facts in the case of Mauchle v. Exposition Co. and Fulcher are stronger against the exposition company than are the facts of the present case against the appellant corporation. But, be that as it may, the fact is that, with the exception that Fulcher was going home when the accident in his case occurred and that he did not himself always return the machine to the exposition grounds, there is as to the facts no line of demarcation between the two cases. They are, in other words, substantially the same. Most assuredly, it would not be contended, upon reading the opinion in the Mauchle Case, that, if the defendant Fulcher had, like Hornbeck in this case, been in the habit of leaving the car overnight in a garage near his home and returning with it to the grounds each morning as he reported for the performance of his daily duties as superintendent of the grounds, the conclusion in that case would have been different from what it was and is.

Our conclusion is, as is evident from the foregoing discussion, that the evidence in this record fails to attach liability for the injuries here complained of to the appellant corporation.

Accordingly the judgment against the defendant Hornbeck is affirmed, and the judgment against the defendant the Union Lithograph Company is reversed.

HEARTE v. GLASSELL DEVELOPMENT CO. (Civ. 3261.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 23, 1920.)

1. Contracts $\S$ 332(2)—Complaint for breach held insufficient.

Where a complaint for breach of contract contained several causes of action, a statement of one cause which was in form of common-law assumpsit, but which referred to the first cause of action in which the contract was set out, seeks recovery on the contract and is insufficient if it fails to allege performance or partial performance by plaintiff, or facts showing that performance was excused, prevented, or delayed by defendant, the breach by defendant, or the latter's corporate capacity.

2. Contracts $\S$ 337(1)—Complaint for money under contract must show money not paid.

A complaint for breach of contract to pay a specified sum of money and to convey land in payment for the balance of the work done which claimed recovery of money must allege that the money specified had not been paid.

3. Contracts $\S$ 337(1)—Complaint claiming amount to be due under contract is insufficient.

A complaint, stating a cause of action for breach of contract, which merely alleged that plaintiff claimed a certain amount to be due under the contract on information and belief, without an allegation that defendant was liable to pay that amount, is insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Oliver K. Hearte against the Glassell Development Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. E. Hannon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William P. Redmond, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff following the verdict of a jury in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Generally the facts material to the opinion are: That plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract whereby plaintiff agreed to grade certain streets in the city of Los Angeles in accordance with plans and specifications which were made a part of the contract, and defendant agreed to pay plaintiff therefor, on the 1st and 15th of each month, 80 per cent. of the engineer's estimate of the work done, the balance of 20 per cent. to be reserved until 30 days after the completion of the contract. The total contract price was not named; but, when the sum of $3,741.30 had been paid in cash, the balance was made payable in land; seven distinct lots being described for that purpose. It is claimed on behalf of plaintiff that defendant in various ways delayed plaintiff in the performance of his contract and had failed to make the progressive payments when due; but it is not alleged in any of the first eight causes of action whether the contract was wholly or partially performed, or whether the contract was breached or abandoned by reason of the acts complained of. The amended complaint contains nine separate causes of action, some sounding in tort, others in assumpsit.

The first and fifth causes of action are based upon allegations of negligence upon the part of the defendant in cutting a ditch across the streets where the work was to be performed and permitting water from an artesian well to so flow across the line of work as to add to the burden of plaintiff's contract. The second and third causes of action are based upon allegations of failure upon the part of defendant's engineer to furnish the necessary grade stakes and negligence on his part in placing grade stakes so carelessly that plaintiff was delayed and was required to regrade a portion of the work. Upon the fourth and sixth causes of action the jury found for the defendant. The seventh cause of action is based upon allegations that the sum of $263.90 was due plaintiff as a progressive payment in accordance with the terms of the contract on the 15th day of August, 1917, and that the same, after demand, remained unpaid. As to the eighth cause of action, the amended complaint, after incorporating certain preceding paragraphs of the amended complaint, alleges as follows:

"That pursuant to the said contract alleged in paragraph II of plaintiff's first cause of action, the defendant corporation withheld twenty (20%) per cent. of all money earned by virtue of the work and service rendered by the plaintiff pursuant to the contract, and that upon information and belief plaintiff claims the sum of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00) in cash or real property in the value of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00) as such twenty (20%) per cent. due the plaintiff under the terms of the said contract, to the further damage of the plaintiff in the sum of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00)."

As to the ninth cause of action, the amended complaint alleges that plaintiff was compelled to abandon the continuance of the work by reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant as theretofore alleged, and that by reason thereof he lost the sum of $1,154.50, the profits which he anticipated he would have earned upon completion of the contract. These allegations were not incorporated in any of the first eight causes of action. The jury found for the defendant upon this cause of action, and to it no consideration need be given herein.

[1, 2] Within time the defendant filed its demurrer to the amended complaint, setting up both general and special grounds; but this demurrer was overruled. Upon the opening of the trial the defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence in support of the amended complaint or in support of any of the separate causes of action therein stated on the ground that none of the alleged causes of action stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This objection, however, was overruled and the parties proceeded to trial, resulting in a verdict in favor of plaintiff as above stated on all but the fourth, sixth, and ninth causes of action.

As the soundness of this objection, in so far as it relates to the seventh and eighth causes of action, is so patent, this opinion might properly be confined to those two causes. In the seventh cause of action plaintiff seeks to recover damages under a pleading which approaches the common-law count of assumpsit. But having by reference to the first cause of action incorporated the contract in hæc verba in this cause of action, his pleading is in fact an action upon the contract for payment claimed to be due in accordance with its terms. A complaint for such purpose on a contract of this nature should allege performance or partial performance, or facts tending to show that performance was excused, prevented, or delayed by the defendant, the breach of the defendant, the corporate capacity of the defendant, and the fact that the engineer's estimate of the work done had been made as required by the contract (or legal cause for the nonproduction of such estimate). Loup v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 97, 103. Then the contract called for payments in cash up to the sum of $3,741.30 and in land thereafter. To support an action for money alone it was essential to allege that the amount claimed was due in money. None of these essential allegations appear in this cause of action.

[3] The eighth cause of action is subject to the same objections and to the further objection that it fails to allege any indebtedness or any facts supporting a claim for damages. Plaintiff alleges on information and belief that he "claims the sum of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00) in cash or real property in the value of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00) as such twenty (20 %) per cent. due the plaintiff under the terms of the said contract, to the further damage of the plaintiff in the sum of one thousand and two dollars ($1,002.00)." Here, also, it was essential to allege whether the cash payments under the contract had been made. The mere allegation that plaintiff "claims" a certain sum in cash or real property due under the contract does not state a cause of action for either money or land. If land alone is due, the remedy is by specific performance to compel a conveyance; if money alone is due, that fact must be alleged. An alternative judgment for money could be had only in the event that specific performance was impossible. On the trial it was proved without conflict that no money was due as claimed under this cause of action; but, notwithstanding this undisputed evidence, the jury awarded plaintiff a money judgment for the full sum claimed.

It is not necessary to discuss the objections which are made to the introduction of evidence in support of the various causes of action further than to say that some of them alone would require a reversal of the judgment. But it is not likely that the same errors will occur on a new trial.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

FARMER v. LEAF. (Civ. 2727.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 10, 1920.)

1. Sales $\S$ 199—When title to personalty not in existence or capable of segregation passes.

Question when title to personalty not in existence or capable of being segregated passes to buyer usually depends on intention of parties, to be determined from agreement, which controls if it contains express provisions covering matter; but, where intention cannot be ascertained from agreement, title does not pass until thing is identified, ready for delivery, and perhaps tendered, rule expressed by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1141.

2. Sales $\S$ 218½—Evidence showing segregation for buyer of trees sold.

In action on a promissory note incidental to and a part of a further agreement made respecting sale of prune trees by plaintiff to defendant, evidence held to show that trees of required number, size, and condition had been segregated and set apart for defendant when he was unable to take delivery and gave note, so that he was liable thereon though payment was contingent on delivery of trees.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 927(3)—In reviewing nonsuit truth of plaintiff's testimony is admitted.

In reviewing judgment of nonsuit, the appellate court is required to give strongest effect to testimony of plaintiff in sustaining cause of action alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by George A. H. Farmer against Erle M. Leaf. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, and F. J. Schuhl, of Porterville, for appellant.

James E. Shelton and H. G. Bockius, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff was nonsuited in this action, the trial court holding that the evidence introduced in support of the cause of action set out in the complaint was insufficient. The appeal is from the judgment which followed.

The action was upon a promissory note given incidental to and as a part of a further agreement made between the parties respecting the sale of a certain lot of prune trees. The note and agreement, signed by both parties to the action, were in the following terms:

"$510.00. Porterville, Cal., April 1, 1915.

"On or before April 1, 1916, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of George A. H. Farmer at the First National Bank of Porterville, in U. S. gold coin, the sum of five hundred ten dollars ($510), with interest thereon in like coin, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from date until paid. Interest payable semiannually. In case of collection by law, I agree to pay reasonable counsel fees. The payment of this note is contingent upon the delivery to the undersigned by said George A. H. Farmer of certain Tragedy prune trees, in accordance with the provisions of an agreement of even date herewith, executed by the undersigned and approved by said George A. H.

Farmer, to which agreement reference is hereby made for full particulars.

"[Signed] Erle M. Leaf."

"This is to certify that the undersigned, Erle M. Leaf, did on the sixth day of January, 1915, order from George A. H. Farmer of Porterville, California, three thousand (3,000) Tragedy prune trees, four to six feet in height; two thousand (2,000) of said trees at the rate of eighteen cents ($.18) per tree and one thousand (1,000) of said trees at the rate of twenty cents ($.20) per tree, making a total of five hundred sixty dollars ($560). That I have paid said George A. H. Farmer the sum of fifty dollars ($50) leaving a balance unpaid of five hundred ten dollars ($510).

"That said trees were to be delivered to me on or before April 1, 1915, at Porterville in the county of Tulare, state of California, but owing to circumstances I could not accept said trees at said time and will not be able to accept said trees until on or before April 1, 1916.

"I herewith, deliver to said George A. H. Farmer my promissory note bearing date April 1, 1915, in the sum of five hundred ten dollars ($510), with interest on same at seven per cent. per annum and the said George A. H. Farmer is to hold and keep said trees and take care of the same in a husbandrylike manner until on or before the 1st day of April, 1916, the time of delivery, with no expense to me.

"The said promissory note is to be paid as therein stated on or before April, 1916.

"It is understood and agreed, that the consideration of the execution and delivery to said George A. H. Farmer of said promissory note mentioned above is the delivery to the undersigned on or before April 1, 1916, of said three thousand (3,000) Tragedy prune trees at least ninety-two and one-half (92½) per cent. of said trees to be alive and in perfect condition and all of said trees to be guaranteed by said George A. H. Farmer to be true to name. Said trees are to be delivered on the order of the undersigned on April 1, 1916, or at any time prior thereto, at the option of the undersigned.

"Dated, Los Angeles, California, May 1, 1915."

The evidence showed that about April 1, 1915, as recited in the contract just quoted, defendant placed his order with the plaintiff for 3,000 prune trees of the kind and size specified. Plaintiff had not so many trees in stock, but immediately (about April 1, 1915) proceeded to fill the order by securing from persons in the business the trees required, placing an order for some in the state of Oregon and for some in California. As to whether he had gathered together the requisite number of trees by May 1, 1915, the date of the making of the supplemental agreement, is not clear; but it is made entirely clear by the evidence that the trees were secured and placed in two separate yards and tied in bunches ready to be delivered prior to April 1, 1916. We have said that they were placed in a condition to be delivered, although it is the contention of the respondent, with whom evidently the trial judge agreed, that the trees never were so segregated and made ready for delivery as to cause the title to pass to the vendee. Practically the only contention made here in support of the judgment of nonsuit is that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy; that the title did not pass to the vendee; and that therefore the plaintiff could not sue for the purchase price, but should have declared for damages under provisions of section 3311 of the Civil Code. It is admitted by respondent that, if title had vested in the vendee, then this action in the form as determined by the complaint was properly brought. We will make particular reference, therefore, first to the evidence showing the manner in which the trees plaintiff had secured for the purpose of filling the order of the defendant were handled. Plaintiff testified that he had collected in the manner hereinbefore indicated about 4,000 prune trees in his yards for the purpose of securing for defendant the 3,000 of the proper height and the requisite percentage of live trees; that the entire lot of trees was procured for the purpose of filling this order only. He testified on the subject, in part, as follows:

"A. I mean that the trees that I had set aside of the 3,300 to 3,800 were for Mr. Leaf and no one else. The Court: Then in addition to that you added about 200? A. Another 200 trees. Q. Making between 3,500 and 4,000? A. Possibly. Q. So that you were going to select and deliver to him 3,000 out of the 3,500 to 4,000 that you could make selection from? A. Yes, sir. If I might explain, the trees were bunched together in lots of 25, and I guarantee 92½ per cent. of these to be alive; without taking them out of the ground I couldn't tell exactly how many were dead in each bunch, so I estimated and thought possibly, to be safe, I had bought another 200 trees. I guaranteed the 92½ per cent. to be alive at that time."

He further testified that the total number of prune trees out of which the order of Leaf was to be filled were kept separate from other stock; that he had no other prune trees in stock; that he continued to keep the entire lot of trees separate, ready for delivery; and that they were in his yards in such condition, properly cared for, on the 1st day of April, 1916, and for six months thereafter. However, in February of 1916, defendant having sold the land upon which he had intended to plant the trees, wrote to the plaintiff a letter containing the following phrase:

"It is my desire to dispose of the trees without incurring any loss, and I shall expect to do this. If you are able to sell them for money on this basis, I will be glad to have you do so."

On March 7th of the same year, defendant wrote the plaintiff again, stating:

"In regard to the Tragedy prune trees, I beg to again advise you that I wish to secure such a price for them as will net a sufficient amount to cover the cost to me. You are hereby authorized to sell any of this lot of trees on the above terms. * * * I have sold all the land which I owned in Tulare county on which I originally intended to plant the trees, and accordingly, as you see, have no possible use for them."

Having thus been apprised of the position of the defendant, the plaintiff on March 15, 1916, wrote to the defendant as follows:

"You are hereby notified that I hold, subject to your order and in accordance with the terms of our agreement dated the first day of May, 1915, three thousand Tragedy prune trees; that of said three thousand Tragedy prune trees so wanted by you, over ninety-two and one-half per cent. are alive and in perfect condition, and furthermore, that I hereby guarantee the said trees to be in perfect condition and true to name. That said above-described trees are now ready for delivery to you and subject to your order of disposition. The trees are in my care, and I shall be pleased to hear from you and learn your wishes."

A letter from the defendant, under date of March 17, 1916, followed. This letter was as follows:

"In connection with the Tragedy prune trees, I beg to again suggest that, looking at the matter purely from your standpoint, that it will be to your interest to make an effort to dispose of these trees. Owing to the hard times which have prevailed during the last two years, I was compelled to dispose of the land at a considerable sacrifice, and consequently will be compelled to ask for a considerable extension of time on my obligation to you in case the trees are not disposed of. I trust that you will still be able to dispose of the trees to our mutual advantage."

Plaintiff continued to hold the trees and cared for them for six months subsequent to April 1, 1916. Defendant gave no further direction regarding the trees, and they subsequently died in the hands of the plaintiff.

[1-3] The question as to when title to personal property not in existence or capable of being segregated at the time of the making of the contract of purchase passes to the vendee depends many times upon the intention of the parties to be determined from their agreement. If the agreement of purchase expressly contains provisions covering the matter, the agreement, of course, controls, and title may pass to a thing not prepared by the vendor in condition for delivery, perhaps only partially manufactured by him. On the other hand, where the intention of the parties regarding the matter cannot be ascertained from the agreement, the courts have enforced the general rule that title will not pass to the vendee until the thing is identified and ready for delivery and perhaps tendered. Benjamin on Sales, (7th Ed.) § 308 et seq. Section 1141 of the Civil Code expresses the general rule on this subject:

"Title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale or exchange of personal property only when the buyer has accepted the thing, or when the seller has completed it, prepared it for delivery, and offered it to the buyer, with intent to transfer the title thereto, in the manner prescribed by the chapter upon offer of performance."

We think here that the evidence showed that prune trees of the required number, size, and condition had been segregated and set apart for the defendant; that the mere fact that there was an excess of other trees of the same kind, but of insufficient size, or perhaps lacking in vitality, accompanying the lot, did not establish a condition showing such lack of segregation as would reserve in the plaintiff the title to the property. Further than that we think that the terms of the supplemental agreement accompanying the promissory note were evidence of the intent of the parties to acknowledge a completed sale, and especially is this intent emphasized by the letters written by defendant to the plaintiff wherein he requested the plaintiff to sell the property for his benefit. In reviewing the judgment of nonsuit, we are required to give the strongest effect to the testimony of the plaintiff in sustaining the cause of action alleged. There is nothing in that evidence to show that the plaintiff failed to perform all of his obligations, and the evidence does show that the defendant refused to accept the trees according to the agreement made by him. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff was entitled to maintain the action.

The judgment is reversed.

KELLY v. GREAT WESTERN ACC. INS. CO. (Civ. 3279.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 31, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1920.)

1. Insurance — 151(1)—Note and policy constituted single accident contract.

A parenthetical clause printed under assured's signature to a note, "This obligation is not a part of the policy of insurance, but is a separate contract," etc., may be disregarded; the note and policy each referring to the other, concerning the same subject-matter, constituting but a single contract under Civ. Code, § 1642, and such parenthetical clause contradicting the express terms of the note as signed.

2. Insurance — 146(1)—Contract to be construed in the sense in which insurer believed assured understood it.

If there is a doubt as to the meaning of a contract of insurance, it is to be construed in the sense in which the insurer believed, at the time of making it, that the assured understood it, under Civ. Code, § 1649.

3. Insurance — 146(3) — Uncertainty to be construed against insurer.

If a contract of insurance prepared by insurer has any uncertainty, it must be construed against the insurer, under Civ. Code, § 1654.

4. Insurance — 146(1)—Inconsistent words to be rejected and repugnancies reconciled.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1652, 1653, inconsistent words in an insurance contract are to be rejected, and repugnancies must be reconciled by such an interpretation as will give some effect to the repugnant clauses subordinate to the general intent and purpose of the whole contract.

5. Damages — 78(5)—Nonforfeiting provision in accident policy a penalty.

A nonforfeiting provision in a contract of accident insurance under which assured signed a note for five annual premiums, but when installments were overdue could not recover for certain accidents then incurred, held to provide a penalty in contravention of the provisions of the Code relating to liquidated damages.

6. Insurance — 392(10)—Forfeiture of accident policy for nonpayment of premium waived by attempt to collect note.

Insurer under a contract of accident insurance, where assured gave a note for five annual premiums, waived any rights under a forfeiture clause providing that certain accidents would not be compensated when occurring after maturity of an installment for annual premium, where it sent letters to assured indicating an intention to collect the full amount of the installment due for which the assured was entitled to insurance for the year.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Mabel Hillman Kelly against the Great Western Accident Insurance Company.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Brennan, of Los Angeles, and Carr, Carr & Evans, of Des Moines, Iowa, for appellant.

James S. Bennett and Rives & Rives, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITTAİN, J. The insurance company appeals from a judgment for $7,440, with interest, amounting in all to $8,020, against it under an accident insurance policy providing for death benefits in favor of the widow of Luke Kelly, the assured. The form of the policy is unusual. It is described as a "five-year term" policy. It was accompanied by a collateral agreement, in effect a nonnegotiable note, by which the assured obligated himself to pay a premium of $300 for five years' insurance, in five annual installments of $60 each, the first installment being payable at the time of the application for the insurance, and each of the other installments annually in advance of the last four successive years of the term. It provided for interest on past-due installments at the rate of six per cent. per annum and for a reasonable attorney fee in the event of suit. The first installment of $60 was paid, and the second installment became due October 4, 1916. The assured died December 17, 1916, as a result of accidental injuries within the meaning of the policy. At that time the second installment of the note had not been paid. The insurance was for $7,500, and the judgment was on a complaint in which the prayer was for $7,440, that being the amount of the insurance less the $60 unpaid under the note.

The insurance company maintains that, under the terms of the policy, the insurance in favor of the widow of the assured on his death had lapsed by default in the payment of the second installment of the premium, and that there was no waiver of the provisions of the policy for forfeiture. The respondent contends that the policy is not a unilateral contract, but a promise of the company to pay the insurance in consideration of a promise on the part of the assured to pay the five years' premium; that the law does not permit the insurer to declare a forfeiture as against the assured while retaining and asserting the right to collect the premium under the note; that the right to rely upon the forfeiture provisions, if it ever existed, was waived by the insurer; and that the provisions for forfeiture are void under section 1670 of the Civil Code, in that the forfeiture clause of the contract is one by which compensation to be paid for a breach of the obligation to pay the second installment promptly was determined in advance of the breach. It appears, at least from the briefs, that the normal rate of such insurance for a one-year term is $72, which amount includes, of course, the cost of insurance, plus the overhead and agency expense in handling such insurance for one-year periods. The contract fixes the rate for one year at $60 in consideration of the assured guaranteeing the payment of the full premium for five years; in other words, it appears that, where the company is compelled to renew its business only once in five years, the overhead cost is reduced at the rate of at least $12 a year, that being the amount of the saving to the assured.

The policy is a lengthy one, with a large number of provisions couched in technical language, with frequent cross-references from one set of conditions to others in such a manner that any man of ordinary education and intelligence after reading it might well remain in doubt as to exactly what the company promised to do. On the other hand, the policy and the collateral agreement are both very clear in regard to what the assured was to do. He was required to tell the truth in the statements contained in his application, to pay $60 in advance at the time of his application and to pay $300 in all in the $60 installments, with interest at 6 per cent. if they were not paid when due, and to pay reasonable attorneys' fees if the money was collected by suit. Despite the fact that the assured was obliged to pay the premium of $300 for the five years' insurance, the insuring clause purports to insure him for a period of one year. In section II of the policy, there is a statement of specific benefits in clear language by which the company undertook to pay within ninety days from the date of accident $7,500 in the event of the death of the assured by accident. In section III there is a long and involved statement headed "Benefits for Loss of Time," purporting to cover "Weekly Accident Payments," "Weekly Sick Benefits," "Continuous Sickness," "Extra Hospital Benefit," and sickness resulting from a large number of specific causes. In section IV there is a tabulated list of optional benefits for specific injuries which the assured might claim in lieu of other benefits, ranging from $300 for fracture of the skull, to $30 for the dislocation of the great toe. There is a provision for double benefits for injuries while the assured was a passenger on a railway or street railway passenger car or of a steam vessel. There are additional benefits for surgical operations, with a lengthy schedule defining specific operations. Then follows a series of special provisions under what is designated section VII of the contract. Subdivision 1, relating to accidents common to all men, refers specially to disability caused by assaults of burglars, highway robbers, and other unprovoked assaults; subdivision 2 relates to payment for quarantine; subdivision 3, for surgeons' fees paid; subdivision 4, for identification benefits to which reference will later be made; subdivision 5, for limited liability in case the assured changed his occupation; subdivision 6, limited liability for injuries occurring through drunkenness, chronic diseases, etc.; subdivision 7 provides for prorating with the insurer other concurrent insurance; subdivision 8 provides for notice and proofs of loss; subdivision 9, for arbitration of claims denied by the insurance company; and subdivision 10 is headed in capital letters "Nonforfeiting Provision." Further reference will also be made to this provision. Under the next clause, headed "General Agreements," there are numerous subdivisions relating to cancellation, premium payments, maturity of indemnities, change of beneficiary, age limits, modification to comply with state laws, the right of examination of the assured by the representatives of the company, providing against duplication of benefits, and requiring strict compliance with the conditions of the policy.

Subdivision 10 of section VII, being the so-called "Nonforfeiting Provision," is as follows:

"10. Nonforfeiting Provision.—In case the assured has entered into a written obligation to guarantee the payment of the premium named in the insuring clause hereof for a term of five years (unless this policy shall have been previously canceled), the company will be liable during a period of thirty months after suspension hereof for nonpayment of any of the installments named in said obligation to the assured or his beneficiary, for the benefits specified in paragraph 4 of section VII hereof, and to the extent of one-half of the several benefits for accidental injury as provided in section II, III, and IV hereof, if such accidental injury is received while the assured is (1) a passenger within any railway or street railway passenger car, or (2) while a passenger on board a steam vessel licensed for the regular transportation of passengers and such injury is due to the wrecking of such car or vessel."

Paragraph 4 of section VII, thus referred to, is the one in regard to identification benefits, which reads as follows:

"4. Identification Benefits.—In all cases where the assured enters into a written obligation to keep his policy in force for a term of five years, if during said term he shall become unconscious on account of injury or illness while absent from home or acquaintances and while carrying upon his person the means of identification furnished by the company, the company will, when immediately notified by telegram or other message giving this policy number, pay such additional benefit in a sum not to exceed one thousand dollars ($1,000) as may be necessary temporarily to care for the person or body of the assured during the period of such unconsciousness or until such time as his beneficiary or other friends can be notified of his condition."

[1] The application, which is headed "Five-Year Term Plan," was made a part of the contract of insurance. So much of it as is necessary for the present purpose is as follows:

"I hereby apply for insurance * * * for a term of five years. * * * I also understand and agree that the contract between me and the company is entirely in writing; that it is limited to this application, the obligation which I have this day executed for the payment of the premiums for this insurance and the policy of insurance (including any riders that may be attached thereto), except as it may be affected by the table of rates or classification of risks filed by the company with the insurance department. * * * I also agree that there shall be retained from any indemnity which may become due the unpaid balance of any premium then due, or of any current premium covered by written note or order."

The substance of the collateral note has already been stated. Under the signature is printed in parenthesis the following:

"This obligation is not a part of the policy of insurance, but is a separate contract between the assured and the company given for the purpose of securing a lowered rate of premium and other special benefits named in the policy."

This parenthetical clause may be disregarded. The note and the policy, each referring to the other, concerning the same subject-matter, constitute but a single contract. Civ. Code, § 1642. The parenthetical clause contradicts the express terms of the note as signed.

[2-4] If there is a doubt as to the meaning of the contract, one of the rules of interpretation requires it to be construed in the sense in which the insurer believed, at the time of making it, that the assured understood it. Civ. Code, § 1649. In view of the fact that the application was for insurance for a five-year term, and that the collateral note obligated the assured to pay the premium of $300 for a five-year term, it cannot be contended that the company did not believe the assured understood its promise to be for the insurance for which he applied and for which he was bound to pay, notwithstanding the fact that the insuring clause purports to limit the insurance to a period of one year. The contract was prepared by the insurer. If, under other rules, any uncertainty in the contract was not removed, it must be construed against the insurer. Civ. Code, § 1654. Inconsistent words are to be rejected (Civ. Code, § 1653), and repugnancies must be reconciled by such an interpretation as will give some effect to the repugnant clauses subordinate to the general intent and purpose of the whole contract (Civ. Code, § 1652).

Considered as an entirety, by the acceptance of the application of the assured the insurer undertook, subject to lawful conditions of the policy, to give five years' insurance in consideration of the payment of $300, of which $60 was paid at the time of the application, and for the remaining $240, payable in annual installments of $60 each, the company took the note of the assured.

[5] One of the conditions of the contract was that, if any installment of the note should not be paid promptly when due, except as to very limited liability for very remote risks, the insurer provided for its release from liability during the period between the maturity of the installment and its subsequent payment, which the insurer retained the right to enforce. This forfeiture clause was contained in that provision of the policy headed "Nonforfeiting Provision." Under the rules to which reference has been made, if the contract was ambiguous in this respect, it must be construed most strongly in favor of the assured and his beneficiary. The respondent maintains that this forfeiture clause, designated by the insurance company as a nonforfeiting provision, was, in fact, a penalty in contravention of the provisions of the Code relating to liquidated damages in fixing compensation to be made for the breach of an obligation to pay a sum on a certain day, while the insurance company retained the right to collect the sum at a later date with interest and attorney's fees. Under the terms of the contract a $60 payment furnished compensation for complete insurance for one year of the five-year term, and, further, under the terms of the contract, if the assured had lived, and if he had waited until the last day of the second year for the payment of the $60 with interest, as he had a right to do under the contract, he would have been charged the full amount of $60 for one day's complete insurance, instead of one year's complete insurance. The reservation of the so-called nonforfeiting and trivial provisions did not militate against a claimed forfeiture of the principal object of the contract. The word "forfeiture" is equivalent to the word "penalty." Van Buren v. Digges, 1 How. 461, 13 L. Ed. 771; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 443, 11 Am. Dec. 223; Salters v. Ralph, 15 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 273; Muldoon v. Lynch, 66 Cal. 536, 6 Pac. 417; Nakagawa v. Okamoto, 164 Cal. 718, 130 Pac. 707.

[6] After the second installment became due the insurance company in several letters requested payment of the past-due installment. In each of them the insurer relied upon the five-year contract. On November 4, 1916, it wrote:

"Since you are under obligation to make these payments continuously during the time covered by your five-year contract, it is in every way to your advantage to make payment promptly and thus secure the full benefits of your insurance."

On November 22, 1916, it wrote:

"The check you intended to send us for the payment due October 4, 1916, on your five-year contract has not arrived, no doubt forgotten. Why not send it now while you are thinking about it?"

On December 14, 1916, the company wrote:

"If it is necessary for us to spend an amount equal to the premium in time and expense collecting this bill, it is unprofitable for us, and if there is an additional expense added on to you, it will really be making a hardship upon you. Therefore we will ask you to send us to-day your check, draft or money order for $60.00."

The trial court determined that these letters indicated an intention on the part of the insurance company to collect the full amount of the second installment of the premium for which the assured was entitled to the insurance for the second period of the five-year term. This determination on the part of the trial court seems to be entirely justified by the decision of the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District in the recent case of Faris v. American National Assurance Co., 185 Pac. 1035, and the cases therein cited, particular reference being made to the cases of Noem v. Equitable Life Ins. Co., 37 S. D. 176, 157 N. W. 308, and Murray v. Home Benefit Life Assurance Co., 90 Cal. 402, 27 Pac. 309, 25 Am. St. Rep. 133.

The appellant relies chiefly on the case of Cayford v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 144 Cal. 763, 18 Pac. 258, and similar cases, in which the particular policy under consideration provided clearly for forfeiture for non-payment of premiums in advance. Those cases appear to have been determined in view of the fact that the insurance which had been paid for had been furnished. In this case the insurer was relying upon its right to collect the note given for the entire five years' premium. It could not take advantage of the contract for payment made for its benefit and relieve itself of the obligation to furnish the insurance for which that benefit, when collected, ought to have paid. Such a construction of its contract would leave the insurer in a position where it might enforce payment of the note, with interest and authority's fees, if no loss was suffered by the assured, and to deny all liability for loss if it was suffered.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEO G. McLAUGHLIN CO. v. PHILLIPS et al. (Civ. 2737.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §757(3)—Without definite specifications court may refuse to review evidence.

Where appellants asserted the findings were not supported by the evidence, but there were no definite specifications either in the record presented by means of the reporter's typewritten transcript or the briefs showing the particulars wherein the evidence was claimed to be insufficient, the appellate court might be well justified in declining to frame for appellant definite specifications of insufficiency of evidence which should have been submitted.

2. Evidence §431—Parol evidence admissible to show want of effective delivery of writing.

Where defendants signed a written agreement for exchange of property, which incidentally provided for payment of $1,000 commission to plaintiff, parol evidence is admissible to show that one of the defendants at that time stated that the whole transaction was contingent upon the willingness of his sister, who owned an interest in the property, to trade, and this is so despite the parol evidence rule, for it goes to the extent of showing that there was no effective delivery of the agreement.

3. Deeds §194(2) — Deed deposited with grantee for particular purpose not deemed delivered.

While possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence that it was delivered, yet such possession is not conclusive, and it may be shown by parol that a deed was not delivered, but was deposited by the grantee for another purpose, in which case it is not effective.

4. Brokers §86(1)—Evidence held to show that agreement for exchange of property was not delivered.

In an action by brokers for commission for effecting exchange of property, evidence held to warrant finding that the writing containing an alleged agreement for exchange and promise to pay commission was not delivered.

5. Brokers §57(2)—Brokers not entitled to commission on exchange effected by principal on different terms.

Where an exchange of property which brokers sought to bring about was not consummated, and it was not established that at the time the corporation which the brokers had interested, and later effected an exchange with defendants had authorized its president to agree to the then proposed exchange, the brokers are not, where exchange later made was on entirely different terms, entitled to the commission reserved.

6. Corporations §404(2) — President not ex officio authorized to make binding agreement for exchange of lands.

The president of a corporation is not, by virtue of his office, authorized to bind the corporation to an agreement for exchange of lands.

Action by the Leo G. McLaughlin Company against A. L. Phillips and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover on a contract to pay a commission of $1,000 for services rendered in procuring an exchange of real property of defendants for other real property. Judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Appellant contends that the findings "are not supported or justified by the evidence." The record being presented by means of a reporter's typewritten transcript, and there being no definite specifications therein nor in the briefs, showing the particulars wherein the evidence is claimed to be insufficient, the court might be well justified in declining to frame for appellant the definite specifications of insufficiency of the evidence which should have been presented. However, to the extent that we are able to do so, we have endeavored to ascertain the merits of the case.

[2-4] The last paragraph of finding 2 reads as follows:

"That it is not true that on or about June 1, 1917, or at any other time, said defendants promised and agreed in writing to pay to plaintiff the sum of $1,000, or any other sum, as commission for its services, providing the plaintiff could find and produce the owner of certain other property secondly described in said agreement made a part of plaintiff's complaint as Exhibit A, ready, willing, and able to exchange the property last described in said agreement for the property first described in said agreement, but it is true that defendants signed and delivered to plaintiff the agreement, a copy of which is attached to plaintiff's complaint and marked Exhibit A, but with the express statement and understanding that said agreement in its operation and effect was conditional and contingent upon the sister of the defendant Pierce consenting to the exchange of said property in which she had an interest."

The evidence, without contradiction, proves that Mrs. Smith, a sister of defendant Pierce, was the owner of a one-fourth interest in one of the parcels of land first described in Exhibit A. Defendant Pierce testified that when he signed the document, Exhibit A, he stated to plaintiff's representative that his sister owned the interest above mentioned. "I told him that it would not go without she—that is that I would reserve the right to have her consent to the signing of this instrument." On account of some informalities in Exhibit A a correctional document was signed; and that also proving to be incorrect, a third instrument was prepared and signed, wherein, for the first time, the L. C. Reed Company, a corporation, the true owner of the property for which defendants were to trade, was named. Defendant Phillips testified that at the time of signing the last-named document by the defendants, defendant Pierce stated to Mr. Turner, who represented plaintiff in the matter, "Now I am signing this with the understanding I will go right down and see my sister, to see if she is willing to let this property go through; if she is not, we can't trade." Pierce confirmed this testimony. It further appears that the proposed exchange of properties as then contemplated failed to proceed further at that time by reason of the nonconsent of Mrs. Smith. Some months later an exchange was made between the defendants and the L. C. Reed Company of a part of the property of defendants omitting that in which Mrs. Smith was interested for a part of the property of the L. C. Reed Company. The exchange as finally made not only included less property on both sides but was made upon different terms with reference to incumbrances on the respective properties exchanged.

Appellant contends that the court erred in receiving the testimony above mentioned, and insists that in so doing the court violated the rule that oral evidence may not be received to alter the terms of a valid written instrument. The argument is that the document, Exhibit A, which is the instrument relied upon in the complaint, and the two subsequent documents referred to in the evidence, asserted that defendants were the owners of the property, and that the court could not properly receive evidence to contradict such recital. Exhibit A did not in terms assert ownership, but did contain an offer to exchange the property therein described. The subsequent documents did refer to the defendants as the owners of the property described. Nevertheless, we are of the opinion that the evidence was receivable for the purpose of determining whether or not the documents, when signed and left in the possession of the plaintiff, were in legal effect delivered. "While it is true that the possession of a deed by the grantee is prima facie evidence that such deed was delivered by the grantor with intent that it should take effect according to its terms yet such possession is not conclusive evidence of a valid delivery; and 'it may be shown by parol evidence that a deed in the possession of the grantee was not delivered.' Devlin on Deeds, §§ 294, 295, and authorities there cited. 'And even if the deed is deposited with the grantee but for a purpose other than delivery it would not take effect as a deed; nor can a title be derived from a deed which has not been delivered. While therefore it is not competent to control a deed by parol evidence where it has taken effect by delivery it is always competent by such evidence to show that the deed, though in the grantee's hands, has never been delivered.' Washburn on Real Property, 311." Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 Pac. 939. The evidence tended to show, and therefore was sufficient to authorize the court to find, that the writings in question, which incidentally contained a promise to pay the sum of $1,000 commission, were not effectively delivered. In finding 3 it is stated:

"That it is not true that plaintiff found and produced and introduced, or found or produced or introduced, to the defendants, the owners of the property secondly described in said agreement made Exhibit A to plaintiff's complaint, and that said owners were ready, willing, and able, or ready, willing, or able to exchange their said property for defendants' said property. It is not true that subsequent to said introduction the defendants did effect an exchange of all or part of their property for a consideration satisfactory to said defendants, with the parties to whom plaintiff introduced them and brought them into relationship, and that said exchange was brought about and occasioned solely by and on account of plaintiff's efforts."

[5, 6] Concerning the first sentence above quoted from finding 3, the controversy is concluded by the conclusion hereinbefore announced. We may say, however, that the record fails to show that the L. C. Reed Company, acting by any competent authority thereof, was ready or willing to make the exchange as originally contemplated in the writings signed by the defendants. It does appear that L. C. Reed, the president of that corporation, took part in the negotiations, and was willing to proceed with the transaction; but there is no evidence that the corporation had authorized him to bind it in such transaction. He did not have such authority merely as president of the corporation. It does appear that negotiations were later resumed, and that the defendants conveyed to the L. C. Reed Company a part of the property referred to in Exhibit A, and received from that company in exchange therefor 60 acres less than the 182.36 acres originally suggested as the property to be conveyed by that company to the defendants. Not only did the defendants receive so much less land, but they took it subject to a larger incumbrance than that specified in Exhibit A. It is not to be presumed, nor is the evidence sufficient to raise the inference, that the defendants, under the writings to which we have referred, obligated themselves to pay the plaintiff the full sum of $1,000 on a later and substantially different transaction consummated by the parties themselves. This action is not upon a quantum meruit for services rendered by an authorized agent; nor is there any evidence of the value of the services rendered by the plaintiff, if any there were, having relation to such subsequent transaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 3008.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 18, 1920.
On Rehearing, July 30, 1920.)

1. Fraud ☞11(1)—Representations as to condition of company matters of opinion.

Representations of defendant that company in which he and others desired plaintiff to invest was a large, prosperous, and rapidly growing concern, that additional capital was necessary, that plaintiff's investment would be used to strengthen business and establish branch offices and agencies, and that corporation would employ him as a salesman at $100 a month salary, held in legal contemplation mere expressions of opinion, so that defendant, under Civ. Code, § 1572, was not liable unless he did not honestly hold such opinions, or was not justified by his information, or deliberately made representations to deceive.

2. Fraud ☞12—Misrepresentations must be of facts and not conjectures.

As a general rule, representations on which fraud may be predicated must be of existing facts, or facts which previously existed, and cannot consist of mere expressions or conjectures as to future acts or events, though subsequently unfulfilled.

3. Fraud ☞12 — Making of promise without intention not to perform not fraud.

Under Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4, where a promise was not made without intention of performing it, its making did not constitute fraud.

4. Fraud ☞25—Damage essential.

Fraud without damage calls for no redress from any court, however censurable in morals.

5. Fraud ☞12—Promise to employ "permanently" fulfilled by employment until dissolution of company.

Plaintiff, induced by defendants to invest in their company on promise he would be employed permanently as a salesman, was employed "permanently" where he continued in the employment of the company until it was dissolved.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Permanently.]

6. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, finding of trial court cannot be legally interfered with by appellate court.

7. Fraud ☞58(2)—Evidence held not to show fraud in inducing plaintiff to invest.

In action for defendants' fraud inducing plaintiff to invest in their company, evidence held insufficient to support findings of fraud by defendants, showing rather that their representations were matters of opinion, and, furthermore, were true, and that the business was unfortunate owing only to market conditions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by George H. Beeman against J. C. Richardson and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Oliver O. Clark and George M. Pierson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Parker & Moote and Moote & Patterson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action brought to recover $5,500, and interest thereon, claimed to have been paid by plaintiff for 50 shares of stock in a corporation known as Richardson, Holmes & Lamb Company, and for general relief.

It is alleged that defendants were, and at all times herein mentioned have been, directors of the said corporation; that they "entered into a conspiracy to cheat and defraud plaintiff" out of said sum of money by knowingly making certain fraudulent representations which were relied upon by plaintiff, to wit, that said corporation "was a large, prosperous and rapidly growing concern, having assets in excess of $40,000 over and above all liabilities; that the business of said corporation was growing so rapidly that additional capital was necessary, and that if plaintiff would invest $5,000 or thereabouts, in the business of said corporation, the amount so invested would be used for the purpose of strengthening the business of said corporation and establishing branch offices and agencies thereof"; and, further, that if he, plaintiff, made such investment, the corporation would employ him as salesman at a salary of $100 per month. The complaint then sets forth that all said representations, so alleged to have been made, were false and untrue, etc.; that said corporation "was not a prosperous and rapidly growing concern, but that its affairs were in a shaky and precarious condition," and that it did not possess net assets of said value, but was, in fact, at the time such representations were made, and ever since has been, insolvent; that said shares of stock were of no value whatever, although represented to have been of the value of $110 per share; and that all such statements were known by said defendants to be false and untrue at the time they were so made. It is further alleged that the money paid by plaintiff, as aforesaid, was not used for the strengthening of the corporation, but that the greater portion thereof was withdrawn from the corporation by defendants and used for the purpose of paying their own personal debts; that no branch offices or agencies were established by said corporation after plaintiff made the investment in question; and that the position of salesman was not a permanent position, "but was offered merely as an inducement to plaintiff to purchase said stock." Following these allegations is an elaborate statement as to how the money so paid was disposed of by defendants, and their subsequent acts in carrying out the alleged nefarious deal. The answer denies all the material allegations of the complaint. Upon the issues thus presented the case was tried without a jury, at the conclusion of which the court found against the defendant Boqua in the sum of $700, and against each of the other three defendants in the sum of $5,500, with interest. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal is taken.

The record is voluminous. No brief, except appellants' opening brief, has been filed. The ground upon which the appeal is taken is insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

It must be observed that plaintiff is not seeking in this action a rescission of the contract, but, rather, to recover the damage which he claims to have sustained by reason of the alleged false representations, having, by so doing, elected to affirm the contract. We have read the entire record, and it contains no evidence that any one, other than defendant Richardson, ever made any of the alleged representations to plaintiff. There is no evidence that any of the other defendants ever knew of the representations alleged to have been made by Richardson; nor is there anything, in our judgment, from which knowledge of the alleged representations by defendants, other than Richardson, may be inferred. Indeed, we might disregard all the testimony offered in behalf of defendants on this point and accept the testimony offered by plaintiff as wholly correct, and still our conclusion would have to be the same. The same statement is true as to the alleged conspiracy. Webster defines a conspiracy as follows:

"A combination of men for an evil purpose; * * * an agreement for the purpose of wrongfully prejudicing another; * * * a concurrence or general tendency, as of causes or circumstances, to one event."

Certainly no argument need be advanced to prove that the actions of one man, however reprehensible they may be, can bring him within the scope of this definition. "An actionable conspiracy exists only where there is an unwarrantable combination of two or more persons to do an unlawful thing." Menner v. Slater, 148 Cal. 284, 83 Pac. 35; Schwenn v. Schwenn, 166 Wis. 420, 166 N. W. 171, 2 A. L. R. 287, and cases there cited.

[1] In the case at bar the evidence shows that defendant Richardson did represent to plaintiff that said corporation "was a large, prosperous, and rapidly growing concern, having assets in excess of $40,000 over and above all liabilities; that additional capital was necessary"; that if plaintiff would so invest that such investment would be used to strengthen the business of the corporation and to establish branch offices and agencies; and that the corporation would also employ plaintiff as salesman at a salary of $100 per month, which position was to be permanent. In support of the foregoing representations the evidence further shows: (1) That the corporation was a large concern, transacting a total business during 1913 amounting to $915,074.69; (2) that it was rapidly growing during all the years from its organization, in 1905, to and including 1913, its total business transactions during the first-mentioned year having been in the sum of $184,417.44; (3) and that, by the statements received in evidence, as well as the testimony of the defendant Richardson, it was prosperous. All the foregoing representations were, in legal contemplation, but expressions of opinions. There is no evidence in this case, however, showing that such opinions were not honestly held by Richardson, or that he was not justified by the information which he had in making them. Nor is there evidence to show that they were deliberately made for the purpose of deceiving plaintiff. These are essential, if Richardson is to be held liable. Civ. Code, § 1572; Estate of Johnson, 134 Cal. 662, 66 Pac. 847; Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 129 Pac. 804.

[2, 3] As to the representations that the corporation had assets in excess of $40,000 over and above all liabilities, the record shows, by the statements offered and received in evidence—in view of the fact that there is no impeachment or contradiction of such showing—the same to be true. This may also be said as to the representation “that additional capital was necessary.” As to the representation that “if plaintiff would invest $5,000, or thereabouts,” the money would be used for the purpose of strengthening the business of the corporation and for the establishment of branch offices and agencies thereof, we are confronted at the outset with two propositions: (1) That at most it was a promise made to do something in the future; and (2) the record fails to disclose that plaintiff was damaged in any sum, or at all, by defendants’ failure to comply therewith. “As a general rule, false representations upon which fraud may be predicated must be of existing facts, or facts which previously existed, and cannot consist of mere promises or conjectures as to future acts or events, although such promises may be subsequently broken.” 20 Cyc. 20; Ayers v. Sou. Pac. Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 74, 159 Pac. 144, L. R. A. 1917F, 949. It is not alleged, nor is there any evidence in this record indicating, that such promise was made without any intention of performing it. In such case “the making of a promise does not constitute fraud. * * *” Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4; Ayers v. Sou. Pac. Ry. Co., supra. “The mere failure to perform the covenant does not relate back to and render the same fraudulent.” Lawrence

v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 Pac. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29.

[4] As to the second proposition presented above, we think it must now be apparent that no such action can find support here. “Fraud without damage calls for no redress from any court. However in morals such conduct may be censurable, it is not regarded by the law as of sufficient consequence to put in operation the machinery of courts.” Reay v. Butler, 69 Cal. 572, 11 Pac. 463; London, etc., Co. v. Liebes, 105 Cal. 203, 38 Pac. 691; Stouffer v. Eymann, 183 Pac. 210.

[5] As to the representation that the corporation would employ plaintiff permanently, little time or space, we think, need be devoted to the consideration thereof. The fact is that the evidence shows, without conflict, that plaintiff was employed, and that he continued in the employment of the corporation, until the latter died. Such was a permanent employment, so far as it was legally and physically possible. It certainly cannot successfully be maintained that an agreement to employ one “permanently” is intended to extend the time beyond the grave.

In this case a series of unfortunate circumstances, apparently such as could not, with ordinary prudence and foresight, be guarded against—unusual market conditions, etc.—affected in a very material way the business of the corporation involved, resulting very disastrously for all the defendants, each of whom lost everything invested therein. The defendants, Richardson and Lamb, it appears, had each invested $25,000, the defendant Holmes had in the venture $26,400, while the investment of the defendant Boqua therein amounted to $30,000. Under these circumstances, and in view of the state of the record before us, we think that the rule and guide repeatedly prescribed for trial courts in this state in actions such as this must govern here:

“If there be two inferences equally reasonable and equally susceptible of being drawn from the proved facts, the one favoring fair dealing and the other favoring corrupt practice, it is the express duty of court or jury to draw the inference favorable to fair dealing.” Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 Pac. 753.

[6, 7] We are not unmindful of the fact that there was conflict in some of the evidence, and that the finding of the trial court in such case cannot be legally interfered with by this court. Still, in the instant case, on all the material issues, as we have seen—if we disregard all the evidence offered by and on behalf of defendants and rely wholly on the evidence offered by and on behalf of plaintiff, as interpreted and applied under the laws of this state—we think the trial court should have found in favor of defendants, for the reason that the record contains no legal evidence which supports a judgment against them, or any of them.

This disposes of all the points raised by appellants.

As we have seen, the judgment entered against the defendant Boqua is for $700, the amount which he is supposed to have received from the proceeds of the $5,500 paid in by plaintiff; while a judgment for the full amount of $5,500 is entered against each of the other three defendants, notwithstanding the fact that each of them received only what the shares of stock sold by him at $110 each would amount to, and notwithstanding the further fact that a portion of plaintiff's alleged "investment" was actually turned into the corporation for "corporation" stock. We fail to understand the reason for what appears to us a discrimination by the plaintiff between the defendant Boqua and the remaining defendants.

If it be contended that the evidence shows that these defendants represented to plaintiff that they were selling him treasury stock, or that the money paid by him for the stock would go into the treasury of the corporation, or into its business, the answer to this is that the complaint contains no allegation which would permit the legal reception of any such testimony. We, of course, do not so hold, but it has occurred to us, after a careful reading of the whole record here, that in any event the sales of stock made by these defendants were individual sales, and, there being no conspiracy to defraud, the liability, if any there be, would be only individually to the amount received for the individual shares. However, these points are not raised by appellants, and we cite them simply as further reasons for the conclusion we have reached.

We do not think the evidence supports the findings.

Judgment reversed.

PER CURIAM. This case was before us on our term calendar for January last, at which time, by stipulation entered into between the parties hereto—there being no briefs on file, with the exception of appellants' opening brief—respondent was given 20 days to file his answering brief, and appellant 10 days thereafter, if so advised, within which to reply to respondent, the cause then to stand submitted. The time so given expired, without any briefs being filed, and in due time, by proper order, the cause was submitted, the case considered, and opinion filed as the court's judgment therein. Such decision was rendered on March 18th last, and may be found above (189 Pac. 790). On March 24th, by stipulation of the parties, the decision so entered was, by order of this court, set aside, and respondent again given 30 days to prepare, serve, and file his brief, and again on April 21st that stipulation was renewed for 30 days "after April 23d." Respondent finally, and on May 19th last, filed his brief herein, the cause was set for hearing at the July term of this court, and upon the calling thereof was submitted without argument.

We have considered respondent's said brief fully, and find nothing therein which causes us to view the case from any different angle than that taken by us when the opinion above referred to was handed down. We therefore readopt the opinion previously filed herein, and for the reasons there stated the judgment is reversed.

MYERS v. LOWERY et al. (Civ. 3295.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 23, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 20, 1920.)

1. Fraud ☞11(1)—Representations of nurses operating hospital as to accredited character of hospital held to be of fact and not opinion.

In action by nurses in hospital organization against the operators thereof, themselves accredited and registered nurses, for damages for fraud inducing rendition of services under representation and belief hospital was accredited institution meeting requirements of state board under St. 1913, p. 613, court must hold defendant nurses' representations, in view of their knowledge of requirements of their profession, to have been made strictly with respect to specific facts.

2. Fraud ☞11(1) — Affirmation as existing fact of matter which might be only opinion may be fraudulent.

Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion, and does not state it as expression of opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to transaction, so that other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, statement becomes an affirmation, and may be a fraudulent representation.

3. Fraud ☞18—Affirmation to nurses of existing fact as to status of hospital actionable.

The misstatement of registered nurses operating a hospital to other nurses employed by them that the hospital was accredited to the state board of health (under St. 1913, p. 613) was an affirmation of an existing fact material to the transaction to induce other nurses to rely on it, and was therefore actionable.

4. Fraud ☞25—Possibility that nurse deceived by hospital operators could take examination required by state board not a defense.

In action for damages for fraud by a nurse employed by other nurses who operated a hospital under representation that it was duly accredited to state board of health (under St. 1913, p. 613), it was not a defense to hospital operators that whether or not misrepresentations were made and course of training at hospital was insufficient, nevertheless plaintiff nurse could take examination required by state board and become accredited.

5. Trial ☞256(1)—Further instructions desired should have been prepared and submitted.

If defendants desire further instructions on the matter as to which party had the burden of proof by a preponderance of evidence, they should have properly prepared and submitted them to the court.

6. Trial ~~on~~ 260(1)—Instruction need not be repeated on request.

A requested instruction fully and properly covered by other instructions given by the court was properly refused.

7. Fraud ~~on~~ 62 — $12 a week for services of nurses fraudulently procured not excessive.

Damages of less than $12 a week awarded nurses deceived into working for defendants, other nurses who were operating a hospital, by misrepresentations that it was duly accredited to the state board, as required by St. 1913, p. 613, held not excessive in view of evidence that the value of the services rendered was $15 a week.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Alta Myers against Catherine T. Lowery and others, copartners doing business under the name and style of St. Catherine's Hospital. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fredericks & Hanna and Chas. W. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bernard Potter and Lynden Bowring, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff for herself, and on behalf of her assignors, brought this action against the defendants, copartners conducting the St. Catherine's Hospital, in the city of Santa Monica. The action is one for damages, the amount of which is alleged to be the value of services during the time plaintiff and her assignors were employed at said hospital, at the rate of $15 per week. The trial was had before a jury. A verdict was rendered for plaintiff upon three counts. Judgment was entered accordingly, and defendants appeal.

In substance, the allegations of the complaint are that plaintiff and her assignors were induced by the defendants to enter the hospital, and take up training there, upon the representations of the defendants that the said hospital was an accredited training school for nurses, which had met the requirements of the state board of health of the state of California, and that the graduates of said school were eligible for examination by, and registration with, the board; that, relying upon these representations, plaintiff, and her assignors, entered the hospital, and for varying periods of time were employed in caring for patients under treatment, without compensation; that they subsequently learned that the St. Catherine's Hospital was not a training school for nurses, did not meet the requirements of the state board of health, was not an accredited training school, and its graduates were not eligible for examination or registration as nurses; that the training and instruction, given the plaintiff and her assignors at the hospital, were not such as would qualify them to take such examinations, and no record of any kind or nature was kept, as required by law, showing the qualifications of the nurses in training, or their efficiency in their work, nor was said hospital properly equipped in other respects for a training school for nurses; that plaintiff, and her assignors, have endeavored to procure entrance to various other hospitals conducting training schools for nurses that are properly accredited, but have been refused admission for the reason that no credit could, or would, be given for the time expended by them in said St. Catherine's Hospital.

There was evidence in support of these allegations. It is admitted by appellants that the representations, as alleged, were made, and it is further conceded by them that the course of training at the hospital was insufficient to meet the requirements of the state board. They contend, however, that the representations were not material, were but the statements of matters of opinion, honestly believed and expressed by the defendants, and that there was no evidence to the contrary. This position of appellants finds no support in the record. The act to promote the better education of nurses, and the better care of the sick in the state, providing for, and regulating the examination and registration of, graduate nurses, and defining "accredited schools" under the act, was passed by the Legislature some three years before the plaintiff and her assignors made application to be enrolled as student nurses at St. Catherine's Hospital. St. 1913, p. 613. That statute defines an "accredited training school for nurses," within the meaning of the act, to be "a school for the training of nurses attached to or operated in connection with a hospital, or hospitals, giving a general training, and a systematic theoretical and practical course of instruction covering a period of at least three years."

[1, 2] The defendants were, themselves, accredited, and registered, nurses familiar with the requirements of their profession, and its preliminary training. We must assume that as owners they well knew St. Catherine's Hospital was not an accredited school, and was not upon the list of such institutions, as required by the law. It is equally certain that they knew that the admittedly "insufficient course" did not measure up to the legal standard required for the training of nurses. Under such circumstances, we must hold the representations to have been made strictly with respect to specific facts. Even though there might have been some contrary belief on the part of the defendants, or some of them, the evidence clearly brings the statements within the rule laid down by Mr. Pomeroy, and so many times approved in this state and elsewhere, that—

"Wherever a party states a matter which might otherwise be only an opinion and does not state it as the mere expression of his own opinion, but affirms it as an existing fact material to the transaction so that the other party may reasonably treat it as a fact and rely and act upon it as such, then the statement clearly becomes an affirmation within the meaning of the general rule and may be a fraudulent representation." Barron Estate Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 561, 573, 126 Pac. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125; Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 776, 93 Pac. 1018; Cowley v. Smyth, 46 N. J. Law, 380, 388, 50 Am. Rep. 432.

[3] In support of their contention that the representations made to the plaintiff and her assignors were not material, appellants argue that—

"To entitle a graduate of a nurses' training school to take the examination to become a registered nurse, it is not necessary that the school should have been an accredited training school during the entire time that the student was in attendance at the school. It is only necessary that the school be an accredited school at the time the student graduated."

The representation was not to the effect that the hospital would be upon the list when plaintiff and her assignors were ready to graduate, after three years of service, but that it was actually already accredited by the state board of health. The statement was the affirmation of "an existing fact material to the transaction," made to the end that the plaintiff and her assignors might, and the evidence shows did, rely and act upon it.

One of the theories of the defense is that, admitting the representations to have been made, and that the course of training of St. Catherine's Hospital was insufficient at the time the plaintiff and her assignors applied for the course in training, it would still be a defense to the action, if the plaintiff and her assignors would be in position to take the examination required by the state board of health and become graduate nurses upon completion of the course. We think this is a false quantity in the case.

[4] Consequently, the court was correct in sustaining the objection of the plaintiff to certain questions propounded to her upon cross-examination, the purpose of which was to get this erroneous theory before the jury. The defendants do not appear to have been unduly limited upon their cross-examination of the plaintiff, in regard to matters under proper inquiry.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"In civil cases a preponderance of evidence is all that is required, and by 'a preponderance of evidence' is meant such evidence as when weighed with that opposed to it has more convincing force, and from which it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests."

[5] Appellants contend that the effect of the instruction was to tell the jury that the party upon whom the burden rested must prove his case, by a preponderance of the evidence, without informing the jury who the party was. An instruction on the point suggested was included by appellants in another, otherwise bad, which was properly rejected. If appellants desired any further instructions on the matter, they should have properly prepared and submitted them to the court.

[6] The appellants requested the following instruction, which the court properly denied:

"You are instructed that if you find that the defendants, or any of them, stated or represented to the plaintiff, or the plaintiff's assignors, that the training school for nurses operated by the St. Catherine Hospital was an accredited training school, such statement was a representation of an opinion as distinguished from a representation of fact, and you must not return a verdict for the plaintiff based upon such representation unless you are convinced by a preponderance of the evidence that such representation was untrue and was made by the defendant or defendants with knowledge of the fact that it was untrue.

"If you find that such representation was made and that such representation was an honest expression of opinion on the part of defendant or defendants, you must not return a verdict for the plaintiff based upon such representation."

The matter was fully, and properly, covered by other instructions, given by the court, which were based upon the rule laid down by Mr. Pomeroy, already quoted. Furthermore, the requested instruction was erroneous, in part, in informing the jury that the representations were matters of opinion, and was for that reason properly refused. Marriener v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 215, 20 Pac. 386.

Appellants are in error in stating that facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are not pleaded, in that there is no allegation that the defendants knew the representations made by them to be false at the time they were made. The amended complaint contains such averment.

[7] The contention that damages are excessive is not borne out by the evidence, which was that the value of the services rendered was $15 per week, while the amount of the verdict is at the rate of less than $12 per week.

The judgment is affirmed.

JARVIS et al. v. FREY et al. (Civ. 3313.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1920.)

I. Appeal and error — 1212(3)—On reversal and remand, simply, new trial is on all issues.

The effect of a judgment that judgment be "reversed and the cause remanded" is, that the cause is remanded to the lower court for a trial of all the issues made by the pleadings.

2. Principal and surety ~~112~~—Surety not released by partial satisfaction of judgment.

Mere satisfaction of judgment, to the extent of a payment on account thereof, is not a release of the surety of the judgment debtor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by W. H. Jarvis and another against A. Frey and others. From a judgment for cross-complainant, Universal Lumber & Mill Company against cross-defendant, Pacific Surety Company, said cross-defendant appeals. Reversed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant.

Crouch & Chambers, of San Diego, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The respondent, Universal Lumber & Mill Company, was a party to, and a cross-complainant in, a consolidated action to enforce the payment of certain mechanic's liens. Defendant Frey was the owner, defendant Campbell was the original contractor and cross-defendant, and the cross-defendant and appellant, Pacific Surety Company, was the surety upon the contractor's undertaking, conditioned on the faithful performance by him of his contract, and binding the surety, if Campbell failed to do so, to pay for any materials or supplies, furnished for and in performance of his contract. The trial court denied the lumber company relief by reason of certain infirmities in its claim of lien which, it held, rendered it invalid. It likewise denied it judgment against the surety company, based upon the same ground, to wit, the invalidity of the lien. On appeal the Supreme Court held that "the trial court ruled all too rigidly in holding this lien claim to be invalid." The judgment appealed from was therefore "reversed, and the cause remanded." Jarvis v. Frey, 175 Cal. 687, 690, 166 Pac. 997.

When the case came on for trial the second time the respondent lumber company introduced evidence, both oral and documentary, as to the existence of its lien, the amount and value of the material furnished by it to Campbell, and in support of the amount remaining unpaid. After allowing the introduction of this testimony, the trial court, over the objection of this appellant, held the issue as to the validity of the lien and as to the amount and value, if any, of the materials furnished by the lumber company conclusively established, and foreclosed as to all parties, and the surety company estopped to offer any evidence thereon, by reason of the findings of fact made in the first trial, which findings the court held to be conclusive as to the facts therein stated.

In keeping with this ruling, the court permitted the cross-defendant surety company to introduce testimony in an endeavor to establish a special defense it alleged, by way of a subsequent release of the lien, but denied it the right to dispute the claim of the lumber company against its principal, Campbell, the contractor, and its own liability under the lien. New findings were thereupon made "that all the allegations in the cross-complaint of the cross-complainant Universal Lumber Company are true," and that there had been no release of the lien. Judgment was entered against the surety company for the sum established by the former findings, as the amount of the claim due from the contractor to the lumber company.

[1] From this judgment the surety company has appealed, urging, as the principal ground for a reversal, the action of the trial court in refusing it a trial de novo upon all the issues presented by the pleadings to which it was a party.

The court was in error in so ruling. While the appellate court may, and often does, remand a cause with directions to the trial court to find upon a single issue, leaving the other findings to remain as part of the record (Duff v. Duff, 101 Cal. 1, 4, 35 Pac. 437), in this instance that was not done. The judgment of the Supreme Court was that judgment be "reversed, and the cause remanded," the effect of which was that the cause was remanded to the lower court for a trial of all the issues made by the pleadings. Rossi v. Caire, 180 Pac. 58; Stein v. Leeman, 161 Cal. 502, 119 Pac. 663; Davis v. Le Mesnager, 155 Cal. 520, 101 Pac. 910; Glassell v. Hansen, 149 Cal. 514, 87 Pac. 200; Heidt v. Minor, 113 Cal. 385, 45 Pac. 700.

[2] Appellant complains that the court erred in holding the evidence sufficient to justify its finding to the effect that no release or satisfaction, of any kind or character, was ever given to the appellant, Pacific Surety Company, by the respondent, Universal Lumber & Mill Company, for any part of the claim sued upon in this action. There is no merit in this contention. At the former trial of this case the trial court gave judgment in favor of various lienholders, including the respondent, and against W. F. Campbell, the contractor. It ordered that the balance of the funds remaining in the hands of Frey, the owner, after the payment of the claims of all the other lien claimants, which balance amounted to the sum of $1,716.83, be paid to the lumber company on account of its judgment. It is conceded that the lumber company accepted this sum and satisfied the judgment to that extent. The entry in the judgment book, introduced by the appellant, amounts to no more than a satisfaction of the judgment in that amount.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

GLOBE INDEMNITY CO. v. HOOK et al.
(Civ. 3277.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 26, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 20, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §389—Employé stepping into elevator well in darkness held negligent precluding recovery over by compensation insurer.

Employé who in darkness stepped into elevator well without attempting to ascertain whether elevator was at floor, but looking behind him with his companion, was negligent precluding recovery over against owners and lessees of building by workmen's compensation insurer.

2. Negligence §136(26)—Contributory negligence is for court only where facts undisputed.

Ordinarily contributory negligence is of fact for the jury, but becomes a question of law for the court where facts are undisputed and reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion.

3. Master and servant §405(1) — Evidence held conclusively to show contributory negligence of deceased employé.

In action by workmen's compensation insurer of employers of one who stepped in darkness into elevator shaft of building owned by some and leased by them to other defendants, evidence held to show conclusively that deceased employé was guilty of contributory negligence in stepping into shaft without endeavoring to ascertain whether elevator was at floor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by the Globe Indemnity Company against W. S. Hook, Jr., and wife, and Geo. Rice & Sons, a corporation. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis Cruickshank and Vincent B. Vaughan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. P. Jennings and Jefferson P. Chandler, both of Los Angeles, for respondents W. S. Hook, Jr., and Myrtle Wood Hook.

Hollzer & Greenberg and Joe Crider, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent George Rice & Sons.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor in defendants following an order granting their motion for nonsuit. Plaintiff sued as surety in subrogation under the provisions of the "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act" (St. 1917, p. 831), to recover damages for negligence on the part of the defendants resulting in the death of one Eugene P. Nolan. The decedent was an employé of the Pacific Knitting Mills, with which the plaintiff had made a contract of compensation insurance. Plaintiff had paid the award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to the dependents of decedent.

The facts of the case are: That the Pacific Knitting Mills maintained and operated an establishment on the fourth floor of a building situate in the city of Los Angeles and owned by the defendants Hook and leased by the defendant Geo. Rice & Sons. Means of ingress and egress to the said fourth floor was by way of a passenger elevator and a stairway in the front part of the building and a freight elevator in the rear of the building. The stairway was always open. The passenger elevator in the front of the building was operated between the hours of 7 a. m. and 5 o'clock p. m., and the freight elevator was used by employés of the company at their convenience. Decedent and one Stewart on the day of the injury entered the rear of the building at about 5:30 p. m. on a dark night on their way to the fourth floor for the purpose of attending to their duties. They approached the elevator shaft, which was without light of any kind, and Stewart raised the gate which guarded the elevator shaft, stuck his foot into the shaft to feel the elevator, and continued on down to the bottom of the well, receiving slight injuries. Decedent, who was by his side, followed him immediately into the well and struck the bottom in such a way as to receive injuries which resulted in his death. Neither party made any effort to ascertain whether the elevator was at the ground floor other than as just stated. Both were looking back at the time they stepped into the well, and both were thoroughly familiar with the danger which they assumed. Stewart, who was the only eyewitness to what occurred, testified in part as follows:

That his automobile was standing in the street directly in front of the freight elevator, and he went to the automobile and turned the dimmers down; that he and decedent reached the elevator at the same time, and he reached down and raised the gate of the elevator; that at that time there were no lights in the elevator nor street lights in the vicinity to light up the elevator shaft. "I reached down and pulled the gate up and stuck my foot in to feel if the elevator was there, and just as I did that he (decedent) spoke to me and said, 'Your lights are not on.' * * * And instinctively as he said that, although I knew the lights were on, I turned around to look; and then just a subconscious thought, whatever it was, I had in my mind to step in there, and I stepped in. All I thought was, all the way down, 'This elevator is a long way below the floor,' because it never stopped right at the floor. * * * The elevator was above instead of below. * * * We both stepped in together into the shaft."

The same witness testified that they could have entered the front door and walked up the front stairs; that, though the elevator in the rear was for freight, it had been used by employes of the knitting mills as a passenger elevator for about three years prior to the accident; that, though the freight elevator was frequently at or near the ground floor, it was often either in the basement or at one of the upper floors; and that both he and decedent had frequently been required to pull the cable in order to bring the elevator up or down to the ground floor, but in the nighttime "generally from an upper floor down; in fact, always. I don't know of a case where I raised the elevator from the basement after dark."

The testimony of the witness Stewart was the only evidence offered by plaintiff showing the circumstances under which the accident occurred. There is therefore no conflict in the evidence in this particular. The only point urged upon appeal requiring consideration is whether this evidence presented such a case of contributory negligence on the part of decedent as to justify the trial court in taking the case from the jury, it being conceded that the same principles of law as to contributory negligence are applicable to a surety suing in a case of this nature as are applicable in a case brought directly by the one injured or his legal representatives.

[1] From the evidence it appears that decedent knew of the danger and assumed the risk without taking any precautions or care to avoid injury. No explanation is given to account for his conduct. Reasonable prudence would require any one approaching a place of known danger to use some care, at least, for his own safety. But the evidence here is not only that decedent stepped into the elevator well without attempting to ascertain whether the elevator was at the floor, but that at the very time he and his companion entered the well they were both looking behind them into the street. One may not thus heedlessly disregard the ordinary precautions which prudence would require to be taken for his own safety.

[2] From this statement of the evidence the propriety of the nonsuit is apparent. As the Supreme Court said in Loftus v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 467, 137 Pac. 34, 35:

"Ordinarily, of course, the question whether a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury. It becomes a question of law for the decision of the court only where the facts are undisputed, and, even then, only where, on those facts, reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion on the issue of plaintiff's negligence."

And again, in Kauffman v. Machin Shirt Co., 167 Cal. 506, 511, 140 Pac. 15, 17:

"It is true that ordinarily the question of contributory negligence is one largely of fact for the consideration of the jury, but where the standard of conduct required of persons under given circumstances has been plainly neglected by the person seeking relief, it then becomes a question of law." McGraw v. Friend, etc., Lumber Co., 120 Cal. 574, 579, 52 Pac. 1004.

[3] The evidence here is of such a nature that no deduction or inference other than that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence could be drawn, and reasonable minds could not have honestly reached a different conclusion.

For these reasons the order of the trial judge granting the motion to nonsuit plaintiff was proper, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

I concur: LANGDON, P. J.

Mr. Justice BRITTAIN, deeming himself disqualified to act in this case, does not participate in its determination.

LINDLEY v. KNOWLTON. (Civ. 3294.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 19, 1920.)

1. Damages — 130(3)—Award of $1,500 for boy's nervousness brought on by chimpanzee's attack sustained by evidence.

In action against owner of chimpanzee for injuries to boy of nine, attacked in his home by the animal negligently permitted to be at large, evidence held to sustain finding boy had been damaged in sum of $1,500, in that he was rendered sick and thereafter subjected to nightmares, inability to sleep, night frights, nervous attacks, etc.

2. Costs — 260(4)—Penalty will be imposed for frivolous appeal taken for delay.

Where appeal is taken from judgment awarding damages for injuries to a child by a chimpanzee negligently permitted to run at large, and the evidence clearly sustains the judgment, the appeal will be deemed frivolous, and judgment will be affirmed, with an added penalty of $100 imposed on appellant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Milton Lindley, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Oliver P. Lindley, against E. W. Knowlton. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ticknor & Carter, of Pasadena, for appellant.

A. L. Abrahams and Claude B. Morton, both of Los Angeles, and P. B. D'Orr, of Atlanta, Ga., for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,500, damages for injuries received by the plaintiff, a minor child of the age of nine years at the time of his said injuries, in consequence of an attack made upon him by a chimpanzee which was owned by the defendant and which was negligently allowed to go at large, and which, entering the home of the parents of the plaintiff, made there the attack upon him from which the injuries resulted which led to this action.

The facts of the case are set forth at length in the case of Lindley v. Knowlton, 179 Cal. 298, 176 Pac. 440, to which reference is hereby made. The cause was tried before the court, and the only error complained of by the defendant in this case is that there was not sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the court "that said minor Milton Lindley has been damaged in the sum of $1,500."

Without reviewing all of the evidence upon which this finding is based, it will be sufficient to state that there was evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff showing that about the hour of 9 o'clock in the morning of March 17, 1914, while the plaintiff was in the home of his parents and was in the act of dressing, the defendant's chimpanzee, which it is conceded he had negligently permitted to be at large, entered the room where the boy was, and seized him, knocking him down, striking his head against a post and stepping upon his body; that his mother and a faithful dog fought the animal off; that the child was picked up by his mother in a fainting condition suffering from bruises that were superficial; that he continued until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon to be extremely nervous, sick at his stomach and dizzy, when he was taken to a physician and treated for his superficial injuries; that although prior to the attack he had been wont to sleep peacefully during the night, after the attack and during months following he screamed in the night, had nightmares, and thought he was being pursued by something, and that he had sick spells with fever and headaches and jerky and twitching nerves; that after his injuries he would wander off and be gone all day without breakfast, dinner, or supper, and that often when spoken to he seemed dazed, and it was found difficult to attract his attention; that upon one occasion three weeks after the attack he was thrown into such a state of terror at seeing a dog that he ran into the house screaming, locked the doors and windows, and remained in a state of fear all the rest of the day; that during the four years which elapsed between the date of his injuries and the trial of the case he was irritable and hard to control, and even at the trial was neurotic and subject to high fever upon exertion.

[1, 2] From testimony of this character and from the personal observation which the judge of the trial court had of the child he made the finding complained of on this appeal; and that said evidence amply sustains such finding is too plain for argument; and that this is a case which should never have been appealed does not admit of serious discussion. We are of the opinion that the appeal is frivolous, and that it was taken for delay. This being so, the judgment is affirmed, with the added penalty of $100 hereby imposed upon the appellant for the taking and prosecution of a frivolous appeal.

HAGENAH v. BIDWELL et ux. (Civ. 3251.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 13, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1) — Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the evidence as to contributory negligence was conflicting, the Court of Appeal is bound by the trial court's finding.

2. Highways $\S$ 184(2) — Finding that allegations of complaint in action for injuries from collision were true held not sustained by evidence.

Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff was riding "along" the highway on the northerly side of the road and defendants were riding "along" the highway on the same side, being their left-hand side, a finding that the allegations of the complaint were true was not sustained by evidence showing that both parties were on the south side of the road, and, in an attempt to avoid a collision, turned diagonally across the road, colliding at the extreme north edge.

3. Highways $\S$ 184(3) — Driving on left-hand side not negligence as matter of law.

That defendants were on the left-hand side of the highway was not negligence as a matter of law, as there are circumstances under which the law permits one to use that portion of the highway.

4. Highways $\S$ 184(2) — Party injured in collision must show accident occurred through defendant's negligence.

Plaintiff, suing for injuries in a collision with defendant's automobile, must show, not only that an accident occurred and he was injured, but also that it occurred by reason of the negligence of the defendants or of the defendant driving the machine.

5. Highways $\S$ 175(1) — Driver must seek to avoid collision through another's negligence.

The driver of a vehicle suddenly confronted with danger, though arising from the fault of another, must seek to avoid a collision, but whether he has taken the proper course depends upon all the circumstances of the case.

6. Trial $\S$ 391 — Where negligence question of fact, court should find facts in issue.

In an action for injuries sustained in a highway collision, where the question of negligence was one of fact, defendant was entitled to a finding on the facts put in issue in order that the court might, on appeal, determine whether the trial court drew the proper conclusions of law from the facts so found.

7. Highways §175(1)—If proximate cause of collision was negligence of plaintiff's driver, he cannot recover.

Though the negligence of the driver of the motorcycle on which plaintiff was riding might not be imputed to him under a plea of contributory negligence, yet, if the proximate cause of the collision with defendant's automobile was the negligence of such driver, plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Alfred Hagenah against W. E. Bidwell and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. B. Sessions, of San Francisco (David K. Watkins, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff while riding on a motorcycle which, while being driven by one Reed, came into collision with an automobile driven by the defendant, Maude A. Bidwell.

The plaintiff alleged that at the time of the accident he was riding along a public highway "in a westerly direction, and was on the extreme northerly side of said road within a foot from the northerly edge of said highway; that while riding as aforesaid plaintiff was on his right-hand side of the road;" and that "the defendants were riding in their aforesaid automobile along said public highway in an easterly direction * * * and were going in the opposite direction to that in which the plaintiff was proceeding; * * * that said defendants were driving said automobile on the northern side of said public highway, being their left-hand side of said highway, and being the side on which the plaintiff was riding." The defendants, in addition to denying these allegations, affirmatively pleaded that, as they were proceeding easterly on the highway in question and on the right-hand or southern side thereof, the motorcycle driven by Reed was proceeding westerly towards them on the same side of the highway, being on Reed's left-hand side thereof; that Reed in driving the motorcycle approached so close to the automobile that a head-on collision appeared to be imminent; that confronted by this danger produced by Reed's negligence, the defendant, Maude A.

Bidwell turned the automobile to the left in a direction which caused it to move diagonally across the road to the north side; that at approximately the same instant Reed turned his motorcycle so that it headed diagonally across the road to his right; and that the collision occurred at the extreme north edge of the road. The evidence, without conflict in these essential particulars, shows that the accident occurred exactly as described in the answer. Notwithstanding these facts, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, the only findings on these matters being that the allegations set forth in the complaint were true and were facts established by the evidence, except in an immaterial particular, and that the denials and allegations in the answer and cross-complaints of the respective defendants were not true and not facts, except in immaterial particulars.

[1] The defendants also pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in riding with Reed in the manner in which he was riding and under the conditions claimed by the defendants to have existed. It was contended at the trial that since Reed was not a party to this suit, the defendants' cross-complaints could not be sustained as against the plaintiff Hagenah. The arguments on behalf of the appellants on the subject of Hagenah's claimed contributory negligence may be disregarded, because on that subject the evidence was conflicting, and this court is bound by the finding of the trial court.

[3-6] It is argued that at the moment of the collision the defendants were on their left-hand side of the road. This cannot be controverted, but it does not follow as a matter of law that the defendants were negligent in being where they were at that time. It is not sufficient in a suit of this nature for the plaintiff to show that an accident occurred, and that he was injured, but he must also show that the accident occurred by reason of the negligence of the defendants, or, in this case, of the wife who was driving the machine. Cary v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 604, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329; Marsiglia v. Dozier, 161 Cal. 403, 405, 119 Pac. 505. The allegations of the complaint that defendants were traveling along their left-hand side of the highway do not make a case of negligence per se because there are certain circumstances under which the law permits one to use that portion of the highway. It is the duty of the driver of a vehicle who is suddenly confronted with danger, though arising from the fault of another, to seek to avoid a collision. Skene v. Graham, 114 Me. 229, 95 Atl. 950; Hartley v. Lasater, 96 Wash. 407, 165 Pac. 106. Whether he has taken the proper course depends upon all the circumstances of the case. Hartley v. Lasater, supra; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 521, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; County of Alameda v. Tieslau, 186 Pac. 398. Accordingly, when the question of negligence is one of fact and not one of law, the defendant is entitled to a finding on the facts put in issue in order that the court may on appeal determine whether the trial court drew the proper conclusions of law from the facts so found. Here the circumstances under which the collision occurred were definitely put in issue by the answer, and were proved substantially without conflict at the trial. The finding that all the allegations of the answers were untrue was not sustained by the evidence.

[7] If the court had found in accordance with the evidence it would then have been called upon to determine who had the last clear chance of avoiding the collision, and also whether the proximate cause of the collision was the negligence of defendants or the negligence of Reed. For it is true that, though the negligence of the driver of the motorcycle may not be imputed to respondent under a plea of contributory negligence, nevertheless if the proximate cause of the collision was the negligence of the driver of the motorcycle upon which respondent was riding, he cannot recover. These questions, however, cannot be determined here because the findings which were made negative the essential facts upon which these legal questions must be based.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed.

CASSRIEL v. McINTYRE. (Civ. 3258.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 18, 1920.)

1. Sales ⇐417—Evidence held not to show agreement as to invoice conditional to completion of deal.

In an action for breach of agreement for the sale of personal property consisting of the fixtures of a jewelry store and a stock of merchandise, whereby a balance of the purchase price was to be paid when the invoice had been completed and footed, evidence held not to show that such invoice had been agreed upon so as to justify demand for possession.

2. Sales ⇐406—Tender of price accompanied by unauthorized condition held invalid.

In an action for breach of contract to sell certain fixtures and a stock of merchandise of a jewelry store, where plaintiff had refused to allow defendant to remove from the store articles not included in the sale, a tender by plaintiff of the purchase price, conditioned upon possession of the premises containing the property not sold, was insufficient; the condition being one which the tenderer had no right to make.

3. Sales ⇐406—Tender of insufficient amount is invalid.

In an action for breach of contract to sell store fixtures and a stock of merchandise where the agreement fixed the price of the fixtures at a certain figure and provided that the merchandise should be paid for at the invoice cost price, less a 15 per cent. discount, a tender by the purchaser of the amount due for the fixtures only was insufficient as a tender of the purchase price for the whole contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Henry Cassriel against J. M. McIntyre. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.

Alva E. Snow, of Fresno, and W. J. Minville, of Coalinga, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, awarding him damages for breach of an agreement dated October 15, 1918, to sell personal property. The agreement, which was in writing, read as follows:

"Received of E. A. Webb, the sum of $50.00, as first payment on the purchase price of all fixtures, furnishings, safe, show cases, stationery, merchandise and other articles in or belonging to the Coalinga Jewelry store, as owned and operated by me at 237 N. 5th street, Coalinga, California. I agree to sell to the said E. A. Webb, or his assigns the fixtures consisting of 1 safe, 1 cash register, counter, 8 show cases, 1 fountain pen case, 2 show windows, a small silver show case, 2 oak wall cases, 2 pine wall cases, 3 tables, scales, &c for the consideration of $1,000.00 to be paid with and in conjunction with the balance of the purchase price as stated below: I agree to sell him or assigns, all the stock of merchandise, consisting of stationery, stationer's supplies, jewelry and all other stock in said business &c. at its invoice cost price, less a discount of 15% from said invoice price, upon the following terms, to wit: The above sum of $50.00 as credited on all the purchase price herein, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the further sum of $950.00 upon completion of and footing of said invoice cost and the balance of purchase price within 48 hours after delivery of bill of sale to the First National Bank of Coalinga, Coalinga, California, for said purchaser or his assigns, it being agreed that the usual and legal notice of intended sale shall have been given and that all claims against said business shall have been paid and satisfied so that no obligations shall remain against said business, the said bank being authorized to withhold sufficient of said funds to pay all presented claims, until same are satisfied. It is also agreed that said sale shall include the good will of said business as well as all right to the use and occupation of the premises at 237 N. 5th street under lease from A. P. May."

The sign "&c." following the word "scales" was lined out by the parties, executing the contract and initialed by them in the margin thereof at the time of its execution for the purpose of eliminating from the sale any articles other than those expressly enumerated.

On October 24, 1918, Webb assigned his interest in the agreement to Cassriel, the plaintiff in this action. Webb and an employé of defendant prepared an invoice of the stock of merchandise, which showed a cost price of $5,133.15. At the time of the taking of the invoice defendant's employé presented to Webb a supplemental invoice of fixtures and furnishings located within the store and not enumerated in the list of fixtures agreed to be sold for $1,000, the value of which was $407.50. Webb refused to indorse such invoice, claiming at the time that he had purchased all the articles listed therein for $1,000 under his agreement, and that if any dispute arose regarding said items between defendant and plaintiff, to whom at that time the agreement had been assigned, such dispute would have to be adjusted by them. These facts having come to the attention of defendant, he sought the plaintiff, and urged him to come into the store to see just what was included in the contract of sale and invoice so that he (defendant) might retain and subsequently remove from the store the articles which he claimed were not included in the sale. Plaintiff, however, refused to enter the store for any purpose, and insisted upon defendant accompanying him to the office of his attorney for the purpose of closing the deal. The parties there continued their controversy over the disputed articles, and plaintiff tendered defendant payment of $950 and demanded possession of the premises, but defendant refused to accept payment or to deliver possession because plaintiff would not permit him to first remove the disputed articles from the premises. There is some evidence to the effect that at the time of this purported tender the plaintiff had sufficient money in the First National Bank of Coalinga to make full payment for the stock of merchandise, and that defendant was told, either by plaintiff or by Webb, that this money was available, but there is no evidence that it was tendered to defendant, or that any demand was made upon him for a bill of sale, or that the notice to creditors of intended sale had been made as called for by the contract. The trial court found that the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the sum of $950, but that defendant refused to accept the same, and defendant thereupon notified plaintiff that he would not carry out the terms of his contract. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $3,079 as damages for defendant's breach.

[1] On the trial it was urged, among other things, that the tender was insufficient. The necessity of a tender is apparent. The contract calls for the payment of the sum of $950 in conjunction with the balance of the purchase price on completion of and footing of the invoice cost of the merchandise. No other time for payment on the part of the buyer or delivery on the part of the seller is fixed in the contract. No method being specified as to the manner in which the invoice was to be completed and footed, it is fair to assume that the preparation of this invoice was to be made by the parties to the contract, and was to be approved by them before delivery or payment was to be made. The trial court merely found that some time in the month of October, and after the 15th of that month, an inventory was taken for the purpose of ascertaining the invoice cost price of the merchandise, and that the footing of said invoice was completed. The evidence is that the inventory was taken by an employé of appellant and by respondent's assignor. It is not claimed that respondent's assignor was acting as the agent of respondent, and it is not claimed that appellant's employé was authorized to do more than the mere clerical work of taking the inventory. There is no evidence that this inventory was ever presented to or approved by either appellant or respondent. On the contrary, it is alleged in the complaint and found true by the trial court that the "defendant has at all times since the taking of said invoice refused to, and does now refuse to, apprise plaintiff thereof, or the footings thereof." It is uncontradicted that appellant's employé insisted that the disputed articles should be included within this invoice, and that Webb refused to do so, and claimed that all the disputed articles were included in the purchase of fixtures for the consideration of $1,000. It was on account of this dispute that appellant insisted upon the respondent coming to his store to check up the invoice so that he might see what he was getting. This respondent refused to do. Whether the disputed articles should have been included in the invoice as claimed by appellant's employé, or whether they were included in the sale of fixtures, as claimed by Webb, is immaterial. The evidence fails to show that the invoice had been agreed to by the parties, and there is no conflict in the evidence that appellant's refusal to make delivery was conditional upon the adjustment of the dispute as to these articles.

Appellant argues that inasmuch as upon uncontradicted evidence the tender of $950 was accompanied by a demand of either immediate possession or of the key to the premises for the purpose of acquiring immediate possession (which also included possession of the disputed articles), and that inasmuch as respondent was not entitled to possession until the full purchase price was paid, the tender was defective, both because it was accompanied by a condition which respondent had no right to exact and because it was insufficient in amount.

[2] Respondent now disclaims any interest in the articles valued at something over $400, but the evidence is without conflict that there was some dispute as to the ownership of these articles immediately prior to the time that the purported tender was made. The agreement expressly provided that the sale should include the right to the use and occupation of the premises where the personal property was located. But that appellant was not obliged to deliver to respondent possession of property which was not included within the terms of the sale cannot be questioned. His demand that he be permitted to remove these articles before possession of the store was given to respondent was reasonable. But respondent refused this request, and demanded possession of the premises and all the property upon tender of payment for a portion of the fixtures alone. When a tender of payment is made, accompanied by a condition which the tenderer has no right to make, the tender is invalid.

[3] Furthermore, the purported tender was insufficient in amount. The contract specifically provided that payment for the fixtures was to be made with and in conjunction with the balance of the purchase price of the merchandise. Concededly no tender of the purchase price of the merchandise was ever made or attempted. Respondent was not entitled to possession of the premises, nor of the property to be purchased, until full payment had been made, the contract not having provided for an earlier transfer of possession. The purported tender of the $950 was apparently made under advice of counsel to protect the legal rights of respondent. But a tender which is short of something which the creditor is entitled to receive is insufficient, and nothing short of an unconditional tender of the purchase price in addition to the sum of $950 would constitute a valid tender under the circumstances.

For these reasons the judgment is reversed.

INTERNATIONAL INDEMNITY CO. v.
BUCHER et ux. (Civ. 3264.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 30, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⇐581(6)—Evidence insufficient to show that plaintiff's attorney was paid so as not to justify allowance of attorney's fees.

In a mortgage foreclosure suit, evidence held insufficient to sustain defendant's special defense against an allowance of attorney's fees based on an agreement by plaintiff corporation with its counsel for a fixed compensation.

2. Mortgages ⇐581(6)—Employment of attorney need not be proved to justify allowance of attorney's fees in foreclosure.

Appearance of attorney for plaintiff in a foreclosure suit is sufficient to warrant allowance of compensation for attorney's fees, and plaintiff need not allege or prove that attorney had been employed, or that an agreement had been made to pay him for his services.

3. Trusts ⇐315(1)—Trustee entitled to compensation for services rendered.

A trustee is entitled to compensation for services rendered in connection with the trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the International Indemnity Company, a corporation, against Joseph Bucher and wife, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank F. Oster, Jos. L. Lewinsohn, and Jerry H. Powell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

N. Blackstock, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff corporation instituted this action to foreclose a mortgage on real estate of the defendants. The complaint contained the usual allegations in a suit of this nature, including the mortgage in full, wherein it was provided that in the event of foreclosure a reasonable attorney's fee, to be fixed by the court, was to be paid by the mortgagor. The essential allegations of the complaint were admitted by the defendants in their answer, but as to the payment of the attorney's fee they set up the defense that the only attorney engaged by plaintiff in this action was one who was regularly employed by it as its counsel at a fixed salary and other compensation for all services rendered by the attorney, including his legal services in this action. After trial the court found that it was not true that said attorney was employed on a salary for all services as alleged in the answer, but that his salary was paid to him as president of the corporation, and that said corporation was obligated to its attorney to pay him what his services in this action might be reasonably worth. Upon these findings the court awarded judgment in favor of plaintiff for $8,425.28 as principal and the additional sum of $365 as attorney's fees. The only objection to the judgment on behalf of defendants goes to the correctness of the findings as to the allowance of attorney's fees.

[1] In support of their special defense the defendants proffered evidence of a written contract executed by the plaintiff corporation and its counsel in this action on the 26th day of January, 1912, whereby said counsel was employed for the period of five years at a fixed compensation to be paid for all legal services rendered by him on behalf of the corporation. The same agreement provided that as president of the corporation he should receive no compensation. This agreement, by its terms, expired on January 26, 1917, and no evidence was offered tending to prove that it had either been extended or that a new agreement for the payment of compensation for legal services had been made. This action was commenced January 22, 1918, and the only effort of proof of an agreement on the part of the corporation to pay compensation to its counsel in this case was the introduction of the resolution of its board of directors passed on May 1, 1918, wherein the corporation fixed the salary of its president, the same party who appeared as its counsel in this case, at $250 a month. If this evidence proves anything material to the issues in this case, it is that the directors of the corporation, by fixing the salary of its president, deemed as no longer in force the contract of January 26, 1912, which provided that the president should receive no compensation as such. There is not the slightest evidence to support the special defense raised by defendants, and nothing from which even an inference might be drawn to bring the case within Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379.

[2] It was not necessary for plaintiff to allege or prove that an attorney had been employed by it or that an agreement had been made to pay him for his services rendered in connection with this case. The fact that an attorney appeared for plaintiff in the action was sufficient to warrant the court in allowing plaintiff compensation for attorney's fees as having been incurred by it in this action. Conner v. Blodget, 18 Cal. App. 787, 789, 124 Pac. 733.

[3] It is also argued that, because plaintiff's counsel was an officer and hence a trustee of the plaintiff corporation, he was not entitled to compensation for his services in connection with this action in the absence of a resolution or by-law of the corporation authorizing such compensation to be paid. In this connection it is argued that, inasmuch as plaintiff's counsel occupied a position of trust as president of the corporation, the services rendered by him must be deemed to have been gratuitous unless a specific contract was made for that purpose. To this point cases from the Illinois courts are cited. It is sufficient to say that appellant has selected authorities from one of the few states which recognize the common-law doctrine that a trustee is not entitled to compensation for services rendered in connection with the trust. Such is not the rule in California, and the cases cited are not applicable.

It is not necessary to consider the objections raised to the introduction of evidence, because the admission of such evidence, if error, was not prejudicial to defendants. Full opportunity was given to them to prove the allegations of their special defense, and this they failed to do.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte TAHBEL. (Cr. 713.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 1, 1920.)

1. Witnesses ⇨292—Every one may be compelled to give testimony.

Every person is subject to the power of the Legislature to compel him in any judicial proceeding to give testimony of any fact within his knowledge and material to the issue, except in so far as the Constitution restrains the exercise of this power, or protects the individual from compulsory compliance with its attempted exercise.

2. Witnesses ⇨297—Rule against self-incrimination stated.

According to one of the oldest maxims of the common law, "Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare," any person, whether a party or stranger to the litigation, either in a civil action or a criminal prosecution, may, if he sees fit, refuse to answer any question the answer to which, if true, will render him punishable for crime, or which, in any degree, may tend to establish a public offense with which he might be charged.

3. Witnesses 297—Immunity from self-incrimination exists, although no criminal prosecution pending; "criminal case."

The words "criminal case," as used in Const. art. 1, § 13, are broader than "criminal prosecution," and, to bring a person within the immunity of this provision, it is not necessary that his examination as witness be had in a criminal prosecution against him, or that a criminal proceeding should have been commenced and be actually pending, but it is sufficient if there is a law creating the offense under which the witness may be prosecuted.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Criminal Case or Cause.]

4. Witnesses 304(1)—Rule against self-incrimination applies to any offense examination may disclose.

If there is a law creating the offense under which the witness may be prosecuted, and if the witness may be indicted or otherwise prosecuted for the public offense arising out of the acts to which his examination relates, he cannot be compelled to answer in any collateral proceeding, civil or criminal, unless absolutely secured against any use in a criminal prosecution of the evidence he may give, which can be done only by a statutory provision that if he submits to the examination in answers he shall be exempt from criminal prosecution for any offense that may be disclosed as a consequence of his examination.

5. Witnesses 21—Juvenile court law held not to warrant commitment of minor for refusing to answer incriminating questions.

Juvenile court law held not to justify commitment to juvenile detention home of a minor solely because of his refusal to answer incriminating questions.

Application of Bodo Tahbel for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Juvenile Court of Los Angeles County to secure his release from juvenile detention home. Ordered that petitioner be discharged from detention.

Paul Schenck, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. W. Joos, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. By his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the petitioner, Henry Tahbel, father of Bodo Tahbel, a boy 15 years of age, seeks his son's release from "Juvenile Hall," a detention home, in the city of Los Angeles, established under the juvenile court law as a place for the confinement of delinquent minors, and to which the boy was committed for refusing to answer certain questions when a witness in the juvenile court. The boy's refusals to answer were made upon the ground that by his answers he might incriminate himself.

On February 19, 1920, there was filed in the juvenile court for Los Angeles county a petition wherein it is charged that the minor, Bodo Tahbel, is a person defined in subdivisions 2, 4, 11, and 13 of section 1 of the "juvenile court law" (Stats. 1915, p. 1225 et seq.) and that he comes within the purview of section 1 of that act in that he has no parent or guardian willing to exercise proper parental control; that, by reason of the depravity of his parents, his home is an unfit place for him; that, by reason of the association of his parents with lewd and lascivious characters and the influence of his parents and of such characters, he is in danger of leading a lewd and immoral life; and, further, that he has violated the criminal law of this state, in that he did commit perjury, as defined in section 118 of the Penal Code, and did violate section 134 of the Penal Code by preparing a false paper and instrument in writing with intent to produce it in the superior court of Los Angeles county in the trial of the case of People v. Otoman-Adusht-Zar-Ha'Nish. The petition so filed in the juvenile court against the minor sets forth in detail the acts charged against him as an alleged violator of the two above-mentioned sections of the Penal Code, and prays that he be adjudged to be a ward of the juvenile court, and be dealt with as provided in the juvenile court law.

Some time prior to the presentation of this petition of January 19, 1920, to the juvenile court, another petition had been filed therein against the minor, similar in all respects to that filed January 19, 1920, except that it did not charge the minor with the commission of any crime. The proceeding so initiated by the prior petition is still pending, though it seems that no formal judgment has as yet been entered therein adjudging the minor to be a ward of the juvenile court; the only order made in that proceeding being an order that the minor be allowed to remain in the custody of his father. He remained in his father's custody until the court, because of his refusal to answer the questions, ordered his detention in Juvenile Hall.

The second petition, that wherein the minor is charged with the commission of felonies—violations of sections 118 and 134 of the Penal Code—was referred to a duly appointed referee of the juvenile court to take testimony concerning the charges therein made against the minor, and to make report to the juvenile court. During the course of the proceedings before the referee, the minor was sworn as a witness and asked certain questions, which, on the advice of counsel representing him, he refused to answer upon the ground that his answers would tend to incriminate him. At the hearing before us on this habeas corpus proceeding it was agreed by counsel on both sides that the questions which the witness refused to answer were such that answers thereto would tend to incriminate him. The referee reported to the juvenile court that the minor, when a witness before her, had refused to answer the questions so propounded to him, and set forth in her report facts tending to show the materiality of the evidence sought to be elicited from the minor by the questions that he refused to answer. Upon the hearing of the referee's report, the judge of the juvenile court instructed the minor to answer the questions. The minor continuing his refusal, upon the ground that his answers might incriminate him, the juvenile court made the following order:

"It is the order of this court that said witness, Bodo Tahbel, be committed to the custody of the superintendent of Juvenile Hall until he does answer said questions."

[1] Every person is subject to the power of the Legislature to compel him in any judicial proceeding to give testimony of any fact within his knowledge and material to the issue, except in so far as the Constitution restrains the exercise of this power, or protects the individual from compulsory compliance with its attempted exercise. The Constitution of this state has limited the extent to which the Legislature may exercise this power, and has given the individual protection against its exercise by providing, in article 1, section 13, that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

[2] According to one of the oldest maxims of the common law, "Nemo tenetur seipsum accusare," any person, whether a party or stranger to the litigation, either in a civil action or a criminal prosecution, may, if he sees fit, refuse to answer any question the answer to which, if true, will render him punishable for crime, or which, in any degree, may tend to establish a public offense with which he might be charged. Rapalje on Witnesses, § 261. This principle of the common law doubtless had its birth in the abhorrence with which confessions coerced by inquisitorial torture were regarded alike in England and America. 8 R. C. L. p. 78. Its soundness has seldom been questioned. And today it stands among the guaranties of personal liberty and security in all the Constitutions, both of England and America.

[3, 4] The words "criminal case," as used in section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution, are broader than "criminal prosecution." To bring a person within the immunity of this provision, it is not necessary that the examination of the witness should be had in the course of a criminal prosecution against him, or that a criminal proceeding should have been commenced and be actually pending. It is sufficient if there is a law creating the offense under which the witness may be prosecuted. If there is such a law, and if the witness may be indicted or otherwise prosecuted for a public offense arising out of the acts to which the examination relates, he cannot be compelled to answer in any collateral proceeding, civil or criminal, unless the law has absolutely secured him against any use in a criminal prosecution of the evidence he may give; and this can only be done by a statutory provision that, if he submits to the examination and answers the questions, he shall be exempt from criminal prosecution for any offense that may be disclosed as a consequence of his examination. Ex parte Clarke, 103 Cal. 352, 37 Pac. 230; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, 35 L. Ed. 1110; Karel v. Conlan, 155 Wis. 221, 144 N. W. 266, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 826. There has been no immunity law in this state since the repeal of section 1324 of the Penal Code that will justify a court in compelling a witness to give self-incriminatory evidence.

[6] The commitment of the witness to Juvenile Hall was therefore unlawful, unless, as suggested by counsel appearing here in opposition to the writ, justification for the detention can be found in the juvenile court law itself. After heedful consideration of all the points urged by counsel, we fail to see how the juvenile court law has attempted to, or, for that matter, could justify the commitment to Juvenile Hall solely because of the boy's refusal to answer incriminating questions.

It is suggested that a proceeding against a minor to have him adjudged a ward of the juvenile court is not a criminal proceeding, even though the violation of a penal law of the state be one of the grounds set forth in the petition therefor; that the law expressly declares that an order adjudging a minor to be a ward of the court shall in no wise be deemed to be a conviction of crime (section 5 of the act); that the proceeding is no more than one whereby it is sought to have the state, as parens patriæ, supplant the natural parent as the child's custodian; and that therefore the minor is not being prosecuted for any crime, and is in no danger of conviction of a public offense. The statute itself answers this contention. It does not follow, simply because the minor's alleged violation of a state law defining a public offense is charged against him in a petition to have him adjudged a ward of the juvenile court, that he is not also liable to criminal prosecution and to punishment as for the commission of a crime. The juvenile court law expressly declares that, if a petition be filed in the juvenile court seeking to have it adjudged that a minor be made a ward of the court because he has violated a penal law of the state, that court, at the hearing of the petition, or at any time thereafter, if it shall determine that such minor is not a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the provisions of the act, "may dismiss the petition therein, and direct that said person be prosecuted under the general law." Section 4c, Stats. 1915, p. 1228. And section 10 of the act reads:

"When any ward of the juvenile court under subdivision thirteen of section one of this act shall have been accused of a felony and no indictment or information shall have been filed, and said ward shall have been committed to either of said schools [the Whittier State School, the Preston School of Industry or the California School for Girls] and shall there prove to be incorrigible or not amenable to the discipline of the said school, and shall be returned to the custody of the juvenile court, * * * it shall be the duty of the judge of said court to sit as a committing magistrate and hold the preliminary examination of such person, and if upon said hearing he shall determine that there is probable cause to believe that the said person has committed the offense charged in the petition theretofore filed in said court, he shall hold such person to answer to the superior court, and thereupon the usual proceedings shall be had for the trial of said case in the superior court after the filing of the information in pursuance to said order of said judge sitting as a committing magistrate, and said person shall be tried by court and jury in the usual manner for the trial of a felony." Stats. 1915, pp. 1233, 1234.

But it is claimed, if we rightly understand the position of counsel appearing here in opposition to the writ, that if a minor refuse to answer a question upon the ground that he might incriminate himself, that fact alone warrants an order adjudging him to be a ward of the juvenile court, and as such amenable to an order of that court committing him to a detention home, or other suitable public institution. We have looked in vain for a provision in the juvenile court law that, by any possible stretch of the imagination might justify such contention. It would have been strange indeed if the Legislature had sought to visit a minor with the loss of his natural parents' society, guidance, and governance merely because, forsooth, he had the temerity to invoke the protection of a constitutional guaranty incorporated into the state's organic law for the very purpose of safeguarding his personal liberty against the methods that obtained when confessions were extorted by inquisitorial abuses.

It next is suggested that, if a minor has been duly adjudged to be a ward of the juvenile court, that tribunal, representing the state as parens patriæ, may, like the natural parent, compel obedience to any order, and punish for disobedience. We understand that, as yet, the minor has not been formally adjudged to be a ward of the juvenile court by a judgment wherein findings upon the jurisdictional prerequisites have been made, as contemplated by section 2 of the act. But even had such judgment been made, and the minor had become a ward of the court in the full sense of the term, the court would not, for that reason, have the power to commit the ward to a detention home merely because the boy might see fit to exercise one of his constitutional prerogatives.

It is true, the right of liberty, secured by the guaranties of state and federal Constitutions, is not that of entire unrestrainedness of action. For civil government itself implies an abridgement of natural liberty. And there are restrictions imposed upon personal liberty that spring from the helpless or dependent condition of individuals in various relations of life, among them being those of parent and child, guardian and ward, teacher and pupil. There are well-recognized powers of control in each of these relations over the actions of the child, ward, or pupil, which may be exercised. These are legal and just restraints upon personal liberty, which the welfare of society demands, and which, where there is no abuse, are entirely consistent with the constitutional guaranty of liberty. Where the restraints imposed by statute upon this class of dependents are such as are essential to the welfare of society and to the comfort and well-being of the unfortunates who come within the purview of the statute, there is no infringement of personal liberty. As we read it, the juvenile court law has not attempted to impose any unlawful restraint upon personal liberty. It is not its purpose to impose unnecessary restraint upon the unfortunates whose care it commits to the juvenile court. Much less is it its purpose to impose upon any of them a degree of restraint amounting to imprisonment in a detention home merely because the ward may have sought the protection of a constitutional guaranty. The purpose of the act is to afford a protecting hand to unfortunate boys and girls who, by reason of their own conduct, evil tendencies, or improper environment, have proven that the best interests of society, the welfare of the state, and their own good demand that the guardianship of the state be substituted for that of the natural parents. To accomplish that purpose the statute should be given a broad and liberal construction. But no construction of the act should be adopted that will cause it to clash with any of those constitutional safeguards that have been incorporated into the state's organic law for the purpose of securing to all protection against possible abuses, inquisitorial or otherwise. We are firmly convinced that the liberty of a ward of the juvenile court, restricted to a great extent, as it necessarily must be, cannot be further restrained, as, for example, by confinement in a public institution, solely and simply because the ward chooses to stand steadfastly by a right guaranteed to him by the fundamental law of the state. An order committing him to a detention home for that cause, and that cause only, is an abuse of discretion. The exercise of such a power, if sanctioned, would, in its practical effects, be tantamount to the coercion of a confession of crime. True, the design of the act is salutary, and every effort should be made to further its legitimate purposes. But never should it be made an instrument for the denial of a constitutional right, even though the person seeking refuge in the asylum afforded him by the invocation of that right be but a poor, unfortunate minor, who, by reason of his evil tendencies or improper environment, must be taken from the sole care and custody of his own natural parents and placed under the control of the court as its ward.

Finally, it is suggested that the order under which the minor is detained in Juvenile Hall is not an order adjudging him guilty of contempt. Whether the order whereby Bodo Tabbel was taken from his father's custody and deprived of his liberty by being placed in a detention home be regarded as a contempt order, or whether it be characterized by some other designation, the fact remains that this boy was taken from the custody of his parent and committed to Juvenile Hall, there to remain until he should surrender his constitutional right to refuse to give self-incriminatory evidence. Without doubt, the juvenile court, where the welfare of the minor requires it, has the power to commit a ward of the court to a detention home. But such a power, unquestionably lawful when the welfare of the child necessitates it and when its exercise is governed by a wise and sound discretion, cannot be made the pretext for the punishment of the child merely because he elects to stand upon a constitutional right. Section 9b of the act reads:

"No ward of the juvenile court as defined in this act shall be taken from the custody of his parent or legal guardian, without the consent of such parent or guardian unless the court shall find such parent or guardian to be incapable of providing or to have failed or neglected to provide proper maintenance, training and education for said person; or unless said person has been tried on probation in said custody and has failed to reform, or unless said person has been convicted of crime by a jury; or unless the court shall find that the welfare of said person requires that his custody be taken from said parent or guardian."

The welfare of a ward does not require that his custody be taken from his natural parent or guardian simply because he has invoked the protecting Ægis of the Constitution.

The commitment to the juvenile hall was illegal; and the minor should be discharged from detention therein.

It is so ordered.

RIVERSIDE PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. MARYLAND CASUALTY CO.
(Civ. 3191.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 11, 1919. Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank, Denying Hearing, April 7, 1920.)

1. Notaries §11—No damages for default of notary unless proximate cause of loss.

No recovery can be had upon the bond of a notary public unless the default of the notary was the proximate cause of loss, under Pol. Code, § 801, and wrongful act of the notary in certifying to a justification to a contractor's bond, which was blank when signed by sureties, could not have been the proximate cause of loss to third persons furnishing material to the contractor on the faith of the bond.

2. Alteration of Instruments §12—Principal and surety §46—Implied authorization to fill blanks; noncompliance with law as to justification did not release sureties.

If sureties signed a bond and justified without the amounts being filled in, they consented by implication that the blanks might be filled; and, if the blanks were later filled in, they were estopped as against those who, in good faith, supplied materials to the contractors, to object to the sufficiency of the bond because of their failure to comply with the law regarding justification.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Notaries §11—Finding that furnishers of material relied on notarial certificate to bond not sustained.

Where the evidence showed that furnishers of material inspected the record for information as to who the sureties were upon the contractor's bond, and relied upon the bond only in connection with an independent investigation of their worth and financial standing, a finding that such materialmen relied upon the notary's certificate attached to the justification in extending credit was not supported, and wrongful act of the notary in making such certificate to the justification of the sureties, sureties having signed in blank without knowledge of the amount involved, could not have been the proximate cause of loss to the materialmen.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Riverside Portland Cement Company against the Maryland Casualty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John Murray Marshall and James S. Bennett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, and Alex. Macdonald, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Maryland Casualty Company, a corporation, from a judgment against it as surety upon, and in the full amount of, the official bond of C. B. Davis, a notary public.

E. P. Hunziker and E. C. A. Berger, as contractors, were about to erect a seven-story, reinforced concrete hotel building for C. W. Howard, the ostensible owner. Before the contract for the work had been signed, Hunziker took Davis, the notary, to his home, where he asked his wife, Josephine Hunziker, and his mother-in-law, Mary W. Crutsinger, to sign the printed form of bond to laborers and materialmen, attached to the contract. At the instance of Hunziker the women affixed their signatures to the purported bond, and to the affidavit attached, in the presence of Davis. He did not swear the signers to the truth of the contents of the affidavit, but, according to the findings, at his direction they "did raise their right hands and swear to their signatures, said bond being then blank as to amount." Hunziker then took the blank form away with him and delivered it to a man named Paden, who was the real owner of the property on which the building was to be erected.

Subsequently, at Paden's direction the blank spaces in the bond were filled in by typewriting, the amount of the bond being specified as $35,000. The contract and bond were then filed, in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, the bond bearing the certificate of the notary, Davis, given and made under the official seal of his office, and which read as follows:

"State of California, County of ——— ss.:

"Mary W. Crutsinger and Josephine Hunziker, the sureties whose names are subscribed to the above undertaking, being severally duly sworn, each for himself, says, that he is a resident and freeholder in said county and state, and is worth the sum in the said undertaking specified as the penalty thereof, over and above all his just debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution.

"Mary W. Crutsinger. [Seal.]

"Josephine Hunziker. [Seal.]

"Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 17th day of September, 1914. C. B. Davis, Notary Public in and for the County of ———, State of California. [Notarial Seal.]"

During the erection of the building plaintiff furnished to the contractors, Hunziker and Berger, cement used in the construction, to the value of $4,567, after deducting all credits. Plaintiff's assignor, the Trussed Concrete Steel Company, furnished column hooping and ceiling mesh to the value of $4,012.07, less credits and offsets. The contractors paid neither of these amounts, and the parties so furnishing materials duly filed their claims of lien for the respective sums due. The Trussed Concrete Steel Company then commenced an action to foreclose its lien, naming as defendants the ostensible owner Howard, who signed the contract, the contractors Hunziker and Berger, Mrs. Hunziker and Mrs. Crutsinger, the sureties on the bond. The plaintiff here, as a defendant and cross-complainant, filed a cross-complaint against all the parties to foreclose its lien, and for a money judgment against the contractors, Hunziker and Berger, said Mrs. Hunziker and Mrs. Crutsinger, on the said contractors' bond.

A decree of foreclosure was denied both the plaintiff, and its assignor here, in said action because of the fact the rights of both, under their respective liens, had been foreclosed and lost under a prior deed of trust of the property to other parties. Judgment was entered in the action in favor of each claimant, however, against the contractors and Mrs. Hunziker and Mrs. Crutsinger, on the bond, in favor of the plaintiff for $4,567, with interest, and in favor of the steel company for $1,614.48, with interest. These judgments have not been paid, or satisfied, and are the basis of this action against the surety on the bond of the notary, Davis.

The lower court found that in furnishing these materials the parties relied upon the certificate of the notary, Davis, that Mrs. Crutsinger and Mrs. Hunziker had severally made the statement to him, under oath, that they were each worth the sum of $35,000, the amount specified in the bond when filed, and had made the other statements certified to. The court further found that the contractors, and Mrs. Crutsinger and Mrs. Hunziker, their sureties, were insolvent at the time Davis made his certificate, and have been ever since. It therefore concluded that, because of the making of the false certificate by the notary, the plaintiff, and its assignor, had been damaged in the amount of their respective unpaid claims, and ordered judgment against the surety on the notary bond.

Appellant specifies a number of particulars in which it asserts the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. Upon the whole record we seriously doubt the correctness of the lower court's finding that in furnishing the materials to the contractors, the plaintiff and its assignor relied upon the certificate to the bond. The real fact, as shown by the evidence, is that they inspected the record "for information" as to who the sureties were, and "relied upon the bond" only in connection with an independent investigation of their worth and financial standing. However, whether the findings are supported or not, the conclusions reached by the trial court are erroneous, and the judgment must be reversed.

[1] In an action such as this it must appear that the default of the notary was the proximate cause of the loss, or there can be no recovery. 20 R. C. L. 336; Am. Security Co. v. First Nat. Bank (Ala.) 82 South. 429; Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 77, 82, 22 Pac. 979. The Code declares that—

"For the official misconduct or neglect of a notary public, he and the sureties on his official bond are liable to the parties injured thereby for all the damages sustained." Pol. Code, § 801.

But it is clear that no action will lie to recover damages if no damages have been sustained. McAllister v. Clement, 75 Cal. 182, 184, 16 Pac. 775. Assuming, therefore, that the findings, aside from mere conclusions, are true, plaintiff and its assignor suffered no loss by reason of any act on the part of Davis, the notary, for which his surety is liable. Even though the certificate had spoken truthfully, instead of being false, the position of the respondent would not have been improved thereby.

[2] If the sureties on the bond were insolvent all the time, that undertaking was no protection to the persons it was supposed to secure, and no infirmity in its due execution rendered it less valuable. McAllister v. Clement, supra; Heidt v. Minor, 89 Cal. 115, 121, 26 Pac. 627. On the other hand, if the sureties were financially sound they could not escape liability upon their undertaking by reason of the irregularity in the execution of the bond. Having signed and delivered it to Hunziker, knowing that there were blanks therein, the sureties consented by implication that the blanks might be filled, and were estopped from questioning its due execution as against those who, in good faith, supplied materials to the contractors. Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 617, 621, 35 Pac. 328. It did not lie in the mouth of the sureties to object to the sufficiency of the bond because of any failure on their part to comply with the provision of the law regarding justification. Moffat v. Greenwalt, 90 Cal. 368, 371, 27 Pac. 296; Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 669, 61 Pac. 369. There was nothing in the act of the notary to prevent, and, as already stated, the materialmen did obtain, judgment against the sureties on the bond, on which they are now seeking to recover against the surety of the notary.

Consequently the finding, or, more correctly speaking, the conclusion of the lower court that the plaintiff and its assignor were damaged by the act of the notary, is without support.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KNIGHT, Judge pro tem.

Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. On application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1.

[3] From an inspection of the record it seems clear that, as suggested by the District Court of Appeal in its opinion, there is not sufficient support in the evidence for the conclusion that plaintiff or its assignor relied upon the affidavit attached to the bond in extending credit, and that, as said by the District Court of Appeal:

"The real fact, as shown by the evidence, is that they inspected the record for information as to who the sureties were, and relied upon the bond only in connection with an independent investigation of their worth and financial standing."

This being the situation, the finding substantially to the effect that the plaintiff and his assignor relied in giving credit upon such affidavit and the certificate of the notary that the same had been subscribed and sworn to before him is not sufficiently sustained by the evidence, with the result that the matter complained of was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's loss. In so far as the opinion of the District Court of Appeal holds or implies that the notary's default could not be the proximate cause of the loss, notwithstanding reliance is placed on the affidavit and notary's certificate in extending credit, we withhold our approval, without expressing any opinion thereon, and leaving the matter open for determination on the new trial.

ROSSINI v. SECURITY MUT. FIRE INS. CO. OF CHATFIELD, MINN.
(Civ. 2658.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 22, 1920. On Modification of Opinion, April 7, 1920.)

1. Insurance ☞ 665(4)—Evidence held to show that explosion occurred during and after commencement of fire.

In an action on fire policy defended on ground that the damage was caused by an explosion and not a fire and therefore was not covered by policy, evidence held to sustain finding that the explosion occurred during the fire and after the commencement thereof.

2. Insurance ☞ 421—Fire the proximate cause of loss where explosion occurs during fire.

Where explosion occurred during and after commencement of fire, the fire was the direct and proximate cause of the loss, and the explosion merely the result of and an incident of the fire.

3. Insurance §624(1)—Insured may sue on policy notwithstanding assignment of money due for purpose of collection.

Insured's assignment of sum due under policy merely for collection, where no adjustment is to be made without his consent, did not preclude him from bringing action on policy; he being the real party in interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Edward Rossini against the Security Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Chatfield, Minn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman, of Santa Monica, for appellant.

Carter & Torchia, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover upon a policy of fire insurance which covered plaintiff's building and contents consisting, among other things, of a stock of merchandise, and all of which is alleged to have been totally destroyed by fire.

Judgment went for plaintiff as prayed for, and defendant appeals.

[1, 2] The policy contained a clause that "this company will not be liable for loss (unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind," and availing itself of this provision defendant alleged the destruction of the property was the result of the explosion of a bomb or other explosive substance the nature of which was unknown to defendant. The finding of the court, made in response to the issue, is to the effect that, while there was an explosion, it did not precede the fire, but occurred during the fire and after the commencement thereof and while the building and its contents were in process of destruction by the conflagration. Appellant attacks this finding and insists that "in our testimony we have eliminated every possibility of fire preceding the explosion." It conclusively appears from the testimony of the only witness having knowledge of the fact that, upon going out on his porch, he saw the building was on fire, that he ran back into the house to get his hat, and while in the house he heard the explosion. Other than the fact that the front of the building and some of the merchandise were blown into the street and several hours thereafter found scorched and burned, the record discloses absolutely nothing tending in the slightest degree to overcome this direct testimony. The contention as to insufficiency of evidence to support the finding of which appellant complains is wholly without merit; indeed, the testimony upon which the court based the finding is without conflict. This being true, the explosion must be deemed the result of and an incident of the fire which was the direct and proximate cause of the loss. German American Ins. Co. v. Hyman, 42 Colo. 156, 94 Pac. 27, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 77; Clement on Fire Insurance, vol. 1, p. 123.

[3] While not pleaded, it was on the trial made to appear that after the fire plaintiff made an assignment of the sum due under the policy to a third person, by reason of which fact appellant insists that, having parted with all his right in the policy, he was thereby precluded from maintaining this action. Reference to this assignment shows that it was made to the assignee as plaintiff's agent merely for collection of the insurance money, as to which, however, no adjustment was to be made without plaintiff's approval. By such assignment the assignee acquired no personal interest in the benefits to be derived by the collection, and hence plaintiff, being the real party in interest, did not lose his right to sue upon the policy. Moreover, it also appears from the record, to which counsel for appellant makes no reference, that prior to the commencement of the action Jordan, to whom the plaintiff had made the assignment, executed a document reciting that the assignment so made to him was for the purpose of collection only, and whereas he was unable to collect the same, he thereby reassigned to plaintiff the said policy of insurance and all moneys due thereunder.

No grounds other than the alleged errors discussed are urged by appellant for a reversal. It is apparent not only from the record, but from counsel's argument, that the appeal was not had in good faith, but merely for the purpose of delaying plaintiff in the collection of a righteous judgment. For this reason there is imposed upon defendant a penalty of $50, the same to be paid to plaintiff as part of the cost on appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Good cause appearing therefor, it is hereby ordered that the opinion in the above-entitled cause be and the same is hereby modified by striking therefrom the following:

In re CAMPBELL'S ESTATE.

TUCKER et al. v. CAMPBELL et al.

(Civ. 2059.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1920.)

1. Trial $\S$ 165.—On motion for nonsuit all of plaintiff's testimony must be assumed to be true.

A motion for nonsuit presents for decision a question of law and in effect amounts to a demurrer to the evidence, and necessarily assumes the truth of all the testimony presented in behalf of plaintiff.

2. Wills $\S$ 324(1) — In determining whether will contest should be submitted to jury all inferences are in favor of contestants.

In determining whether or not, in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by contestants is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury, the same rules apply as in civil cases, and every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proven in contestants' favor.

3. Trial $\S$ 139(1)—Wills $\S$ 324(1)—Rule as to sufficiency of evidence where motion made for nonsuit after close of testimony stated.

The rule governing the determination whether a nonsuit should be granted in a given case does not always apply with the same strictness where the motion is made after both plaintiff and defendant, or, in case of the contest of a will, both contestant and proponent, have presented their evidence, and it is not error to grant the motion where it is clear that if a jury should bring in a judgment against the defendant it would be the court's duty to set it aside.

4. Wills $\S$ 52(1)—In action to revoke probate of will burden of proof of incapacity on contestant.

In a proceeding to revoke a probate of a will on the ground of testamentary incapacity, the burden is upon contestants to overcome the effect of the primary presumption of testamentary capacity, and also of the order involving an adjudication upon presumptively sufficient evidence that deceased was mentally competent, and to show that he was of such sound and disposing mind.

5. Wills $\S$ 53(2)—Condition of testator's mind before and after making will is admissible to show testamentary capacity.

Where a will is attacked on the ground that testator did not have mental capacity, evidence of the condition of his mind both before and subsequent to the date of the testamentary act is always admissible as having a tendency to show what the condition of his mind was at the date of the making of the will.

6. Wills $\S$ 324(2)—Evidence as to testator's want of capacity held insufficient to go to jury.

In an action to revoke a probate of a will on the ground of mental incapacity, evidence showing that testator was 83 years old, had been long addicted to the use of intoxicants, and had often been ill, held insufficient to warrant the submission to the jury of the issue of want of capacity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Proceedings by Katherine C. Tucker and others against Robert W. Campbell, as executor of the last will and testament of Robert Campbell, deceased, and others, to revoke the probate of decedent's will. From a judgment of nonsuit contestants appeal. Affirmed.

George E. Gardner and James A. McGregor, both of Oroville, and Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. E. Duncan, Jr., and Alta Duncan, both of Oroville, for respondents.

HART, J. On the 21st day of May, 1917, the will of Robert Campbell, deceased, was admitted to probate in the superior court of Butte county and letters testamentary were issued to Robert W. Campbell, as executor. On the 30th of May, following, the above-named contestants commenced these proceedings by filing their petitions praying for the revocation of said will on the ground that the deceased was, at the time of the making of the purported will, without testamentary capacity by reason of mental unsoundness. Issue was joined by the filing of answers by the proponents and the trial commenced, before a jury, on October 8, 1918. After the introduction of testimony on behalf of both contestants and proponents the latter moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and judgment was entered dismissing the action of the contestants. The appeal is by contestants from the order granting the nonsuit and from the judgment.

The contestants and the proponents, with the exception of Sallie Moore, are nieces and nephews of the deceased and are legatees under the will; the sums bequeathed to the contestants varying from $10 to $1,000. The decedent left no wife or children, and the value of his estate was $117,000. After the payment of the legacies mentioned in the will the residue of the estate was left to Robert W. Campbell. The will in question was dated January 13, 1917, and the testator died on April 25, 1917, aged 83 years. The will consisted of six pages, each of which was signed by the testator, in addition to the signature at the bottom of the instrument, which was attested by two witnesses.

It is stated in appellants' brief that the testimony on behalf of proponents "does not appear in the engrossed bill of exceptions, for the reason that none of it was material on a determination of the correctness of the court's ruling on the motion of the proponents herein," and in respondents' brief it is stated: "At the conclusion of the contestants' case a motion for nonsuit was made and granted."

No findings were made, but among the recitals of the judgment is the following:

"The contestants introduced evidence, oral and documentary, in support of their petition for the revocation of the probate of the last will and testament of Robert Campbell, deceased. At the conclusion of the contestants' case, the proponents introduced evidence, oral and documentary, in support of the allegations of their answer. At the conclusion of proponents' case, counsel for proponents moved that the court grant a nonsuit and dismiss the action on the ground that the contestants had failed to prove the allegations of their contest or their petition for the revocation of the probate of the last will and testament of Robert Campbell, deceased, and that the contestants had * * * in particular failed to produce sufficient or any evidence to show that Robert Campbell, the testator, was, at the time of the making of said will, or at any other time, of unsound mind, or that said will was executed while said testator was of unsound mind."

The contention on this appeal is, of course, that the motion for a nonsuit was erroneously granted; the appellants claiming that the testimony presented by them was sufficient to compel the submission of the case to the jury. There was a large amount of testimony submitted by contestants, but we will refer in a general way only to so much of the testimony as we conceive bears directly or reflects any light upon the question at issue.

[1] It is thoroughly settled, as counsel for appellants declare, that a motion for a nonsuit presents for decision a question of law. Such a motion in effect amounts to a demurrer to the evidence, and therefore necessarily assumes the truth of all the testimony presented in behalf of the plaintiff. As was said in Mitchell v. Brown, 18 Cal. App. 117, 122 Pac. 426:

"On a motion for a nonsuit on the close of plaintiff's case, the court is compelled to assume the truth of all of the testimony produced by plaintiff. The question of the credibility * * * or the weight of the evidence cannot under such circumstances arise. In fine, as we have * * * already in effect pointed out, the line of distinction between the power of the court when considering the evidence on a motion for a nonsuit on the close of plaintiff's case and the power vested in it when considering the evidence upon the merits is that, in the former case, a pure question of law is submitted for the court's decision, and there is therefore no discretion in the court to pass upon the credibility of the witnesses for plaintiff or the probative value of the testimony produced by plaintiff, while, in the latter case, a question of fact is submitted to the court, it then being called upon to determine whether the issue has been established by the proofs, and the court, like a jury where the issues of fact are so tried, may then weigh the testimony and to that end pass upon the credibility of the witnesses and, finally, conclusively determine the truth as to the ultimate fact."

[2] In Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 586, 82 Pac. 252, 253, Mr. Justice Shaw, of our Supreme Court said:

"In determining whether or not in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by the contestants is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury the same rules apply as in civil cases. Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the contestants. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the contestants. All the evidence in favor of the contestants must be taken as true, and if contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of the contestants all the facts necessary to make out their case, they are entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on its merits. Vermont, etc., Co. v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, 67 Pac. 1057; Freese v. Hibernia Sav. and L. Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; Hanley v. California, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 237, 59 Pac. 577; Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 522, 59 Pac. 937; Goldstone v. Merchants, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; Pacific M. L. I. Co. v. Fisher, 119 Cal. 566, 42 Pac. 134; O'Connor v. Hooper, 102 Cal. 528, 36 Pac. 939; 2 Deering's Dig. p. 2105."

By the rules above stated we must be guided in determining whether the evidence presented by the contestants is of such a character in probative effect as to have justified the trial court in holding, as a matter of law, that it was insufficient to warrant, legitimately, any inference that the testator, at the time of making the testament in question, was without testamentary capacity.

[3] Although the judgment of nonsuit recites that the motion for a nonsuit was made and granted after the proponents had introduced testimony in rebuttal of the showing made by the contestants, the state of the record before us is such that we are required to predicate our conclusion here solely upon the testimony as presented by the contestants, since, for some reason, the testimony introduced by the proponents has not been brought up to this court. We must assume, therefore, that the motion was based entirely upon such proof as was made by the contestants. In this connection, it may be suggested that the rule governing the determination of the question whether a nonsuit should or should not be granted in a given case does not always apply with the same strictness where the motion is made after both the plaintiff and the defendant, or, in the case of the contest of a will, both the contestant and the proponent, have presented their evidence; in other words, after the evidence on both sides is all in. In Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 507, 82 Pac. 57, 61, this proposition is thus stated:

"With regard to the granting of a motion for nonsuit made at the close of the evidence for plaintiff and defendant, the rule seems to be well established that the trial court has discretion, and that it is not error to grant the motion where, upon all the evidence, it is clear that if a jury should bring in a verdict against the defendant it would be the duty of the court to set it aside, and order a new trial."

See, also, Geary v. Simmons, 39 Cal. 224; Vanderford v. Foster, 65 Cal. 49, 2 Pac. 736; Fagundes v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 79 Cal. 100, 21 Pac. 437, 3 L. R. 824; Fox v. Southern Pacific Co., 95 Cal. 234, 30 Pac. 384; Toulouse v. Pare, 103 Cal. 251, 37 Pac. 146.

In view of the rule as applied under such circumstances, it may also be suggested that had the testimony presented by the proponents in opposition to that of the contestants been incorporated into this record and thus duly certified to this court, it is probable that we would have been compelled to hold, even if the testimony of the contestants were stronger than as we view it as tending to show the testamentary incompetency of the testator at the time he executed the testament in question, that the order granting the nonsuit involved only the exercise of a discretion with which this court is not legally authorized to interfere. Thus the labor of this court would perhaps have been greatly lessened. We may further add that if the testimony of the proponents possessed any evidentiary value whatever in opposition to or rebuttal of that presented by the contestants, we are at a loss to understand why it was not brought here, duly authenticated. But, however all this may be, we are still of the opinion that the court below committed no error in granting the nonsuit.

[4] The contestants launched their attack against the validity of the will because of the alleged mental incompetency of the testator to make such disposition of his property and estate in the face of the presumption that the testator was of sound and disposing mind at the time he executed the challenged testament. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that this proceeding does not involve a contest of a petition for the probate of the will, but an attack upon the order by the court admitting the will to probate. That order was made presumptively upon evidence showing that the testator, at the time he made the will, was of sound and disposing mind; that is, that he was possessed of testamentary capacity. Indeed, by its order (which is, of course, in the record) the court expressly found that deceased was of sound and disposing mind and therefore mentally capable, at the time of the execution of the will, of disposing of his estate by testament. It follows that the burden was upon the contestants to overcome the effect of the primary presumption of the testamentary capacity of the deceased and also of the order involving an adjudication, upon presumptively sufficient evidence to justify it, that the deceased was mentally competent to make a will at the date of the execution of the instrument whose legality is under attack here, and to show that he was not of such sound and disposing mind. Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 190, 81 Pac. 534.

[5] The testimony presented by the contestants does not, in our opinion, necessarily show or tend to show that the deceased was not mentally capable of making a will at the time that he made the will in question. It is not necessary that we should enter herein upon an analysis of the testimony to establish this conclusion. A general reference to it will be sufficient. Much of the testimony relates to acts and conduct by the deceased long anterior to the date of the execution of the instrument, and some of it relates to certain acts which occurred after the will was made and when the deceased was ill and under the care of a nurse. Of course, evidence of the condition of the testator's mind, both before and subsequent to the date of the testamentary act, is always admissible as having a tendency to show what the condition of his mind was at the date of the making of the will; but it does not always follow, from the fact that a person may, before and after the purported execution of his last will and testament, display some mental peculiarities or idiosyncracies which have not always been in his lifetime characteristic of him or which have not been exhibited by him when he has been in what may be supposed to have been the normal state of his mind, that he is incapable, mentally, of exercising a sound will and judgment in disposing of his estate by testament. Such testimony is, of course, important in the determination of such an issue as is presented here, but it must be of such character and force as very clearly to show that the unusual peculiarities which have invaded the mentality of the person are the result of the complete alienation of reason and the consequent incapacity to exercise the will in such manner as to enable him to do those things with respect to the highest concerns of life which, in his normal mind, he would want and desire to do. There must be shown a dethronement of reason and the total loss of ability to guide the will so that its expression will harmonize with the desire and intent of a testator when mentally in a condition of sanity. It is not true in every case that an aberrated mind is wholly incapable of forming and expressing a sane and sound intent founded in a sane and sound will. But it is often true that one with a defective memory, who cannot readily recognize old friends or recall happenings, even those of more or less importance, with which he has been associated in his lifetime, is not bereft of testamentary capacity. Indeed, one of the characteristics of old age is forgetfulness or lapses of memory, and yet from the fact that an aged person may be afflicted with these mental shortcomings it does not follow that he is incapable properly of attending to his business or of disposing by testament of his estate according to the course he wishes it to take.

The situation in this case as it is disclosed by the testimony is simply this: That the deceased had been for many years a heavy drinker of intoxicating liquors, and during the latter years of his life drank such liquors to excess; that he was a very old man when he made his will and that he was feeble physically; that on occasions he was so ill as to be compelled to take to his bed, the cause of such illness, it is to be inferred from the evidence, being the excessive use of alcoholic liquors; that he could not readily remember old acquaintances when their names were mentioned to him or when they met and greeted him, and in this connection it is to be said that the testimony shows that in almost all instances where he displayed a defective memory in that particular he would, after some reflection, remember the friends referred to; that he often spoke of the Bible and would ask his friends if they thought he was saved, and would cry very often. There is nothing in the facts thus mentioned which are necessarily inconsistent with the adjudication previously made that he was, when he made his will, of sound and disposing mind in a testamentary sense. There is, in short, as we view it, nothing in the testimony which legitimately warrants the inference that the testator was, when he made his will, wanting in testamentary capacity. His feeble physical condition and his defective memory were no doubt due to the joint effect of excessive drinking and to the ravages of old age. He was undoubtedly physically infirm and feeble and his mentality not as firm and strong as in his younger years, and when this is said all that the testimony shows and every legitimate inference it warrants are stated. Some of the witnesses, it is true, expressed the opinion that he was of unsound mind, but their opinions were expressly planted upon the proposition that he was old, had been a heavy drinker, and that his physical health was impaired. The opinion of a witness that a person is of unsound mind can be no stronger than, or of superior evidentiary weight to, the reasons upon which he bases his opinion. No one will say that it is true, as an abstract proposition, that merely because a person is aged and uses intoxicating liquors in an excessive degree he is insane in the sense or to the extent that he is incapable of attending to his business intelligently or of disposing of his estate by testament according to his wishes in that regard.

But there is some testimony from which the inference that he was not of unsound mind at the times to which the witnesses referred is positively justifiable. One witness, who was an old acquaintance of the deceased said that he had often seen the latter under the influence of intoxicating liquor act like any person in a state of intoxication from drinking such liquors, but that he could not say that deceased was crazy or of unsound mind. A niece of the deceased (Mrs. Lee) testified that there were periods during his illness when his mind was clear on "little everyday topics." The nurse who attended deceased during his illness in 1915 said that deceased suffered from physical ailments and had been under a doctor's care for some time; that he seemed like a man "about half sick"; that he would talk of matters which had happened many years previously, but that current matters "slipped his mind. He often told the same story over again," she said. "But," she added, "a great many old people do that." She said that when she went to deceased's house to nurse him the doctor said to her that deceased "was getting over a big drunk." Another circumstance showing that deceased was not only not insane at the time of the happening of said circumstance but of keen intelligence was when the deceased explained to the witness Strang, an employé of the Western Pacific Company, how he (Strang) could take a drink from a flask of whisky which he (deceased) had in his possession while Strang was engaged in performing his duties at the depot of said company without being detected in the act by the foreman or other employé under whom he was working; Strang having said to the deceased, when the latter invited him to drink from the flask, that it was against the rules of the company for employés to drink intoxicants while on duty. All this testimony tended to show, not only that the deceased was of such sound mentality as that he was competent to make a will and so dispose of his property as his heart's desire dictated, but that his indisposition physically and mentally at the times referred to by the witnesses was merely the effect of overindulgence in alcoholic liquors and that, if at times from said cause he was not entirely responsible mentally, he still often had rational moments and was capable of discussing current topics.

There are still other considerations which tend to show that at the time he made his will the deceased knew perfectly well what he was doing. He was a bachelor and had no direct heirs. The principal beneficiary of his bounty was his nephew, and the contestants were also nephews and nieces (one a cousin) in kin. Each of those he mentioned by name in his will, giving to each a legacy of more or less importance in value. It is thus to be seen that he had in memory when he made his will all his relatives who are interested enough in his estate to attempt to void the testament. It will also be observed that his testamentary disposition of his estate is not an unnatural one, as he gave it entirely to his kinspeople by blood. Another fact of some significance to which attention may be directed is that the instrument consisted of six pages of writing and that he subscribed his name to each of the pages thereof, thus making certain what his intent was as to each bequest and devise. The following cases will be found, upon comparison, to be very near the instant case as to the general features thereof: In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 22, 30 Pac. 101; Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 361, 62 Pac. 605; In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794; Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 527, 129 Pac. 778; In re Langford, 108 Cal. 613, 41 Pac. 701; Estate of MacCrellish, 167 Cal. 713, 141 Pac. 257, L. R. A. 1915A, 443; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 666, 164 Pac. 1110; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 301, 128 Pac. 932; Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 168, 113 Pac. 130; In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 271, 49 Pac. 172, 711; Estate of Carithers, 156 Cal. 423, 105 Pac. 127.

[6] But we have pressed the inquiry far enough. As above stated, the testimony to which we have herein made a brief and fair reference speaks for itself, and, while it affords the inference that deceased at the times referred to by the witnesses often used intoxicating liquors to an excessive degree, and was frequently ill, perhaps from the use of such liquors and his venerable years, there is nothing in the testimony to indicate that his mental condition was impaired when he was not under a state of intoxication. There is no evidence that he was not sober and perfectly rational at the time he made the will. Estate of Fraser, 177 Cal. 266, 170 Pac. 601. See, also, Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 562, 69 Pac. 294, and other cases cited in the opinion in the Fraser Case. We therefore repeat that we do not think that the case as made by the contestants should have been submitted to the jury, particularly in view of the proposition that the deceased had previously been judicially declared, upon evidence presumptively sufficient to support the adjudication, to be of mental soundness when he executed the will and so possessed of testamentary capacity.

In concluding, it is not improper to say that we are informed by the briefs that the contest had once before been tried and a verdict rendered in favor of the contestants, but that the trial court granted a new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. And in the present case the trial court (presided over by a different judge) declared, in a written opinion supporting its decision in granting the motion here complained of, and which opinion is printed in the brief of respondent, that upon the whole testimony it would grant a new trial if the case were given to the jury and a verdict for contestants returned. These matters are, of course, de hors the record, but we present them as showing that the two different judges who presided at the two different trials of this contest were of the same opinion as to the effect of the evidence presented by the contestants in support of their contest, and that it is not probable that a different result would be reached if the case were sent back for trial on the merits.

The judgment is affirmed.

PASADENA TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. BRYSON. (Civ. 3148.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 30, 1920. Rehearing Denied April 29, 1920; Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1920.)

1. Evidence — 269(3), 313—Written declarations competent to prove intent, but not delivery.

Written declarations by a deceased husband on envelopes containing securities which had been his separate property to the effect that the securities therein were the sole property of his wife are competent to prove intent to make a gift of the securities, but insufficient to show a completed gift by delivery of the securities.

2. Husband and wife — 49½(7)—Fact that donee is wife does not rebut presumption of title from possession.

The fact that the donee of securities was the wife of donor does not rebut the presumption of ownership arising under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, from exclusive possession of property.

3. Husband and wife — 49½(8) — Evidence held to show a valid gift to wife.

Where after the death of a wife securities were found in her safety deposit box bearing written declarations by her husband, who died three years before she did, that they were her sole property, and the securities had never been listed as part of the husband's estate, the facts, and the presumption, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, against a wrongful act, establish a valid gift to the wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Pasadena Trust & Savings Bank, as administrator of the estate of Frank E. Clark, deceased, against Frank Bryson, as administrator of the estate of Margaret T. Clark, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant.

Frank E. Clark and Margaret T. Clark were husband and wife. The husband died in June, 1911, and the wife three years later. Upon the death of the wife certain securities were found in a safe deposit box containing effects of the latter. The securities were contained in envelopes which bore indorsements thereon signed by the husband, who, as has been noted, had died three years previous. No administration had been had of the husband's estate prior to the 29th of September, 1915, when petition for letters of administration was filed, and thereafter the plaintiff here was appointed administrator. Besides his wife, Frank E. Clark left only one heir, to wit, a sister. There are no surviving heirs of Margaret T. Clark. In this action it was declared in the complaint that the bonds found to have been in the possession of Margaret T. Clark after her death were property of the estate of Frank E. Clark, and judgment was sought determining them so to be. These bonds were found in four envelopes. The envelopes bore indorsements over the admitted signature of Frank E. Clark, and the indorsements concluded in the respective instances with the following words:

(1) "The above bonds are and long have been the exclusive property of my wife."

(2) "These bonds are and always have been the property of my wife Margaret T. Clark. They represent unpaid coupons attached to the company's 1st mtge. formerly owned by said Margaret T. Clark."

(3) "The above bonds are and long have been the sole and exclusive property of my wife, Margaret T. Clark."

(4) "These bonds are and always have been the exclusive property of my wife, Margaret T. Clark. They were issued to replace a similar number of the company's original 6% bonds that I gave said Margaret T. Clark about eight years ago."

The finding made by the trial judge upon the important issue presented by the pleadings was that the securities belonged to Margaret T. Clark at the time of her death, and that she, "long prior to the death of said Frank E. Clark, became the owner, in possession of, and entitled to the possession of said property"; "that at the time of her death said property was the separate property of said Margaret T. Clark." A further finding, which seems to be justified by an admission in the pleadings, was made as follows:

"That prior to the time the same became the property of said Margaret T. Clark the same had been the separate property of Frank E. Clark, and the same had been delivered to him as a part of his share of the estate of his mother, Emily D. Clark."

[1] There was no evidence submitted to the court expressly showing when, if at all, the securities were delivered by the husband to the wife; there was no testimony showing that the securities were in the possession of the husband at the time of his death, so that the case must be determined upon the evidence of the indorsements appearing upon the envelopes and the fact that the securities were found in a deposit box belonging to Margaret T. Clark after the latter's death. There is the added fact to be taken notice of that three years had elapsed after the death of the husband before the decease of the wife, and that these securities had never been accounted for as a part of the estate of the husband, and no administration of the latter's estate had been made. The case, as presented by the briefs, assumes that, if Margaret T. Clark obtained title to these securities, she did so by way of gift from her husband. It is not contended that the indorsements made by the husband affirming title to be in his wife are sufficient of themselves to determine the question of ownership. That such declarations are competent to prove the intent of the donor is not questioned (Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867; Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269); that they are insufficient to establish delivery, that essential element of a completed gift, is denied. Each of these assertions seems to be a correct statement of the law.

[2] Section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure enumerates certain disputable presumptions which are to be indulged in some circumstances. One is that things which a person possesses are presumed to be owned by him; another is that a person is presumed to be the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it; a third is that a person is presumed to be innocent of a crime or a wrong. It is admitted that as between strangers the presumption of ownership arising from possession is sufficient to establish the fact of ownership unless overcome by other proof; in other words, that the judgment of the court in this case would be amply supported, except for the single fact that Margaret T. Clark was the widow of Frank E. Clark; that because of this relation the presumption would not apply; and that, if anything, the contrary presumption would obtain. We think it not correct to say that the circumstance of the relation of husband and wife, with its confidential incidents, deprives either party to the marriage of the right to rely upon the presumption of possession as indicative of title. The question in such cases is an open one dependent upon the particular facts presented. The case of Chambers v. McCreery, 106 Fed. 364, 45 C. C. A. 322, cited by the appellant, was a case where the evidence affirmatively showed that a safe deposit box in which the property in dispute was found had been one used in common between the husband and wife, each having access thereto. In that case, therefore, the fact of exclusive possession in the one party was not shown; hence no case was presented to which the presumption of ownership could properly apply. Humble v. Gay, 168 Cal. 516, 143 Pac. 773, was a case where the evidence showed only a written offer to make a gift, and showed further that there had been neither acceptance nor possession taken of the property by the intended donee.

[3] Here, not only was the exclusive possession found to be in the wife, but further there were the written declarations of the husband affirming that the wife owned the property, and still further the fact that for three years she held possession of these securities and no accounting was made as that the property belonged to the estate of the husband. The withholding of such property, had there not been a completed gift prior to the death of Clark, would have been a wrong, and such will not be presumed to have been committed by the wife; rather the contrary, as is declared by the provisions of section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure. We think that to hold in a case illustrated by the facts here presented that no presumption of ownership attached to the established possession of the wife would be to announce a harsh rule, and one which, in justice, should not be enforced.

In reviewing this case we have pointed to the findings which were most vital to the controversy and summed up all of the evidence which, to our minds, is material to the main issue. There are other findings which might be discussed, especially that referring to the alleged fact that the wife, prior to her death, converted the securities (that being a questionable finding on the evidence), but we think it unnecessary to give particular consideration to those matters. The correctness of the finding adverted to would be immaterial in the view we take of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re LITTLE'S ESTATE.

SPARLING v. STEPHENS et al
(Civ. 2062.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 3, 1920.)

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 139(1)—Nonsuit only where no evidence sufficient to support verdict for plaintiff.

A nonsuit may be granted only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which he is legally entitled and indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given.

2. Wills $\hookrightarrow$ 50—Testamentary capacity exists in one capable of understanding acts, property, relationships, and objects of bounty.

One able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property and his relation to his relatives and those around him with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he has been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he is doing, and the relation in which he stands to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, has the capacity to make a will.

3. Wills $\hookrightarrow$ 324(2)—Lack of testamentary capacity not shown.

In a contest of a will held that it was not error to take the question of mental capacity from the jury.

4. Wills $\hookrightarrow$ 324(2)—Expert testimony held not sufficient to take question of mental capacity to jury.

Testimony of a physician based upon a hypothetical question that in his opinion testator was insane held not of sufficient weight to render it error to take the case from the jury.

5. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 142—"Legitimate Inferences" defined.

"Legitimate inferences" considered on motion for nonsuit are those inferences that necessarily follow from certain evidence—legal inferences that are reasonably and legally to be drawn from the evidence.

6. Wills $\hookrightarrow$ 44—Habit of drink or drugs raises no presumption of lack of testamentary capacity.

That a testator was addicted to the habit of drink or drugs did not incapacitate him from making a will, and did not raise a presumption that necessary intelligence was lacking, the question to be determined being the mental capacity of testator at the time he made the will.

7. Wills $\hookrightarrow$ 55(8)—Suicide no proof of insanity.

The fact that a testator committed suicide is not alone proof that he was insane.

3. Wills — 31—Person not entirely sane may make valid will.

It is not true that no person who is insane may make a valid will, and, to sustain the proposition that one not entirely sane has not made a testamentary disposal of his estate, it must be clearly shown that, at the time of the testamentary act, he was insane to the extent that he was mentally incompetent to do so.

9. Wills — 55(5)—Unsteadiness of handwriting in will does not prove mental incompetency.

That testator's handwriting as shown by his will evidenced nervousness or unsteadiness, and that he did not form the letters as evenly or regularly as was his custom, does not prove that he was mentally incompetent to make a will.

10. Wills — 55(5)—Misspelled name of devisee no evidence of testamentary incapacity.

To the circumstance that a testator spelled the first name of one of the devisees, a nephew, erroneously is not to be attached any significance, as showing his mind to be unbalanced to a degree that he was without testamentary capacity when he wrote the will.

11. Wills — 52(1)—Burden on contestant to overcome presumption of sanity.

The burden is on a contestant of a will to overcome the presumption of the testator's sanity at the time he wrote the will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George A. Little, deceased. Proceeding by Clara M. Sparling to contest the will of deceased, of which Joseph H. Stephens and others are proponents. From a judgment of nonsuit and an order admitting the will to probate, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Brittain & Kuhl, Max J. Kuhl, and Wachhorst & Wachhorst, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. This is a proceeding in which the admission to probate of the holographic will of George A. Little, deceased, is contested by Clara M. Sparling, a sister of the decedent. At the close of contestant's case, the court granted a motion for nonsuit, made by the proponents of the will, and admitted the will to probate. The appeal is by the contestant from said order granting a nonsuit and from said judgment.

The grounds of contest were two, viz.: (1) That at the time of the making of the will said George A. Little was not of sound and disposing mind, in this, that he was under the influence of alcoholic drinks and other intoxicants to such a degree that he did not know what he was doing at the time; (2) that on the date of said will, and for several months prior thereto, decedent was mentally incompetent to execute a will and was diseased in mind to such a degree that he was lacking in testamentary capacity and was insane.

On the morning of October 30, 1917, George A. Little was found dead in the kitchen of his home near Fair Oaks, Sacramento county. He had committed suicide by attaching a piece of twine to the trigger of a shotgun, placing the muzzle of the gun in his mouth and pulling the string with his left hand. He left an estate valued at from $35,000 to $40,000.

George A. Little was born near the town of Dixon, Solano county, in about 1871 or 1873. He was educated in the schools of Dixon and subsequently took a year's course in a business college in San Francisco. He returned to Dixon, and was employed for a time in the Bank of Dixon and afterwards in the Bank of Antioch. About 1890 or 1892 he conducted a grocery store in Dixon, and in 1902 or 1903, went into the grocery and saloon business in the city of Sacramento, with a partner named Maltby, and remained in that business for 14 years. The division of the duties of the partners was such that Little ran the saloon and liquor business while his partner attended to the grocery store.

In April, 1916, when Little was about 44 or 45 years of age, he for the first time married. After his marriage he gave up the saloon business, and in the fall of 1916 removed to a ranch which he owned near Fair Oaks. Shortly thereafter his wife became ill, and was twice taken to a hospital in San Francisco, where she died on July 1, 1917. After the burial of his wife decedent returned to his home at Fair Oaks. While living there, his barn and contents were destroyed by fire, and about the middle of October, 1917, a new automobile was stolen from him.

When the deputy coroner was called to the house of decedent, on the morning of his death, he found in the pocket of a coat hanging on the kitchen door a number of letters, a bank book, and the will in question. The deputy coroner testified that the paper upon which the will was written looked like letter tablet paper. Among the letters found was one which is called a "farewell letter," written by decedent to his sister, Edna. The will is brief and is as follows:

"Fair Oaks

"September Twenty Ninth

"Nineteen hundred and Seventeen.

"My first and Only Will & Testament.

"I give & bequeath to my Nieces and Nephews. Harlod & Robert—Stephens Ranond. Ralpha & Ruth Little Dorathia Little Sixty acres of land. near Dixon. Share & share alike.

"The. residue. or. balance. of the estate to go to my Sister Mary. Edna. Stephens.

"to use and do. with as. she. may choose.

"And to give no bonds.

"Geo. A. Little."

Appellant contends that the will, "Contestant's Exhibit No. 1," "bears unmistakably stamped upon it an incoherent, uncertain, vacillating, legally incompetent mind."

We will now give, in as concise a manner as possible, the gist of the testimony introduced on behalf of the contestant, in addition to the facts above epitomized.

J. E. Davies, owner of a machine shop in Sacramento, testified that decedent had bought from him a gas engine, and some time later had told witness that it was not working well; that witness sent a man to look at the engine, who reported that everything was all right. About a week and a half or two weeks before his death Little came to Davies' office. The witness said that decedent spoke about the fire, the shortage of men and shortage of material, and was very much excited; that he waved his hands, walking up and down the floor, and said, "This business is driving me crazy." Witness said Little was wholly irrational for a few minutes at the time of that conversation; that he thought he was intoxicated, but it proved that he was not; that after they "got him toned down to a reasonable condition" he discussed matters very satisfactorily.

William Mullenney testified that he had known George A. Little for 17 or 18 years, very intimately for 10 years; that during the last year of his life he had seen him only once, which was in October when his automobile was stolen; that at that time decedent was irrational, seemed to be laboring under a great deal of excitement, and was a great deal thinner than when witness had seen him before; that "he seemed to be kind of staring like."

William Winn, a machinist's helper, employed by the witness Davies, testified that decedent bought an engine in the shop in August, 1917; that in about a week "he came back roaring. By roaring I mean that he was up in the air; * * * he was profane and swearing." Davies sent a man out to look at the engine, and in about one week Little again came to the shop. Witness said: "He was excited. The way he went on was something fierce. He commenced swearing. I got him by the shoulder and took him over to the bench and told him to cool down." Again a man was sent out to look at the engine, and in September, about a week before he killed himself, Little returned to the shop. At that time he told about the fire and about his wife being dead, and said: "My bad luck; I lost my wife; I got this fire; I lost everything." Witness said he was "awful flighty, and pale as a ghost, and had been drinking"; that he waved his arms, and witness grabbed him by the shoulder and held him; that he walked up and down pulling his hair; that on one occasion he said: "What in hell can I do? Is this man that keeps this place crazy or am I crazy?" The witness testified that he said to Little: "If I had as much money as you have I would not worry"—to which Little replied: "To hell with it; I don't know who is going to get my money. The saloon men will get it."

Another employé of Davies was Walter Marx, who testified that Little was in the shop and complaining that the engine he had would not run. Witness went out and coupled the batteries up to the engine, "turned it over, and away it went. There was nothing wrong with it. There was nothing unusual about Mr. Little's demeanor or conduct during the time I knew him, only he was forgetful. I would show him how to start the engine, and then when it came to him starting it he had forgotten what I had shown him. This happened upon two occasions."

G. W. Shouse had worked for Maltby & Little as a grocery clerk for 7 or 8 years. He said that during that time "Mr. Little was a drinking man. I don't mean he was a man to be drunk all the time. What I mean is that he was a man that took his drinks as an ordinary man would that is running a saloon." Witness met Little several times after February, 1917. He testified:

"I noticed a change in the appearance of George Little after the death of his wife. He seemed to be downhearted like any man would, and he told me that he lived out to the ranch all alone; he said it seemed to be very lonesome, and he was stating about what bad luck he had had, losing his wife and his barn burning down, and I believe something about his automobile burning up; and he said that a man having the luck that he had, life wasn't worth living. He stated that sometimes he felt like going down to the river and jumping in the river. The last time that he said this was not more than three days before he committed suicide. At that time he looked bad, was very peaked in the face, and did not look well; * * * he was kind of trembly like, nervous—shaky like."

Ernest Parker testified that he knew Little in his lifetime; that he last saw him two or three weeks before his death; that he seemed sad and downhearted, grieved over the death of his wife; that he also mentioned the loss of his barn by fire. "Before the death of his wife he was of a jolly nature, talkative and very sociable. After the death of his wife he was very sad. The last time I saw him he was rational."

John Hedigan testified that he had known George Little for about 12 years. Witness was stopping with Jeremiah Kenealy, who owned the adjoining farm to that of decedent. For three weeks previous to the death of George Little he and witness slept in the same bed at Kenealy's house. On the night of October 29th, the night before the suicide, Mr. Kenealy's house being filled with company, witness and George Little slept in the same bed at Little's home. The witness said that during the three weeks previous to Little's death he "acted pretty strange sometimes, to me. The last night I slept with him I thought he was insane—well, in fact for a couple of weeks, he kept jumping, and one thing another. He jumped in bed and acted funny. He would jump in bed at nighttime, and then he would ask me if they kept me awake. * * * That happened almost every night I slept with him. * * * Little groaned at nighttime; he was wide awake several times when he was groaning. Sometimes he would be lying down and sometimes sitting up. The groaning continued pretty near all night." On the night before the death of decedent witness said that at about 20 minutes to 1 o'clock Little got up and said, "I have got to go out here a little while to the kitchen;" that he went out of the room, was gone about 15 minutes and returned; that at about 5 o'clock Little said: "I am in awful trouble. Did they keep you awake?"—to which witness replied: "No, George." At about 6 o'clock in the morning witness arose first, dressed himself, and said, "I will see you over at breakfast, George," to which decedent replied, "No; I don't think you will, Jack; I don't feel just right." Witness said it had been customary for Little to eat his breakfast at the Kenealy home. He testified that Little was a drinking man; that every day he was in Sacramento he saw him take a drink of whisky. He said that the evening before the suicide Little told him he was going to stay home that night; that he had writing to do.

Jeremiah Kenealy stated that at one time after the death of Little's wife he and Little were together at a saloon in Folsom and drank some beer; that Little acted strangely. He said:

"George comes and started something like, I don't know, I think it was a dog around, and touched his leg, or something, and I said: 'What is the matter, George?' 'Oh,' he says, 'I am awful nervous; I wish I could take a drink of whisky. I was up all night. I don't feel good.' So he took a whisky." Later on they took two more whiskeys.

Howard C. Tarry, an automobile repair man employed in Fair Oaks, testified as to having worked on Little's automobile and being called to his place to start a gasoline engine. The first time he found the engine was not put together right, and fixed it. At another time Little called to get witness to go out to start the engine. Witness testified:

"I rode out with him; it is about four miles and very hilly; I would not ride back with him. He drove very recklessly, and I grabbed the wheel and pulled the machine back into the road several times—a couple of times."

Witness said that Little jumped around the engine at his place and was nervous; that it was necessary to remove part of it, and he was so nervous that he could not put the parts back again; that there were several nuts to be put on, and that Little could not hold the nuts in his fingers to start them on the threads. At another time Little had taken a spark plug to pieces and put it back wrong. Witness said:

"Upon these occasions I could not notice that he was irrational, but it wasn't in the way he usually acted."

E. W. Braden testified that after Little lost his wife his conduct and demeanor were not exactly the same; that he was nervous, easily frightened, and he seemed to think everything was going wrong about the place.

J. A. Reed told of an occasion when Little was sitting in an automobile, in August of 1917, "apparently waiting for Mr. Johnson to come out of the house, and he took a paper out of his pocket. I took it to be a pack of cigarette papers, and he looked at them, threw them down on the bottom of his machine, and commenced talking to himself and motioning with his hands."

Clara M. Sparling, the contestant, testified:

"During the last 3 or 4 years of my brother's life I saw him quite frequently. I knew his wife. He didn't visit me, but I always went to see him at his place of business. * * * I judged the relationship between my brother George and his wife was very affectionate. I was present when she died. My brother telephoned to me to come; he telephoned me that his wife was dying. I saw a good deal of my brother George shortly after his wife's death and while the funeral arrangements were being made. My brother had been a drinking man in his lifetime. During the last 10 years of his life I have talked to him about his drinking and asked him for his general health's sake not to drink. * * * During those last 10 years of his life I have seen him under the influence of liquor; not frequently, because I did not see him every day. * * * When I arrived at the hospital in San Francisco where his wife died he was very much under the influence of liquor. After that he still continued to drink more or less until I left after the funeral. I believe the last time I saw George was at the state fair. He was not intoxicated, but his general health, his appearance—he was nervous and shaking. I felt sorry because he looked so miserable. When he shook hands with me you could feel his bones through his coat. * * * At the time of his wife's death he was very nervous and crying, and said he was going to commit suicide. * * * On the day after his wife's death my brother had had a few drinks. He was not appreciably under the influence of liquor, but he was in a very nervous, sick condition. * * * Before his wife's death George was a very healthy looking person, what you would call rather stout. When I saw him at the state fair his eyes were all drawn down, and his face was thin, and he was shaking all over his body. * * * In my opinion, during the months following the death of George's wife, I do not believe that he was entirely sound on account of sickness and liquor."

C. M. Johnston was foreman on George Little's ranch between 9 and 11 days after the 15th of August, 1917. He said that Little was rather excitable; that he walked up and down with his head down and talked to himself, making motions with his hands. On several occasions decedent said: "I will take the gun and blow my head off and end it all." Witness had known Little for about 3 years prior to his death. When he met him at the store, decedent "seemed to be a sociable, jolly man, and was stout and his cheeks were full of color, kind of rosy. He had a florid complexion, a very ruddy and rosy complexion. During the last year he seemed to be worried and thin, and did not look like the same man. He didn't seem to have any color left; he was pale, and there was a big difference in his weight. He was a good deal thinner." Witness told about Little's attempts to fix engines; that he would pull them apart and could not put them together again. "When the engine was working he couldn't let it alone; he would stop it, and it would not work right, and this ought to be done, and that ought to be done, and the first thing you know it would not work at all."

Mrs. C. M. Johnston, who lived at Little's home during the time her husband was foreman, testified that decedent was nervous; that the first day she was there he spoke about his late wife, said he had had poor luck, wrung his hands, and said this was a weary world. On the next day the engine broke down, and Little came into the kitchen to telephone, but the line was busy, and he paced the floor and wrung his hands, and said that he would take a gun and blow his brains out. "He was reticent as a rule. He was not jovial. He seemed melancholy. His spirits were not lively; his spirits were depressed nearly always. Upon the second occasion he said he was going to commit suicide, and he repeated that statement. This was a daily occurrence."

Dr. Fred P. Clark, an alienist, for 12 years superintendent of the state hospital of the insane at Stockton, was asked a hypothetical question embodying the facts above detailed, and said that in his opinion, at the time the will was written, George A. Little was insane.

[1] The rule as to motions for nonsuit is stated as follows (and which statement of said rule is affirmed in Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 167, 113 Pac. 130) by Mr. Justice Barry in Dublin, etc., Railroad Co. v. Slattery, 3 App. Cas. 1155:

"When once a plaintiff has adduced such evidence as if uncontradicted would justify a verdict, no amount of contradictory evidence will justify the withdrawal of the case from the jury."

In Schuchardt v. Allen, 1 Wall. 359, 17 L. Ed. 642, it is said:

"If the evidence be not sufficient to warrant a recovery, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury accordingly. "This is equivalent to a demurrer to evidence, and such an instruction ought to be given whenever the evidence is not legally sufficient to serve as the foundation of a verdict for the plaintiff."

See, also, Byrnes v. Moore, 93 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. 70; Archibald Est. v. Matteson, 5 Cal. App. 441, 90 Pac. 723.

It is true that, on a motion for a nonsuit, particularly when made on the close of the plaintiff's, or, in the case of a will contest, the contestant's case, "in determining whether the evidence presented is sufficient to take the case from the jury, the entire evidence presented is to be viewed from a point most favorable to the contestant." Est. of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532. "Disregard is had of any contradictory evidence." Est. of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532; Est. of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252; In re Ross, 173 Cal. 178, 179, 159 Pac. 603. In other words, a nonsuit may be granted "only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's [contestant's] evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate [we italicize the word 'legitimate'] inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given." Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 Pac. 631; In re Ross, 173 Cal. 179, 180, 159 Pac. 603, 604.

[2] Testamentary capacity or what constitutes the mental capacity to make a will has been lucidly explained in Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 562, 69 Pac. 294, in a quotation from the case of Whitney v. Twombly, 136 Mass. 145, as follows:

"If he [the testator] is able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he has been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he is doing, and the relation in which he stands to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, he has the capacity to make his will."

[3] Putting the evidence presented herein by the contestant to the test of the foregoing well-established and, indeed, elementary, principles, it seems very clear to us that but one conclusion can justly follow, and that is that the court below made no error of law in taking the case from the jury.

The substantial facts as they were revealed before the court by the testimony submitted by the contestant are given in considerable detail above, and the sum of all that testimony, when reduced to its real evidential purport, is: That the deceased, a man of such education and intelligence as that justification was found for his employment as the cashier, at different times, of two different banking institutions, a position concededly of great importance and responsibility, and who later became engaged in mercantile pursuits, and whose capabilities and experience as a business man were of such high degree and value as to enable him to succeed, before passing the meridian of life, in accumulating a comfortable fortune, had suddenly met with a series and variety of reverses which so shocked his nervous organization as to have worked changes in his physical and mental characteristics; and as to his condition in those respects as thus brought about the facts are these: That he had been, during some of the years prior to the date of his self-inflicted death, addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors; that he had retired from the mercantile business and taken up farming or fruit raising, and that comparatively late in life—that is, after he had passed his fortieth year—he took to himself a wife; that, after having been married for a period only of a little more than a year, death claimed his wife; that shortly thereafter the stable located upon his farm was destroyed by fire, this misfortune being shortly followed by the theft of an automobile owned by him; that following all these troubles and misfortunes, coming as they did in rapid succession, he appeared to grow discouraged and despondent, and perhaps plied himself more liberally with intoxicants than he had ever been accustomed to indulge in prior to the date of the advent of adverse inroads into his life and his affairs; that he lost flesh and also displayed mental peculiarities to which his mind was a stranger prior to the time at which the misfortunes referred to came to him; that, according to some of the witnesses, he acted irrationally at times, but that such irrational moments were of limited duration; that he on one occasion, when dwelling on his misfortunes, wrung his hands and talked to himself, and on another occasion, while under a great nervous strain, he exclaimed that “all these things” (meaning his misfortunes) would drive him crazy; that on another occasion he complained that an engine or tractor used on his farm was out of order and would not perform its work, and that, when taken to a machinist for inspection and repair, the latter found the machine intact in all respects—in other words, in perfect workable order.

[4] The above, we repeat, is about all that can be said that the oral evidence shows as tending to establish the mental incompetency of the deceased to perform or execute the testamentary act, save and except the testimony of a physician who testified, basing his testimony upon a hypothetical question, that in his opinion the deceased was insane, but as to this character of testimony the Supreme Court, in Estate of Dolbeer, 149

Cal. 227, 243, 86 Pac. 695, 702 (9 Ann. Cas. 795), has justly declared:

“The witnesses were skilled alienists, it may be conceded, but the evidence thus adduced of one who has never seen the person and who bases his opinion upon the facts given in a hypothetical question is evidence the weakest and most unsatisfactory. Such questions themselves are always framed with great particularity to meet the views of the side which presents the expert. They always eliminate from consideration the countervailing evidence which may be of a thousandfold more strength than the evidence upon which the question is based. They are astutely drawn, and drawn for a purpose, and that purpose never is the presentation of all the evidence. It is never to present the fair and accurate view, but the purpose always is to frame a question such that the answer will announce a predetermined result. This kind of expert testimony, given under such circumstances, even the testimony of able and disinterested witnesses, as no doubt these were, is in the eye of the law of steadily decreasing value.”

See, also, Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 170, 113 Pac. 130.

Some of the witnesses for the proponents, speaking of the peculiar actions or conduct of the deceased prior to the date he wrote his will, testified that, while on certain occasions he acted very peculiarly and like one laboring under a severe nervous and mental strain, he did not appear to be irrational. There is no positive testimony that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor when he wrote the will whose validity is here challenged.

[5] What are the legitimate inferences from all the testimony? By “legitimate inferences” are meant those inferences that necessarily follow from certain evidence—legal inferences that are reasonably and legally to be drawn from the evidence.

[6] It is true that it appears from the oral evidence that the deceased had suffered a severe nervous shock as the result of the reverses with which he had met. He was undoubtedly much discouraged and very despondent, particularly because of the loss of his wife. But does it follow from this that he was bereft of testamentary capacity at the time he made his will or at all? Does it follow from this condition that he did not know what he was doing when he executed the testamentary act? Is the inference to be indulged that a man is insane or irrational to the extent that he is lacking in intelligence enough to dispose of his estate by last will and testament because it transpires that at times he has been in a state of alcoholic intoxication?

“A person may drink and yet retain his mental faculties. * * * The effect of alcohol and of drugs wears off, and although they may leave the user weakened both in mind and body, yet so long as there has not been destruction of that mentality which the law requires for the making of a will, it cannot be said that the fact that the testator is addicted to the habit of drink or of drugs incapacitates him from making a will. Such fact, alone, does not raise the presumption that the necessary intelligence is lacking. The question to be determined is the mental capacity of the testator at the time he makes his will, and the fact that he may then be under the influence of liquor does not invalidate his testament unless he had no intelligent comprehension of what he was doing." Alexander on Wills, vol. 1, § 350.

There is, as we have in other words declared, nothing in the testimony from which the inference necessarily follows that the deceased "had no intelligent comprehension of what he was doing" when he wrote his will. To the contrary, the will itself is mute but convincing evidence of the fact that he fully comprehended what he was doing when he wrote it. Indeed the fact that the will is holographic, and that it was prepared by himself in strict accord with the law prescribing the requisites of such a testament—that by it he indicated that he knew that, as the law requires, such a will, to be valid, must be in the testator's own writing and dated by him—is itself well-nigh indubitable evidence that he was very much "at himself" when he drew the instrument, and at that time knew precisely what he was doing and how he desired to dispose of his estate. By the instrument he disposed of his entire estate, and some of it by specific devise to his nephews and nieces (near relatives), giving the location of the property so devised, and appears to have been able "to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property, and his relation to his relatives and those around him with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he had been mostly interested." Whitney v. Twombly, supra. Moreover, the disposal of his estate by the testament in question is not an unnatural one. All the devisees and legatees under his will were closely connected with him by blood. It is true that, in the testamentary disposal, he pretermitted the contestant, a sister, but that fact does not render the disposal an unnatural one, and it must be assumed that he had a reason, sufficient to his mind, for thus omitting her as a beneficiary of his bounty.

[7, 8] Nor does the fact that he committed suicide alone prove that he was insane. It is not true that no person who is insane may make a valid will. Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 168, 113 Pac. 130. And to sustain the position that one not entirely sane has not made a valid testamentary disposal of his estate it must be clearly shown that, at the time of the testamentary act, he was insane to the extent that he was mentally incompetent to do so.

[9] But counsel for the contestant, in their briefs, make a minute and, withal, an ingenious examination of the handwriting of the deceased, as evidenced by the will and a letter written by him to his sister, Mrs. Stephens, near in point of time to the date of the execution of the will, and so undertake to show, and by a comparison of his handwriting in those two documents with a letter written by him to the contestant in July, 1917, when, as is conceded, he was in his natural and normal state of mind, that his handwriting as evidenced by his will was not as regular and symmetrical in form as his letter to the contestant showed was the characteristic style of his handwriting. A photographic copy of the will is reproduced in the record. We have carefully examined and compared it with the handwriting of the letter to the contestant, likewise reproduced. There are, it is true, some evidences in the writing in the will of nervousness or unsteadiness in the manipulation of the pen in the writing of the document, but it will readily be perceived, by an inspection and comparison of the handwriting of the will with his letter to the contestant that the only difference between them is that one was written with an unsteady hand and the other when the writer apparently had full command of his physical power. The one was undoubtedly written while the testator was suffering from nervousness, due, no doubt, to the mental and physical strain under which he was laboring by reason of his misfortunes, while the other was written while he was in a normal physical and mental condition. But the fact that in the testator's handwriting as shown by his will there is evidence of nervousness or unsteadiness and for that reason he did not form the letters in the words as evenly or regularly as was his custom proves nothing as against the proposition that he was mentally competent to make a will at the time he wrote the document in question. All persons, it is undoubtedly true, are, in their handwriting, subject to such imperfections. In other words, it is the rule and not the exception that the handwriting of people is not always uniform or precisely their characteristic style of handwriting. A person, enfeebled from physical illness, would not, generally speaking, write in his usual hand, and the difference would be obvious. In this case, the deceased, for several weeks prior to his death, was admittedly in enfeebled physical health and undoubtedly in a measure and in a sense mentally affected. Besides, he had been more or less under the influence of intoxicating liquors. It is therefore not strange or a matter of surprise that he should have been incapable, at the time of writing his will, of so using his hand in writing a letter or a document of any character as to make his handwriting therein altogether the same as his chirography would be when he was in good health and in every respect in a normal condition.

[10] Nor do we think that to the circumstance that the deceased, in his will, spelled the first name of one of the devisees; a nephew, erroneously, is to be attached any significance as showing his mind to be unbalanced to a degree that he was without testamentary capacity when he wrote the will. Such a mistake is not uncommon in those in a perfectly normal state, and much more readily is it to be perceived that a mistake of that character may be made by one under the influence of the nervous strain from which the deceased had for some time previously been suffering through the misfortunes with which he had been afflicted.

[11] The burden was on the contestant to overcome the presumption of the testator's sanity at the time he wrote his will. This burden, we think it will appear clear from an examination of the testimony, the contestant has not sustained. In other words, the evidence produced by the contestant is not of "sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of contestant if such a verdict were given." Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 150, 155 Pac. 631, 632, supra. The evidence does not "warrant a recovery," or a verdict for the contestant. Schuchardt v. Allen, 1 Wall. 359, 17 L. Ed. 642, supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

HILL v. CITY OF OXNARD et al.
(Civ. 2073.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations — 692—Permanent structure or purpresture encroaching on street may be abated.

Public highways belong from side to side and end to end to the public, and any permanent structure or purpresture, as a tree, which materially encroaches upon a public street and impedes travel, is a nuisance per se, and may be abated, though space is available for passage of public.

2. Dedication — 51 — Entire width of street generally dedicated.

Generally when a piece of land is dedicated to the public as a street by its owner its entire width is dedicated, and the principle that the public is entitled to the open use thereof free of encroaching structures and purprestures is applicable.

3. Municipal corporations — 658 — City took highway for street burdened with exceptions in deed to county.

When a city transformed a highway through plaintiff's land into a street, it took it burdened with exceptions contained in deed of land for street from plaintiff to county as city's predecessor.

4. Municipal corporations — 696—City cannot remove trees reserved by plaintiff granting land to county for highway.

In view of Const. art. 1, § 14, where plaintiff granted a strip of land to the county for a highway, reserving trees which the county agreed not to interfere with, and a city took over highway from county and made a street of it, it cannot cut down and remove plaintiff's trees which it alleges cause excess water to collect and prevent the proper grading of the street, on the theory that such step would be proper exercise of police power.

5. Constitutional law — 121(2)—Deed of land to county for highway with reservation a "contract."

Deed of land to county for a street with reservation of trees was an executed "contract" within protection of Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, providing no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and fixes and limits rights of grantor and county and a city, its successor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contract.]

6. Injunction — 52 — Writ issues to prevent wrongful cutting down of trees.

An injunction may issue at suit of the owner to prevent the cutting down of growing trees by a party without right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Aranetta Hill against the City of Oxnard and Joe Sailor and others, as its Board of Trustees. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant. Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondents.

ELLISON, P. J., pro tem. The plaintiff is now and for more than 46 years has been the owner of certain real estate in Ventura county. She had created on her land an avenue for her convenience and pleasure and planted thereon as early as 1880 some 55 walnut trees of the variety known as black walnuts in parallel rows, the rows being some 20 feet apart. They have grown to be large trees, some of them 30 inches in diameter, and, having been planted by her own hands in her younger days, she is, naturally, very much attached to them. About the year 1898, and prior to the incorporation of the city of Oxnard, the board of supervisors of Ventura county desired a roadway through the property of the plaintiff taking in as part thereof the strip upon which said walnut trees were growing. At first she refused to allow them to do so. Thereafter they called in a body at her house and discussed the matter with her. At that time she stated that under no circumstances would she sell a right over her real property for road purposes to the county, stating, as her objection, that the roadway would destroy the walnut trees which she had planted years before and which she prized so highly. She stated her fears, if a right of way were granted it might cause the trees to be removed at some future date. The board of supervisors assured her that if she would deed the roadway, the county would not ask her to deed the trees, but would allow her to keep title to the same; and promised her that under no circumstances would they remove them or cut them down without her consent, the county specifically offering at that time to put through the roadway, and subsequently maintain it in such a way that her trees would not be injured, and that she would retain the sole title to them. After this understanding had been reached, the plaintiff executed to the county a deed for the desired right of way. This deed, after describing the right of way by metes and bounds (said description covering the land upon which said three rows of trees were standing, in addition to other lands), contains this exception:

"Reserving, however, to the party of the first part from said grant of land, all of the trees growing on said three strips of land above described and reserving, also to the party of the first part, the right to trim or remove said trees, or any of them at any time, provided that the party of the second part shall have the right to trim said trees as may be necessary to prevent their growing limbs interfering with the use of said strip of land for road purposes."

After this written dedication of the property, the board of supervisors accepted the same, and in their acceptance of said right of way for road purposes used the following language:

"It is ordered that the deed from Aranetta Hill and John G. Hill, dated March 15, 1898, for a strip of land for a roadway on the west end of Fifth street, in the town of Oxnard, westerly (etc.), be accepted, subject to the terms and conditions therein contained, which the county of Ventura in accepting said deed agrees to comply with, and the said strip of land in said deed described and conveyed to the county of Ventura is hereby established and declared to be a public road and highway, and the same is hereby named and established and known as Hill avenue."

About the year 1903 the city of Oxnard was incorporated as a municipal corporation of the sixth class, its corporate bounds including the strip of land referred to on which are the three rows of walnut trees, and said strip of land, being a continuation thereof, is now known as Fifth street in the city of Oxnard.

The plaintiff recently ascertained that the city of Oxnard, through its board of trustees, threatened to cut down and remove the walnut trees, and each and all of them, against her will and without her consent, and without awarding her any compensation. Upon learning this, she brought suit, and asked for a perpetual injunction, restraining the city of Oxnard from cutting down, removing, killing, destroying, or damaging said walnut trees.

After trial the court found, among other facts, that said trees are a public nuisance, that they interfere with and prevent the construction of sidewalks, curbs, and gutters along the portion of Fifth street where said trees are growing, and prevent the grading of said Fifth street to the official street line grade, and interfere with and prevent proper drainage of the portion of said city in proximity to said trees; that they were injurious to the health and safety of the city of Oxnard; and denied the plaintiff any relief. From this judgment she appeals.

The real question presented by this appeal for consideration and decision is whether the city of Oxnard, under the circumstances as they appear in the record, has any right to destroy said walnut trees, or in any way injure or damage them.

[1] As a general proposition, it may be stated that the public authorities have the right to the use of the entire right of way that has been acquired for highway purposes, and to use all of it, if deemed necessary or proper, and to that end to remove from it trees, embankments, or other obstructions which in any way interfere with its use for public travel. Or, as stated in Elliott on Roads (2d Ed.) § 645:

"Public highways belong, from side to side and end to end to the public, and any permanent structure or purpresture which materially encroaches upon a public street and impedes travel is a nuisance per se, and may be abated, notwithstanding space is left for the passage of the public."

[2] Generally, when a piece of land is dedicated to the public by its owner, its entire width is dedicated, and the principles above stated, declaring the rights of the public therein, are applicable to such highways. A typical case applying these general principles is Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 45 Pac. 266, 35 L. R. A. 267. There was a street in the full meaning of the term. The land had not been dedicated with exceptions and reservations. No right had been reserved by its former owner to keep trees thereon or to plant others. After the town became a city and after the land had become a street the plaintiff planted in the right of way certain trees, and they were permitted to grow to a considerable size. They became an obstruction to the free use of the city, and were declared an unlawful interference with the use of the street, and in the litigation that arose, the court, following the line of decisions above referred to, held that the city had a right to remove them.

Cases like the above and the principles upon which they were decided are not controlling and of but little value in disposing of cases like the one now under consideration where special property and contract rights are involved and the dedication a restricted one. Sometimes the dedication is so worded that the public does not acquire an easement perfect in all details and giving it an unlimited right to use all the surface for public purposes between the side lines of the right of way that is dedicated. There may be a part of it excepted and reserved to the owner, and in such case the public gets the right of way so dedicated burdened with the reservations or lessened by the exceptions contained in the dedication. Such highways are very rare, and as a result but few cases can be found defining the rights of the parties, in such circumstances.

In Elliott on Roads and Streets, section 122, it is said:

"Where the common-law dedication is an express one, and there is a writing evidencing it, the extent of the dedication will be measured by the writing, except where the use controls and has been of such a character and so long continued as to change the extent of the easement. If the instrument creating the easement annexes terms and conditions, the public is bound by them in case of an acceptance."

"It is well settled that in dedicating land to the public the dedicator may impose such reasonable conditions, restrictions, and limitations as he may see fit, and in order to vest the easement in the dedicatee the terms of the dedication must be strictly complied with." 13 Cyc. 456.

"The dedicator may prescribe the terms, restrictions, and limitations on which the land is given." 8 Ruling Case Law, p. 909.

"Dedication of a street must arise from some act of the owner of the land. * * * State v. Society, 44 N. J. Law, 502; Ayers v. Penn. Ry. Co., 48 N. J. Law, 44, 48, 3 Atl. 885. * * * The public cannot get anything more than he gives; and if he dedicates a street 100 feet wide, subject to the restrictions and use as mentioned, the public takes subject to the restrictions. The filing of a map and selling lands thereby would be evidence of a dedication, but, if he did not file the map, and did not adopt it, by reference thereto in the deeds, the filed map would not be conclusive evidence against him; and, if the map he made and sold lots by showed the trees set out to be as testified to by the surveyor, it would be a question of fact to be determined by judicial authority as to whether this dedication of Landis avenue was not subject to the setting out and existence of the trees in accordance with Mr. Landis' scheme of ornamentation and use of this avenue." Avis v. Vineland, etc., 56 N. J. Law, 474, 23 Atl. 1039, 23 L. R. A. 685.

The same controversy went to the Supreme Court of New Jersey two years later, and the right of the city to destroy the trees was denied. In the last case it is said:

"It is a settled legal rule that land may be dedicated to a restricted public use, and if accepted must be taken for the limited purpose only." Young v. Landis Township, 73 N. J. Law, 266, 62 Atl. 1133.

In that case the reservation of the trees in the act of dedication was proved by circumstances as indicating the intent of the dedicator. In this case, the exception is contained in the deed of a right of way in express language.

The trees referred to in the deed made by the plaintiff and her husband to the county of Ventura are real estate.

"The timber was part and parcel of the real property referred to in the deeds. Civ. Code, §§ 658, 660. The title to it in fee simple had been in Sears prior to the execution of the deeds by him, and it being by the language thereof clearly excepted from the operation of the deed, this title in fee simple remained where it had been." Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 586, 72 Pac. 172.

The deed, in which the city of Oxnard, as successor to the county of Ventura, claims a right of way for highway purposes, does not convey all the real estate to the county between the side lines of the proposed highway. It excepts therefrom a part of the real estate that would otherwise have passed.

The plaintiff is in the same position as would be a grantor of a right of way to a county for a highway, who, in his deed, after describing a piece of land 80 feet wide, reserved a strip through the entire length thereof in its center 10 feet wide, upon which was already established a blue grass plat with shade trees thereon. Such parks are not infrequent in the center of highways in some of our most important cities, notably in the city of Washington. In such a case no one would claim that the grantee in a deed, although a municipal corporation, would have the right, without the consent of the grantor, to appropriate such excepted plat 10 feet in width for city purposes, to plow up the blue grass, cut down the trees, and put the excepted strip in a condition for public travel, or perhaps, utilize it for the purpose of a public sewer.

[3] When the city of Oxnard transformed the highway through plaintiff's land into one of the streets of the city, it took it burdened with the exceptions contained in the deed from the plaintiff to the county.

"The creation of a city, village, or incorporated town, or the extension of its limits, vests in the municipality the power and jurisdiction to regulate and control highways which have hitherto been under the control of the county or township organization, and transfers to the city or village the duty of maintaining and repairing them, unless the statute otherwise provides." Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 1138.

"Where a municipal corporation succeeds by annexation to the rights and powers of a town, it cannot repudiate a franchise granted by the town to a telephone company to construct and maintain poles, wires, etc., in the streets. The town in granting such right acted as agents for the state in its governmental and not in its proprietary capacity and therefore neither the town nor any other municipality succeeding to its governmental powers could have any right to repudiate the contract or take back the grant without the consent of the telephone company." People ex rel. Rockwell v. Chicago Telephone Co., 245 Ill. 121, 91 N. E. 1065, and same case in 245 Ill. 154, 91 N. E. 1070; also, Elliott on Roads (2d Ed.) § 116; Belle v. Glenville, 27 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 181.

We start with the fact that these 45 walnut trees, together with the ground occupied by them, are the property of the plaintiff in this case, she having the title therein in fee simple, good against all the world. The defendant, without her consent, and without compensation, purposed to take this property and appropriate it to the uses of the city. We are of the opinion that this contemplated procedure is unauthorized by law and may not be carried out.

The fact that these trees interfere with defendant's plans in the matter of paving and curbing Fifth street is not a justification for taking plaintiff's property. It might be convenient to it to take a strip of her land lying south of Fifth street and thereby widen the street to that extent for sewer or sidewalk purposes, but no one would contend that it could do so without her consent, or without a judgment in condemnation proceedings.

The plaintiff's title to these trees and to the land upon which they stand is just as perfect in her as is the title to her holdings lying south of the highway, and the city can no more take the one in the method proposed than it can take the other.

Counties and municipalities often enter into contracts which subsequently prove a source of inconvenience. But such inconvenience is no justification for their repudiation. Thus, South Bend, Ind., granted to a railway company a franchise to lay a double-track railway upon certain of its streets. The company built a single track, but before it had its double track completed the city repealed so much of the ordinance as related to double tracks. Whereupon suit was brought. The city attempted to justify its action under the police power. It was claimed that the presence of two tracks in the street was an inconvenience to the public and a source of danger, and that in the exercise of the police power the city could prevent the laying of the second track. The case went to the United States Supreme Court, and in deciding the case, this language is used:

"If the police power could lay hold of such inconveniences, and make them the basis of the right to repeal such an ordinance, the contract could be abrogated because of the very growth in population and business the railroad was intended to secure."

And, again, it is said:

"Obviously, upon the clearest considerations of law and justice, the grant of authority to defendant when * * * acted upon became an irrevocable contract, and the city is powerless to set it aside." Grand Trunk R. R. Co. v. South Bend, 227 U. S. 557, 33 Sup. Ct. 307, 57 L. Ed. 633, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 405.

The court finds that the trees obstruct the flow of the drainage water from the streets of Oxnard; that it is stopped in its course by the presence of these trees, and there is evidence that a pool of water is formed near the trees, which becomes stagnant and is detrimental to the health of the people of the city of Oxnard and is a public nuisance.

It occurs to us that the existence of the nuisance is attributed to the wrong party and the wrong source. The trees are not a public nuisance. They are not injurious to health. A pool of water standing near them may be injurious to the public health and may be a public nuisance, but such a pool of water is formed, not by the plaintiff, but by the defendant in not taking care of the surface water. It is permitting it or causing it to flow against the plaintiff's property, where it has no outlet, and where it remains until it is stagnant. If the surface water flowing down the streets were stopped by the higher lands of the plaintiff on the south side of Fifth street, and formed a pool, no one would claim that the city, on the ground that the pool was a public nuisance could, without the plaintiff's consent, cut a drainage canal through her farm. Neither can it, in order to get an outlet for its drainage, destroy her fee-simple title in and to the trees involved.

[4] The contemplated action of the city of Oxnard was attempted to be justified on the ground that it is an exercise of the police power for the benefit of the health and convenience of the community, but we know of no decision which extends the police power of a municipality to such contemplated end. The plaintiff in asserting her rights is buttressed by a provision of the Constitution of the state of California, wherein it is provided in general terms that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation first having been ascertained and paid.

In Nickey v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 126 Cal. 152, 58 Pac. 459, it is said:

"But in this state private property may not be taken or damaged for private use at all. It may be taken only for public use after just compensation made or paid. Const. art. 1, § 14. It is beyond question that the digging and maintaining of ditches and drains across private lands is a taking of property."

[5] The record shows that the defendant in this case desires to remove some of these trees for the purpose of getting proper drainage for its water. In other words, it pur-poses to put a drain, without plaintiff's per-mission, across and through that part of her real estate which she expressly reserved in the deed she executed to the county. She is further justified in the position she takes by that provision of the federal Constitution, article 1, section 10, wherein it is provided:

"No state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contract."

Her deed to the county of Ventura was an executed contract, and it fixes and limits the rights of the respective parties thereto, and it is beyond the power of the state of Cal-ifornia, or any municipal subdivision thereof, by any ordinance or resolution, to impair the obligations of such contract.

The proposed action of the city of Oxnard in passing its ordinance, declaring that these trees interfere with the laying of sidewalks in accordance with the ordinances of the city, and prevent the free flow of the surface water, and therefore shall be taken and used by the city, is a violation of the plaintiff's rights, as outlined, fixed, and determined by the express provisions and terms of her writ-ten contract.

Her contract cannot be impaired by resort to what is known as the police power. This principle is very clearly discussed in one of Justice Harlan's luminous opinions, in decid-ing the case of New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louis-iana Light Co., 115 U. S. 650, 6 Sup. Ct. 252, 29 L. Ed. 516. In that case it appeared that the New Orleans Gas, Light & Banking Com-pany, the predecessor in interest of the plain-tiff, had obtained a franchise from the Leg-islature of Louisiana by which it was given the sole and exclusive privilege of vending gaslights in the city of New Orleans and its faubourgs and the city of Lafayette, to such persons or bodies corporate who may volun-tarily choose to contract for the same. Sub-sequently the Legislature gave another cor-poration the right to lay its mains and manu-facture and sell gas in the city of New Or-leans, and the action was brought to restrain it from so doing on the ground that the sec-ond franchise was a violation of the contract given to the first, wherein it was granted the exclusive privilege of manufacturing and selling gas in the territory. In the course of the decision it is said:

"It will, therefore, be assumed in the further consideration of this case, that the charter of the Crescent City Gas Light Company—to whose rights and franchises the present plain-tiff has succeeded—so far as it created a cor-poration with authority to manufacture gas and to distribute the same by means of pipes, mains, and conduits, laid in the streets and other public ways of New Orleans, constituted, to use the language of this court in the case of the Dela-ware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, 'a contract between the state and its corporators, and within the provision of the Constitution prohibiting legislation impairing the obligation of con-tracts,' and therefore 'equally protected from legislative interference, whether the public be interested in the exercise of its franchise, or the charter be granted for the sole benefit of its corporators.'

"But it is earnestly insisted that, as the sup-plying of New Orleans and its inhabitants with gas has relation to the public comfort, and, in some sense, to the public health and the public safety, and, for that reason, is an object to which the police power extends, it was not competent for one Legislature to limit or restrict the pow-er of a subsequent Legislature in respect to those subjects. It is, consequently, claimed that the state may at pleasure recall the grant of exclusive privileges to the plaintiff, and that no agreement by her, upon whatever consid-eration, in reference to a matter connected in any degree with the public comfort, the public health, or the public safety, will constitute a contract the obligation of which is protected against impairment by the national Consti-tution. And this position is supposed by counsel to be justified by recent adjudications of this court in which the nature and scope of the po-lice power have been considered.

"In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 62, it was said that the police power is, from its nature, incapable of any exact definition or limitation; and, in Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 818, that it is 'easier to determine whether a particular case comes within the general scope of the power than to give an abstract definition of the power itself, which will be in all respects accurate.' That there is a power, sometimes called the police power, which has never been surrendered by the states, in virtue of which they may, within certain lim-its, control everything within their respective territories, and upon the proper exercise of which, under some circumstances, may depend the public health, the public morals, or the pub-lic safety, is conceded in all cases. * * * In its broadest sense, as sometimes defined, it in-cludes all legislation and almost every function of civil government. * * * As thus defined, we may, not improperly, refer to that power the authority of the state to create educational and charitable institutions, and provide for the establishment, maintenance, and control of pub-lic highways, turnpike roads, canals, wharves, ferries, and telegraph lines, and the draining of swamps. Definitions of the police power must, however, be taken, subject to the condi-tion that the state cannot, in its exercise, for any purpose whatever, encroach upon the pow-ers of the general government, or rights grant-ed or secured by the supreme law of the land."

In the same case it is said:

"Yet, if the contract was within the scope of the authority conferred by the Constitution of the state, it is, like any other contract made by competent authority, binding upon the par-ties. Nor can the people or their representa-tives, by any act of theirs afterwards, impair its obligation. When the contract is made the Constitution of the United States acts upon it and declares that it shall not be impaired, and makes it the duty of this court to carry it into execution."

The decision then cites numerous cases wherein the states have attempted to do things, the effect of which was to impair the obligations of contracts, by a supposed exercise of the police power, and wherein the Supreme Court of the United States, in every instance, held that that police power could not be used for such purpose.

The case is well worthy of a careful perusal by any one interested in the principles involved.

[6] It is claimed that the plaintiff can obtain all the relief she may be entitled to without resorting to equity, but the decisions seem pretty generally to hold that injunction may be had to prevent the cutting down of growing trees.

"An entry upon land, and digging up and removing fruit trees growing upon it, is waste, and an injury to the inheritance, and are acts which a court of equity may enjoin." Silva v. Garcia, 65 Cal. 591, 4 Pac. 628.

In Natoma Water & Min. Co. v. Clarkin, 14 Cal. 544, it was said that—

"The cutting, destroying, and removing of growing timber on the premises in controversy constituted, without other matter, sufficient ground for the issuance of the writ."

To the same effect are U. S. v. Guglard (C. C.) 79 Fed. 23, and Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 107. A threatened injury to real property in the nature of waste may be restrained. More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 590; Hatton v. Gregg, 4 Cal. App. 542, 88 Pac. 594.

We are of the opinion that the evidence did not justify the finding of the court that the trees were a public nuisance, nor the findings that pecuniary compensation would give the plaintiff all the relief to which she is entitled. On the facts disclosed by the record, the defendants have no right to cut down or destroy the trees.

The judgment is reversed.

46 Cal. App. 603

CITY LUMBER CO. et al. v. BROWN et al.
(Civ. 2085.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 18, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1920.)

1. Deeds ⚡54—Delivery necessary to consummate conveyance.

Delivery of a deed is necessary to consummate the conveyance.

2. Deeds ⚡208(2)—Possession of grantor evidence of no delivery.

Where deed is found in possession of grantor, the fact is evidence that it was not delivered.

3. Deeds ⚡208(1)—Evidence held to sustain implied finding of delivery.

In action to foreclose mechanics' liens, evidence held sufficient to support implied finding that deed from original owners of property to party who contracted for the work was delivered.

4. Deeds ⚡58(2) — Delivery to agent by agreement sufficient.

Where grantee directs or agrees that deed may be left for him with a third party, delivery to the latter is equivalent to delivery to the grantee through an agent appointed for the purpose.

5. Mechanics' liens ⚡76—Application of principle of estoppel in favor of lien claimants against person who stated he was owner.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, if the former owner of property on which liens are claimed had stated to the claimants that he was the owner of the property before they furnished the material, and they had relied on his assertion of ownership, the principle of estoppel would apply in their favor against him.

6. Mechanics' liens ⚡76—Principle of estoppel can be invoked to prevent owner from asserting title only in case of fraud.

The principle of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, that where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done, he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent, if his conduct or encouragement induced the other party to change his position so that he will be prejudiced by the adverse claim, can be invoked against the legal owner of land to prevent him from asserting his title only when he is chargeable with fraud, actual or constructive, against the opposite party.

7. Mechanics' liens ⚡76—Claimants cannot assert lien on theory of estoppel against former owners who again secured title.

Where owners of land conveyed to another who contracted for erection of buildings when deed to him was of record, lien claimants who furnished materials cannot assert their liens as against former owners who subsequently secured title again by foreclosure of mortgage or through sale under a trust deed.

8. Mortgages ⚡591(3) — Difference between mortgage and deed of trust as affecting subsequent lienholders' right of redemption.

Where security on land is in form of mortgage, there must be foreclosure and sale to subject property to debt, and subsequent lienholders may have opportunity to join in action and to promote sale for enough to satisfy their own as well as the prior claim, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 701, are entitled to right of redemption, but in case of a deed of trust no suit is required for sale of property, there is no right of redemption, and, if property is sold for only enough to satisfy claim of beneficiary, subsequent liens fall.

9. Mechanics' liens ⚡78 — Partnership in building venture held to subject property to lien in absence of notice to prevent.

Where owners conveyed their lot to another, and took back a deed of trust or mortgage with understanding and agreement that such other was to build, and that both should be equally interested in property, former owners and their grantee are liable for cost of building, which is subject to lien for labor done or materials furnished, in absence of notice provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1192.

10. Mechanics' liens →281(3)—Evidence held to show grantee represented himself and grantor in ordering material.

In action to foreclose mechanics' liens on property conveyed by certain defendants to another, evidence held to show that such other represented both himself and his grantors in ordering materials for a building, and that both were equally bound for the indebtedness; finding to contrary being unsupported.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the City Lumber Company and others, against J. T. Brown and others. From judgment refusing to foreclose mechanics' liens, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

John F. Poole, G. C. De Garmo, and Daniel Beecher, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Will Hays, Milton K. Young, and Lyndoll L. Young, all of Los Angeles, and Byron Coleman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The plaintiffs filed mechanics' liens on the property at issue herein amounting to the sum of $1,850 for materials and labor actually used and furnished in the construction of a four-flat building, and they brought suit against A. F. Whittington, J. T. Brown, and others for a personal judgment, and also to foreclose said liens. The court found all the liens valid, and gave judgment accordingly as against A. F. Whittington, but would allow no foreclosure on the property upon the theory that the liens were wiped out by the sale under an instrument in the form of a trust deed, in favor of defendant Brown, for $1,850, and the court gave Brown judgment for his costs. The court also found:

"That from on or about the 17th day of March, 1916, to on or about the 17th day of December, 1916, the defendant, A. F. Whittington, was the owner" of the property; "that on or about the 24th day of March, 1916, the defendant A. F. Whittington, as owner, entered into the construction of a building upon said premises; that the defendants J. T. Brown and Marie M. Brown were not connected or associated in any way, either as owners or otherwise, with the said defendant A. F. Whittington in the construction of said building; that said J. T. Brown and Marie M. Brown were not connected or associated with the said defendant A. F. Whittington in any contract or contracts in regard to the furnishing of labor or materials upon said building with the plaintiffs, * * * or any or either of them, but that all contracts entered into in regard to the construction of said building by the said plaintiffs and cross-complainants aforesaid, and each of them, were entered into solely by the said A. F. Whittington; that all materials furnished in the erection of said building, and all work and labor done thereon by plaintiffs, * * * or any or either of them, were furnished to the said A. F. Whittington and at his request, and not at the request of the defendants and said defendants J. T. Brown and Marie M. Brown or either of them."

There is a further finding that on the 11th day of March, 1916, said A. F. Whittington executed and delivered to said Brown his promissory note in the sum of $1,864, and at the same time executed a certain deed of trust of said property to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company in favor of said Brown to secure the payment of said promissory note, and that said deed of trust was recorded on March 13, 1916. It further appears from the findings that said Whittington made default in the payment of said promissory note, and that on the 7th day of December, 1916, according to the terms and provisions of said trust deed, the property therein described was regularly and duly sold to said Brown, and that said company thereupon executed to said Brown its deed to said property, and that ever since that date said Brown has been, and now is, the owner of the property. It is further found:

"That said trust deed last mentioned in favor of said defendant and cross-defendant J. T. Brown was executed, delivered, and recorded prior to the commencement of work or the delivery of any materials upon the premises described herein by any of the plaintiffs or cross-complainants herein."

The foregoing recital of the findings is sufficient to indicate the theory upon which the court declined to subject the property to any lien for the labor and materials furnished by said plaintiffs or to hold the defendant Brown personally liable for said claims.

[1-3] The first point made by appellants is that there is no evidence to sustain the finding as to the ownership of Whittington. The particular contention in that respect is that there was no delivery of the deed from Brown to the grantee. In support of their view they quote from the testimony of Mr. Whittington to the effect that Mr. Brown said he was the owner of the lot; that he (Whittington) never got a deed from Mr. Brown and never saw a deed; that he received nothing for the property and gave nothing for it; "that he had never seen any deed for this property from Mr. Brown to himself; that he never recorded any deed." Appellants assert also that "the evidence shows without conflict that the so-called deed was never in the possession of Whittington, and was at all times in the possession of defendant Brown." Certain cases are cited in support of the position of appellants, but we need not review them, as the necessity for a delivery to consummate the conveyance is not and cannot be disputed. Nor can there be any question that, where the deed is found in the possession of the grantor, this fact is evidence that it was not delivered to the grantee. The trouble is, however, that there is other testimony in the case that places the question of delivery in an entirely different light, and such testimony is sufficient to support the implied finding of the court that the deed was delivered. For instance, the defendant Brown testified:

"I told Whittington that my wife and I would sign the deed and leave it with the Fidelity for them. When I told him I would leave the deed at the Fidelity, he said he would come there and get them when the time came and was ready for them."

It thus appears that by agreement Brown was to leave the deed with the Fidelity—meaning the Fidelity Savings & Loan Company—for Whittington. There is evidence that this was done.

[4] It will not be disputed that, where the grantee directs or agrees that the deed may be left for him with a third party, the delivery to the latter is equivalent to a delivery to the grantee; the third party being thus constituted the grantee's agent for such purpose.

[5] The second contention of appellants is that Brown stated to the lien claimants that he was the owner of the property, and that he is, therefore, now estopped from denying it. If he had made such statements to the lien claimants before they furnished the material, and they had relied upon his assertion of ownership, the principle of estoppel would manifestly apply. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3. But it does not appear that such declaration of Mr. Brown was prior in time, and, besides, he testified substantially that he told these claimants that he had owned the property, but that he then was secured by a trust deed for the payment of $1,850. Hence we are satisfied that appellants cannot prevail upon this ground.

Again, appellants claim with much earnestness that, since Mr. Brown has had the benefit of the flats, "the most elementary principles of common honesty" prevent him from asserting his title in opposition to the claims of those having bestowed upon him such advantage. In this connection quotation is made from various decisions, from which we reproduce from Scott v. Jackson, 89 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 899, the following:

"Where a person tacitly encourages an act to be done, he cannot afterwards exercise his legal right in opposition to such consent, if his conduct or acts of encouragement induced the other party to change his position so that he will be pecuniarily prejudiced by assertion of such adversary claim."

[6, 7] That principle is, of course, well settled, and is embodied in the statute as a rule of conduct. Subdivision 3, § 1962, Code Civ. Proc. But it can be invoked against the legal owner of land to prevent him from asserting his title only when he is chargeable with fraud, actual or constructive, against the opposite party. Treat v. Treat, 170 Cal. 334, 150 Pac. 53, 57. In this case there is no doubt that Brown had knowledge of the fact that said services were performed by plaintiffs, and if they had no notice, either actual or constructive, of his title, and he permitted them to supply said materials for the building without disclosing his ownership, then, manifestly he would be estopped from setting up his title to the prejudice of the claimants. But we must consider this point upon the theory of respondents that, while the services were being performed, with the exception possibly of a portion of the lumber, Brown was not the owner at all, but had conveyed the property to Whittington, and that the deed was a matter of record of which the claimants were required to take notice. In this aspect the case is essentially the same as though A., owning a lot, had conveyed it to B., the deed having been recorded, and thereafter B. built a house upon the lot, obtaining certain materials therefor with the knowledge of A., but without any agreement by the latter to pay for said material; A. having become the owner again after the completion of the building. The statement of the case is sufficient to show that A. would not be precluded from asserting the title which he subsequently acquired. It can make no difference that he originally owned the property, or that his second title was obtained upon the foreclosure of a mortgage or through a sale under a trust deed; it being assumed, of course, that the transaction was free from fraud and conducted in good faith.

Another question of importance is whether the liens of plaintiffs were extinguished by the sale of the premises to Brown under the trust deed. It seems to be the contention of appellants that, in effect and characteristics, said trust deed is similar to a mortgage, and that they had at least the rights of redemptioners. In support of their view they cite MacLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 100, 94 Pac. 605, wherein it was said:

"The nature of such an instrument has been extensively discussed by this court, and the sum and substance of such discussion is that, while the legal title passes thereunder, and the trustees cannot be held to hold a mere 'lien' on the property, it is practically and substantially only a mortgage with power of sale. * * * The legal title is conveyed solely for the purpose of security, leaving in the trustor or his successors a legal estate in the property, as against all persons except the trustees and those lawfully claiming under them."

That was a sufficient definition for the purposes of that case, as the question involved therein was whether the execution of such trust deed operated as an abandonment of a previous declaration of homestead.

But it is clear that between the ordinary mortgage and a trust deed like the one before us there is a vital difference in respect to the equity of redemption. This was recognized in the early decisions in this state, and they have been followed ever since. In Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 257, 73 Am. Dec. 651, in an opinion by Chief Justice Field, it is said that—

"In mortgages there exists the right to foreclosure, after condition broken, and the right of redemption from forfeiture," but in a deed of trust to secure the indebtedness a suit to foreclose would not lie, but "a sale could only be made by enforcing the trust," and "from sales under such trusts, there is no equity of redemption, for there is no forfeiture."

The foregoing is approved in Herbert Kraft Co. v. Bryan, 140 Cal. 73, 73 Pac. 745, wherein it is said:

"This view of the nature of such a trust deed, and the difference between it and a mortgage, has not been departed from, and its validity as an instrument passing title, and not merely creating a lien as a mortgage to be foreclosed, has been constantly upheld"—citing cases.

The latest expression upon the subject which we have found is contained in Metropolis, etc., Sav. Bank v. Barnet, 165 Cal. 449, 132 Pac. 833, a case in its facts quite similar to the one before us. In that case the deed of trust was executed prior to the filing of the mechanics' liens and the debtor defaulted in the payments provided for in the trust deed, and at a sale thereunder the beneficiary became the purchaser of the property. Subsequently, in the mechanic's lien suits, judgment was awarded the lien claimants, making certain sums a lien upon all of the real estate, subject and subordinate, however, to the lien of respondent under the deed of trust, and authorizing the property to be sold. The Supreme Court said:

"But this interest—the interest of Brand in the property [Brand being the original owner]—which was subject to the mechanic's lien and ordered sold and which appellants undertook to have sold, had, even before the judgment in the mechanic's lien suit had been entered, ceased to exist or to be subject to the mechanic's lien judgment by virtue of the trustee's sale and deed to the respondent under its superior and recognized lien. This latter conveyance vested the absolute title in respondent, and thereby effectually destroyed the lien of the mechanic's lien suit judgment."

That the claim of such lien claimants is subject to the right of a mortgagee under a prior mortgage is, indeed, not disputed; the rule being recognized as set forth in Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 84 Pac. 58.

[8] Where the security is in the form of a mortgage, there must, of course, be a foreclosure and sale in order to subject the property to the satisfaction of the debt, and subsequent lienholders may have an opportunity to join in the action and to promote, if possible, a sale for a sufficient amount to satisfy their own as well as the prior claim, and they are also entitled to the right of a redemptioner. Section 701, Code Civ. Proc.; Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 547 70 Am. Dec. 748. In case of a trust deed, however, no suit is required for the sale of the property, there is no right of redemption, and, if the property is sold for no more than sufficient to satisfy the claim of the beneficiary, then the subsequent liens fall. Of course, the subsequent claimants have an opportunity to promote the sale of the property or to purchase it themselves for their own protection, but beyond that, it would seem, they cannot go.

Awarding, therefore, full force and effect to said written instruments and records, according to their apparent intent and purpose, we can find little comfort for appellants. There is, however, another view of the evidence, which seems to place the situation in a different light.

[9] It appears that there was an agreement between Brown and Whittington that the improvement and sale of the lot were to constitute a joint enterprise, and they were to share in whatever profits might be enjoyed. No objection was made to this evidence, and the fair purport of it is that Whittington held the property for the benefit of himself and Brown, and that in making the improvements he represented both parties. He was thereby authorized to bind Brown in making engagements for the construction of the flats. His contract, therefore, became also the contract of Brown. If A. conveys a lot to B. and takes back a deed of trust or mortgage, and there is between them an understanding and agreement that B. is to construct a building, and both are to be equally interested in the property, does it not follow that both are liable for the cost of the building, and is not the building itself subject to a lien for labor done or materials furnished in the absence of the notice provided by section 1192, Code of Civil Procedure? In other words, the parties being jointly interested in the property as a matter of fact, notwithstanding the said conveyance and deed of trust, and each having knowledge that said material was furnished for and was used in said building, and no notice having been given by either that he would not be responsible for the claim, the interest of both, the law says, shall be subject to said claim. Section 1192, supra.

This view, we may add, would compel Brown to pay for the building less than it is apparently worth. He will still get it for some $700 less than it cost. Defendant A. F. Whittington testified that he and defendant Brown agreed that the cost of the building, according to the plans furnished by said Brown, would be between $6,500 and $7,000. The actual cost for materials and labor was $6,175. Nothing was paid for superintending the construction of the building, and there was no compensation paid to the contractor. The actual money paid out for the construction of the building for materials and labor was $3,613.80.

To show the ground for this conclusion, we call attention to the evidence on the subject. Mr. Whittington testified:

That he was taken to Brown's office by another Mr. Brown, and that the former produced some plans and asked him if he could build that house, and he told him he could; that Brown said he drew up the plans himself with the assistance of his wife; "that it was agreed the price of the building would run somewhere between $6,500 and $7,000; that he told him that he owned the lot and asked him to go out and look at it; that he went into the figures with Mr. Brown to see what it would cost; that Brown said that it would take $2,500 to pay off the mortgage on the lot; that he (Whittington) said he did not have the money to pay it off; Brown said he could arrange that; that Brown said if they could get together on it they could go ahead and make a good clean-up on it, make some money; that he (Brown) said that he would take care of all the bills if he (Whittington) could get a 30-days' credit for a little bill of sale that would be left with the lumber yard; that they went ahead and constructed the building; that it was finished about October 24; that he went there on that date and found three apartments rented; that Brown said he was owner of the lot; that nobody else ever claimed it; that he apparently purchased the lot, but that it was intended that Mr. Brown and he would be together, and that they would make a clean-up of it at the finish; that if they were to get the building built they would trade it or sell it at a good advantage; that they were to share the profits in the deal; that he never received any of the $1,800 trust deed money; that he was on the job working all the time; that Mr. Brown was to finance the deal absolutely."

He was not contradicted as to the agreement to treat the project as a joint enterprise and to share the profits. Mr. Brown, as a witness, did not deny it, and the conduct of the parties confirms the theory that Brown and Whittington were to be equally concerned in the property. For that reason Brown did not require of Whittington the payment of any of the so-called purchase price of the lot nor did the latter concern himself about the delivery of the deed from Brown and his wife. In consonance with this view, Brown O. K'd the bills, and told various parties that he was the owner of the property.

[10] Viewing the whole record we think it appears without substantial conflict that Whittington represented both himself and Brown in ordering the material for said building, that they were both equally bound for said indebtedness, and that the finding of the court to the contrary is unsupported.

Of course, if Brown had denied that there was such an agreement as Whittington testified to, the case would present a different aspect. But, as we have said, it stands uncontradicted, and it cannot be ignored.

We are satisfied the trial court was in error in relieving Brown of all responsibility for these claims, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 18, 1920.)

Habeas corpus 109—Petitioner remanded where he admits being in custody under bench warrant issued on indictment.

Where petitioner for habeas corpus in open court concedes that if the return which the sheriff proposes making were filed it would show, in accordance with the facts, that petitioner is lawfully in the custody of the sheriff, under a bench warrant issued on an indictment filed by the grand jury, the writ will be discharged and petitioner remanded.

In the matter of the application of John Lapique for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner, in open court, concedes that if the return which the sheriff proposes making were filed it would show, in accordance with the facts, that petitioner is lawfully in the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county under a bench warrant issued on an indictment heretofore filed by the grand jury.

The writ therefore is discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Habeas corpus ⇨54—Petition raising inference of restraint under process held insufficient.

Petition for habeas corpus on the ground of the legal insufficiency of the process issued in a contempt proceeding to afford justification for petitioner's further confinement thereunder, which did not assert that the process in the contempt proceeding constituted the only or the sole ground of detention by the sheriff, and from which it was inferable that petitioner was lawfully in the custody of the sheriff under a warrant based upon a grand jury indictment charging him with the commission of a public offense, held not sufficient to show petitioner unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner's claim that he is illegally held in custody by the sheriff of Los Angeles county is based entirely, in so far as this particular habeas corpus proceeding is concerned, upon the legal insufficiency of process issued in a contempt proceeding to afford justification for his further confinement thereunder. He does not assert that such process issued in said contempt proceeding constitutes the only or sole ground of retention by the sheriff. It is fairly inferable from the allegations of his petition that he is lawfully in the custody of said sheriff under a warrant based upon a grand jury indictment charging him with the commission of a public offense. Of course, if he is lawfully held in custody by the sheriff under process issued upon the indictment he is not entitled to his release on habeas corpus, whatever be the situation with regard to the warrant issued in the contempt proceeding. As it stands the petition does not show that the petitioner is by the sheriff of Los Angeles county unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty.

The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

OLINSKY v. RAILWAY MAIL ASS'N.
(S. F. 8719.)(Supreme Court of California. April 16, 1920.
Rehearing Denied May 13, 1920.)1. Insurance ⇨455 — Overexertion not "accidental means of death."

Overexertion is not an accidental means of death within accident policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accident.]

2. Insurance ⇨455—Distinction between "accidental death" and "death by accidental means" stated.

Where the death is the result of some act, but was not designed, and not anticipated by the deceased, though it be in consequence of some act voluntarily done by him, it is accidental death, but where death is caused by some act of the deceased not designed by him or not intentionally done by him, it is death by accidental means.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accident.]

3. Insurance ⇨719(1) — Amendment of by-laws so as to define accidental death not applicable to previously issued certificate.

The amendment of by-laws of fraternal association so as to define "accidental death" did not affect previously issued certificate insuring the member against death by accidental means, and not "accidental death," and which did not use such term.

4. Insurance ⇨719(1)—By-law provision held applicable to death by accidental means rather than accidental death.

Amendment of by-laws so as to entitle beneficiary to specified amount "upon suitable proof of the death by accident alone within one hundred and eighty days after the occurrence of such accident" held applicable to death by accidental means of injury rather than to accidental death.

5. Insurance ⇨719(1) — Terms of certificate not to be changed by amendment of by-laws.

Amended by-laws of fraternal society should not be construed to completely change the terms of the certificate concerning the nature of the casualty insured against.

6. Insurance ⇨787—Death from hemorrhages caused by swimming against current not result of "accidental means."

Where insured, who was apparently in good health, but was suffering from tuberculosis, sustained a hemorrhage while swimming against a strong current, and died within a month as the result of violent and successive hemorrhages, the death did not result from "accidental means" within certificate insuring against death from injuries received through "accidental means."

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by William Olinsky against the Railway Mail Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edgar D. Peixotto, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, a beneficiary, to recover for death under an accident insurance certificate issued July 27, 1908, to Nathan Olinsky by the defendant, a fraternal beneficial order. In 1913 certain by-laws were enacted by the association which were in force at the time of the death of the insured, which plaintiff claims modified the certificate. On June 19, 1915, while at a summer resort on the Russian river, the insured, who was then apparently in perfect health, entered the river for a swim. The only witness to the incident testified that he attempted to swim up stream against a very strong current, and after swimming eight or ten strokes returned to the shore, bleeding from the mouth. The water was not more than 4½ feet deep and the deceased was 5 feet 8 inches in height. There was no evidence of slipping or other similar accident. The hemorrhage continued for some time and was followed by others. The insured was brought to San Francisco, placed in a hospital, and died on July 9, 1915. The cause of his death was the violent and successive hemorrhages which, so far as the evidence shows, began at the time mentioned.

The deceased had been suffering for some time with tuberculosis. From June 18, 1914, to July 28, 1914, he was an inmate of a sanitarium for tubercular patients, but had apparently fully recovered. However, the autopsy showed that he was suffering from tuberculosis at the time of his death.

There is no evidence of overexertion other than the natural inference from the testimony that the deceased swam eight or ten strokes in the face of a very strong current in the river and immediately came ashore with a hemorrhage from the lungs, which in his condition might result from sudden and violent overexertion. Under the evidence the verdict of the jury must be held to have established the inference that the death was the result of sudden and violent overexertion at the time in question. It remains to be determined, in the absence of any other evidence as to accidental means of injury, whether this conclusion is sufficient to justify the verdict. It may be conceded that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict of the jury under the instruction of the court defining an accident or casualty as follows:

"A casualty—something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly and without any design on the part of the person injured"

—this language being taken from Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 170, 175, 26 Pac. 762, 763, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455, and covering what is known in accident insurance law as an accidental death, as differentiated from a death by accidental means. The jury was justified in finding that the first hemorrhage was accidental in the sense that it was "something out of the usual course of events, and which happens suddenly and unexpectedly and without any design on the part of the person injured," but the insured was doing exactly what he intended to do, and, if the contract of insurance is the same as there considered, it brings the case within the principle of Rock v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 172 Cal. 462, 156 Pac. 1029, L. R. A. 1916E, 1196, where a pallbearer in lifting a heavy casket down a narrow stairway collapsed and almost immediately died from acute dilatation of the heart due to overexertion. The court there said:

"Rock undertook to carry a heavy casket down a flight of stairs. In carrying it he did not slip or stumble nor did the casket fall against him. The entire operation was carried out in precisely the manner intended and designed by Rock. The exertion which he thus assumed was, however, beyond his strength, and imposed upon his vital organs a burden which, as it turned out, they could not bear. The result of this exertion was a dilatation of the heart and death. On these facts, which appear in the record without substantial conflict, it cannot be said that the plaintiff sustained a burden which was on her of proving that the death of the insured was caused by bodily injuries effected through accidental means."

[1] In other words, overexertion is not an accidental means of death. It has been so held in the following cases: Pervangher v. Union Casualty & Surety Co., 85 Miss. 31, 37 South. 461; Niskern v. United Brotherhood, etc., 93 App. Div. 364, 87 N. Y. Supp. 640; Appel v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 86 App. Div. 83, 83 N. Y. Supp. 238; Id., 180 N. Y. 514, 72 N. E. 1139; Shanberg v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 158 Fed. 1, 85 C. A. 343, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1206, lifting heavy weight. See note to latter case 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1206. The rule is thus stated in 1 C. J. 429, § 73:

"An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action cannot be said to be produced by accidental means. This rule has been applied to death or injuries caused by or resulting from ordinary exertion, carrying heavy baggage, lifting heavy weights, contact with a poisonous substance, jumping from a railroad car, reaching out to close a window, resisting arrest, riding a bicycle, stooping, or sunstroke."

[2] The distinction between accidental death and death by accidental means is carefully pointed out in Pledger v. Business Men's Ass'n of Texas (Tex. Civ. App.) 197 S. W. 889, where it is held that death resulting from the lifting of heavy cotton bales was an accidental death, but not a death resulting from accidental means. The uniform rule on the subject is thus well stated in that case:

"Where the death is the result of some act, but was not designed and not anticipated by the deceased, though it be in consequence of some act voluntarily done by him, it is accidental death. Where death is caused by some act of the deceased not designed by him, or not intentionally done by him, it is death by accidental means. In other words, accidental death is an unintended and undesigned result, arising from acts done; death by accidental means is where the result arises from acts unintentionally done."

The importance of this distinction in this case arises from the fact that the certificate covers injuries received—

"through external violent and accidental means which shall wholly and continuously disable the insured. * * *

"3. If death result from such injuries alone within one hundred and twenty days."

Or, to put it in the language of the authorities, the insurance is against death resulting from "accidental means," and not accidental death. See Postler v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 173 Cal. 1, 158 Pac. 1022. But it is contended by respondent that by-law XVII, added in 1913, amended the contract of insurance so as to cover "accidental death," as defined by the above cases. This section reads as follows:

"Accidental Death Defined.—Accidental death shall be construed to be either sudden violent death from external causes, not the result of the member's own vicious conduct, or death within one hundred and eighty days from injuries received by accident alone."

The other provisions of the by-laws added after the certificate was issued to the insured and relied upon by the respondent as a basis of recovery, and as a part of the contract of insurance, is as follows:

"Upon suitable proof of the death by accident alone within one hundred and eighty days after the occurrence of such accident of any member of the beneficiary department of this association, the beneficiary named in the certificate of said member shall receive from the benefit fund the sum of four thousand dollars."

[3, 4] The pleadings admit that the by-laws were amended as alleged by the plaintiff, but deny that such by-laws were applicable to the decedent. No evidence was introduced to show such applicability, nor were the other by-laws offered in evidence. We are therefore under the necessity of determining the applicability of these by-laws without reference to such other provisions or other evidence which might clarify their meaning. Article XVII defines the term "accidental death." In the certificate of insurance issued to decedent we look in vain for the phrase "accidental death." This by-law, therefore, defining the term "accidental death," has no application either to the language or to the substantial effect of the certificate issued to the decedent. It may be that at the time of the amendment to the by-laws the appellant was issuing certificates in which the phrase "accidental death" was used, or article XVIII may have been adopted to interpret such phrase used elsewhere in the by-laws or in the constitution. Whether or not this is the fact is not disclosed by the evidence, but it is sufficient to say that the definition has no application to the certificate insuring the decedent; for a definition of "accidental death" could have no applicability to a certificate which did not insure "accidental death" or use the term, nor could such a definition have the effect of changing the terms of such a contract to which it is not applicable. The other amendment to the by-laws that "on suitable proof of death by accident alone within one hundred and eighty days after the occurrence of such accident" seems to apply to accidental means of injury rather than accidental death, and evidently refers to the provision of by-law XVII defining accidental death as "death within one hundred and eighty days from injuries received by accident alone." In such case it is not the death which is a sudden and unforeseen casualty, but the accidental means which may have occurred 180 days before death. If, however, we assume the correctness of the respondent's position that these new provisions of the by-laws apply to the decedent, they must be construed with the terms of the certificate, and, when so construed, it is evident that the phrase "accident alone" must refer to the means of injury; for it is such accidents alone that are insured against.

[5] The amended by-laws should not be construed to completely change the terms of the certificate concerning the nature of the casualty insured against. If, therefore, the phrase "death by accident alone" in the by-law has not the same legal effect as the terms of the certificate insuring against death by accidental means, when construed with the certificate, the whole contract must be so interpreted, although the certificate of the insured provides that it is subject to future by-laws. We hold that by-law XVII does not apply to such certificate, and that the other by-law, even if applicable, does not change the certificate in so far as the casualty insured is injury or death by accidental means. Whether the death benefit is $3,000, as provided in the certificate, or $4,000, as stated in the by-law, we consider doubtful, but do not deem it necessary to pass on the matter under the very meager and incomplete evidence in the record with reference to such by-laws, believing that additional evidence on a new trial will clarify that matter.

[6] The evidence fails to sustain a conclusion that the death of the insured resulted from accidental means, and the instructions of the court to the general effect that the appellant could recover if the death was accidental, and also in giving the jury by-law XVII as a part of the insurance contract, were erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

HENRY COWELL LIME & CEMENT CO. v. WILLIAMS, County Auditor. (Sac. 2857.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1920.)

1. Highways § 113(4)—Right to compensation for materials not dependent on validity of improvement proceedings.

Under St. 1907, p. 669, § 9, providing relative to the improvement of highways thereunder that, as soon as funds from the sale of bonds are in the treasury, the Highway Commission shall prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the work to be done or such parts of it as they deem advisable to have done separately, where it was determined that the county would purchase cement separately and furnish it to the contractor, the right of the seller of the cement to payment did not depend upon the validity of proceedings leading up to the highway improvement, but on whether the contract of sale was a valid contract.

2. Highways § 113(3)—Materials can only be purchased after advertisement and from lowest bidder.

Under St. 1907, p. 669, § 9, providing relative to the improvement of highways thereunder that the board of supervisors shall advertise for bids for doing the work or any part thereof which the Highway Commission recommends shall be done separately, if the board may segregate the work so as to make the furnishing of cement a separate and distinct contract, the purchase of the cement should be made after advertisement and from the lowest bidder.

3. Highways § 113(3)—Statute does not dispense with advertisement under contract by purchasing agent for cement for highway; "all other supplies."

St. 1913, p. 667, adding subdivisions 21 and 22 to section 4041 of the Political Code, and authorizing the employment of a purchasing agent to purchase certain county supplies and all other personal property or supplies, and providing that it shall not be necessary to advertise for bids for furnishing county supplies as required by section 4048, does not dispense with the advertisement for bids in purchasing cement for highway improvement, as the clause "and all other supplies" is limited by the context to ordinary county supplies.

4. Highways § 113(3)—Contract for cement without advertisement void and will not support recovery.

A contract by a county purchasing agent for cement for highway improvement, having been made without advertising for bids in violation of the express requirement of the statutes, is void, and the seller cannot recover thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Application by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company for a writ of mandate directed to L. P. Williams, as Auditor of the County of Sacramento. From a judgment denying the application, the petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying an application for a writ of mandate to require the respondent auditor to draw a warrant upon a claim for cement furnished by the petitioner to the county of Sacramento, which claim has been duly approved by the board of supervisors. The cement was purchased by the purchasing agent of the county without advertising for bids, for the purpose of constructing certain highways in the county of Sacramento. The improvement of these highways was provided for by a county bond issue of $1,750,000 at an election held under the provisions of the Statutes of 1907, p. 666, authorizing the calling of such election. The bonds were sold and the proceeds thereof paid into the county treasury. The petitioner furnished the cement upon the orders of the purchasing agent of the county, who made such purchase in pursuance of a requisition by the Highway Commission upon the supervisors and by them authorized. The purchase was made upon the written request from the purchasing agent to the petitioner to furnish bids. The statute authorizing the performance of the work provided that—

"As soon as the funds raised by the sale of said bonds are in the treasury the commission shall proceed to prepare detailed specifications, plans and profiles for the work to be done, or for such parts of it as they deem it advisable to have done separately * * * and they shall then present said specifications, plans and profiles, with their recommendations in regard to the doing of the work and letting of contracts to the board of supervisors, who shall either adopt or reject the same as presented." Stats. 1907, p. 669, § 9.

Respondent claims that no such plans and profiles, as provided by the statute, were prepared or adopted by the board of supervisors, and that therefore the county was without jurisdiction to order the cement in question. The proof shows that the specifications for the cement required were prepared and adopted by the board of supervisors, and that the specifications for the performance of the work were also prepared and adopted. The general nature and character of the improvement were set forth in the report made by the Highway Commission to the board of supervisors before the election upon the bond issue, and contemplated the improvement of the highways by a concrete base five or more inches in thickness and an asphalt surface. It having been determined by the board of supervisors that the county would furnish the cement to the contractor, no plans or profiles were necessary for the purpose of determining the kind or quality of cement to be used in the concrete base which was provided in the original plan of the Highway Commission and adopted by the voters at the election.

[1] The first question is whether or not the adoption of plans and profiles before entering into any contract for the furnishing of materials was a jurisdictional prerequisite, and, if not, whether or not the county was authorized by law to purchase cement for the purposes stated and in the manner in which it was undertaken to be done. In proceedings under the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147) and similar statutes for the improvement of streets and assessing the cost thereof upon the property benefited thereby, it is necessary to strictly conform to the requirements of the statute in adopting the plans and specifications, and in the event of a failure so to do the contract for the performance of the work and assessments made or bonds issued for the payment thereof are void. Fay v. Reed, 128 Cal. 357, 60 Pac. 927; Bay Rock Co. v. Bell, 133 Cal. 150, 65 Pac. 299; McDonnell v. Gillon, 134 Cal. 329, 66 Pac. 314; Williamson v. Joyce, 137 Cal. 107, 69 Pac. 854. But the question involved in this case is entirely different. The money is already in the county treasury. So far as the persons who performed work or furnished materials for the improvement in question are concerned, it merely represents a fund properly applicable to the expenses of improving the highways. The right of the petitioner to a warrant for the claim for cement, approved by the board of supervisors, does not depend upon the validity of the proceedings leading up to the improvement of the highway, but depends upon the question of whether or not the petitioner's contract with the county, made through the purchasing agent, was a valid contract. This question turns upon the provisions of the statutes for the improvement of these highways, construed in connection with the provisions of the Political Code regulating the powers and duties of the various county officers. The first question is whether or not the statute authorizes the board of supervisors to segregate the various portions of the work into separate contracts and to treat the furnishing of cement as a separate and distinct contract authorizing the purchase of such cement as an independent portion of the entire scheme of improvement.

[2] The statute reads:

"If the board adopts the same they shall thereupon advertise for bids for doing said work, or any part thereof which the highway commission recommend should be done separately, in accordance with said plans, profiles, and specifications, by publishing a notice," etc.

If the furnishing of material can be treated as a part of the work within the meaning of this clause, then the general plan of improvement, coupled with the specifications for cement, would be a sufficient foundation for the advertising for bids for such cement. It is next provided that—

"Every contract for doing any part of said work shall be let, after advertisement as above provided, to the lowest responsible bidder," etc.

It is conceded that the contract for the cement furnished by the petitioner was not let after advertisement to the lowest responsible bidder. The statute makes provision for such purchase as follows:

"Provided however, that the board may authorize the Highway Commission to make a contract, without advertisement, for any part of said work the cost of which does not exceed $1,000."

In this case the requisition was for 2,000 barrels of cement, the purchase price of which was over $2 per barrel. The statute also authorizes the rejection of all bids, and the performance of the work by the Highway Commission upon the authority of the board of supervisors, as follows:

"And provided further, that the board may reject all bids and may thereupon readvertise for bids for doing any part or the whole of said work, or in their discretion authorize the Highway Commission to purchase the necessary material, purchase or hire tools and appliances, and hire laborers, and to do the work or any part thereof without letting any contract therefor. In such case all contracts for materials, tools or appliances, amounting to more than one thousand dollars in value shall be let by the commission to the lowest responsible bidder, after advertisement as above provided."

The supervisors in the present instance decided that the county should purchase the cement and furnish the same to the contractor, thus commingling the two methods of procedure, one by contract and the other without contract. But in either case, so far as material is concerned, it was essential that the purchase should be after advertisement and from the lowest responsible bidder. It is conceded that this was not done. For the purpose of this decision we may assume that the supervisors had a right to so segregate the highway work as to make the furnishing of cement a separate and distinct contract. This view seems to be sustained by our decision in Perry v. Los Angeles, 157 Cal. 146, 150, 106 Pac. 410.

[3] Petitioner, however, claims that the statute of 1907 requiring the purchase of supplies from the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement is modified by the provisions of the statute authorizing the employment of a purchasing agent for the county and fixing his duties, added to section 4041 by amendment of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 667, § 4041, subds. 21, 22), which reads as follows:

"21. To employ a purchasing agent, whose duties shall be to purchase for the county and the offices thereof all stationery, clothing, bedding, groceries, provisions, drugs, medicines, furnish machinery, implements, and all other personal property or supplies, the same to be purchased only upon a proper requisition therefor; also employ for said purchasing agent such assistants as may be necessary for him to properly fulfill his duty.

"22. Whenever a board of supervisors shall employ a purchasing agent as herein provided for it shall not be necessary for them to advertise for bids for furnishing county supplies as provided in section 4048 of the Political Code, with the exception of advertising."

Previous to the adoption of this amendment, the method of securing supplies for the county was by annual advertisement as required by the provisions of section 4048 of the Political Code, which was substantially the same as the County Government Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 464, § 25, subd. 21). This scheme called for a general advertisement for all sorts of supplies furnished to the county, the bids so received to be a basis of subsequent purchases to be made during the year as needed by the county officials. This section, and a similar statute preceding the same, have been construed in a number of instances. Swasey v. County of Shasta, 141 Cal. 392, 395, 74 Pac. 1031; County of Riverside v. Yawman & Erbe Mfg. Co., 3 Cal. App. 691, 86 Pac. 900; People v. Nellis, 14 Cal. App. 252, 111 Pac. 631; Sarver v. County of Los Angeles, 156 Cal. 188, 103 Pac. 917. See, also, Vale v. Boyle, 179 Cal. 180, 175 Pac. 787. Subdivision 22, supra, simply authorizes the purchasing agent to purchase "stationery, clothing, bedding, groceries, provisions, drugs, medicines and all other supplies" mentioned in section 4048, Political Code, without the annual advertisement therefor, as therein provided. The clause "and all other supplies," if not limited by the other provisions of the section in which it is found, would be broad enough to cover cement furnished to the Highway Commission. But under the cases last cited the phrase "and all other supplies" is limited by the context of section 4048 to ordinary county supplies, and would not apply to the furnishing of a large amount of cement for the carrying out of a specially authorized highway improvement. In accordance with this view, it has been held that it would not apply to furnishings for a county courthouse (County of Riverside v. Yawman & Erbe Mfg. Co., supra; People v. Nellis, supra), or to furnishings or jail fixtures (Sarver v. County of Los Angeles, supra), or to the erection of a fence, or, under similar provisions in the charter of San Francisco, to the purchase of automobile busses to be used as a public utility. The provisions of subdivision 21, supra, are broader than the original section 4048, in that it includes the furnishing of machinery, implements, and all other "personal property." There is no express provision contained in subdivisions 21 and 22 with relation to the method of furnishing machinery, implements, and other personal property except the provision that it shall be done upon a proper requisition therefor. Nothing in this method of purchase is inconsistent with the plan of advertising for such property and letting a contract therefor to the lowest bidder.

[4] It follows that the purchasing agent, under the new scheme of purchasing contemplated by subdivisions 21 and 22 of section 4041, Political Code, must advertise for cement in the manner provided by the act authorizing the purchase (Stats. 1907, p. 666, § 9, above quoted), though he need not do this annually or for the supplies, etc., covered by section 4048, Political Code. Subdivision 22 does not purport to authorize the purchasing agent to purchase personal property without advertisement where such property is not covered by section 4048, and where such an advertisement is required by the statute authorizing the purchase. As we held in Vale v. Boyle, supra, the contracts for the purchase of personal property are proper without advertisement, notwithstanding a general provision requiring advertisement for supplies similar in terms to section 4048 of the Political Code. There is no method pointed out for the purchase of personal property in the amendment of 1913 to section 4041, Political Code, adding subdivisions 21 and 22. There is therefore no conflict between the statute of 1907 requiring the letting of contracts after advertisement to the lowest responsible bidder, and the later statute which is silent upon that subject. The purchasing agent was not authorized to purchase the cement in question except from the lowest responsible bidder after advertisement as required by section 9, supra. The contract between the petitioner and the purchasing agent acting for the county, having been made in violation of the express requirement of the statute, is void, and the petitioner cannot recover thereon. Walton v. McPhetridge, 120 Cal. 440, 52 Pac. 731; Reams v.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Hardwood & Manufacturing Company against Laura E. Borton and C. F. Borton, her husband, in which C. C. Hurd intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants and the intervenor appeal. Affirmed.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. On the 22d day of January, 1917, defendant Laura E. Borton was building a house upon a described lot in the city of Los Angeles. At the same time the plaintiff was the manufacturer for sale of various kinds and classes of wall beds. The defendant Laura E. Borton, being desirous of having installed in the house that she was building certain wall beds that were being manufactured and sold by the plaintiff, entered into a written contract with it in and by which it agreed to and did install in said house 77 Murphy beds. The agreement is a long one, and it will not be necessary for the decision of the case to set it out in full. The following quotations from it are deemed sufficient for a determination of the controversy: After reciting that Laura E. Borton desired to purchase from the plaintiff the wall beds, but was unable to pay for them at that time, it proceeds:

"Whereas, both parties are agreeable that the seller deliver to the proposed purchaser the said wall beds with the understanding that the sale is not complete until the beds are paid for in full, in cash, and with the further specific understanding that until they are so paid for in

1. Sales Ⓒ454—Contract held conditional.

A contract for sale of wall beds, held a conditional contract under which title did not pass until payment, and not an absolute sale.

2. Fixtures Ⓒ27(1)—Where parties agreed that title to wall beds should not pass, they did not become fixtures.

Where the parties agreed that title to wall beds should not pass until the purchaser's payment, such beds as between the purchaser and the seller did not, under Civ. Code, § 1013, become fixtures, though installed and attached to building.

actual cash, they shall remain the property of the seller," the seller promises to install the said beds in a building to be erected by the purchaser upon certain real estate in Los Angeles, describing it.

And then it is said:

"It is agreed the proposed purchaser shall pay to the seller the sum of $2,184.00, payable as follows: $873.69 when beds are delivered and installed, and $1,310.40 in sixty days thereafter."

Proceeding, the agreement says:

"This agreement is made with the specific following understandings which are the material inducements leading the seller to accept the same and to deliver and install said beds for the proposed purchaser without payment in advance. That the title to said beds and each and every one of them, shall remain in the said Southern California Hardwood & Manufacturing Company until the said full purchase price is paid in cash."

It also provided:

"Should any installment of the purchase price not be paid when due, then the whole of said purchase price unpaid shall become immediately due and payable at seller's option. If the proposed purchaser fails to pay any installment of the said purchase price, or upon any other default hereunder or breach hereof on the part of the proposed purchaser, the seller shall have the right of recaption and may, without let or hindrance, retake said beds into its own possession to be its own property, and for that purpose it shall have the privilege and right to enter said building and detach and remove said beds and carry them away as its own property."

It is further provided:

"Upon payment of full purchase price as herein called for, the seller shall execute and deliver to the proposed purchaser a bill of sale transferring title from the seller to the proposed purchaser. * * *

"The failure of the seller to exercise its right of recaption at any time it may have the right to do so herein, shall not be a waiver of its said right, and at any time thereafter it may so exercise its right of recaption without demand or notice."

The defendant Laura E. Borton having made default in the payment of the installments due, as provided by said contract, the plaintiff, after demand for the money due and demand for the possession of the property, brought this action to recover possession thereof. One C. C. Hurd filed complaint in intervention in said action, claiming that he was the owner of all of said beds. His right of ownership was based upon the fact that on September 29, 1917, the defendant Laura E. Borton and her husband had executed and delivered to him a grant deed to the real estate upon which said building was located; that said 77 wall beds were, as claimed by him, a part of the realty and attached to and made a part of said building; and that by virtue of said deed he became and is the owner of all of said wall beds.

After trial, the court filed its findings and conclusions of law, finding that the plaintiff was the owner of all of said beds, and had the right to the possession thereof, and that neither the defendant Borton, nor the intervenor Hurd, had any right to retain the possession thereof. It made a lengthy finding, which is numbered finding 7, describing said wall beds in detail, the manner in which they were installed in the house, their manner of operation, and to what extent, if any, they were attached to the building, and closed said finding with this:

"The court finds that the beds described in the complaint were not at any time attached permanently to the building nor did they become, nor are they now, a part of the building. The court finds that the beds in this case are personal, movable property."

The court also made this finding:

"That said real estate and building were conveyed to the said intervenor with the understanding and knowledge that he represented certain of the creditors of the defendants, and was with the agreement that the said intervenor was to retain the legal title to said property, operate the same, and sell the same, and if there was any excess above certain obligations due to said creditors, that such excess would be paid over to the defendants"—and entered judgment for plaintiff for the possession of the beds or their value.

The defendants and the intervenor appeal from the judgment.

[1] The intervenor claims that the contract entered into between the plaintiff and Mrs. Borton in reference to the wall beds was not a conditional sale contract, but was a present sale of the property from the plaintiff to her. We are unable to accede to this claim. The contract between them seems to have been drawn with consummate skill, and a reading of it leads to the conclusion beyond question that no title passed or could pass from the plaintiff to the property until it was fully paid for. This is stated emphatically in numerous parts of the lengthy contract with clearness and emphasis. We deem it unnecessary to enter into an elaborate discussion of its terms, or to cite authorities, because the matter seems to us very clear that the contract was simply one of conditional sale of the property, and that the title did not pass and could not until full payment was made.

[2] The briefs of counsel on both sides contain very able and illuminating discussions of when personal property becomes so much attached to real estate as to become a part thereof and be immovable. In the view we take of the case it will be unnecessary to follow this argument, or to determine whether the finding of the court that the beds, as installed in the house, were personal property is sustained by the evidence. Whether they were personal property, or became a part of the realty, under the contract between plaintiff and Mrs. Borton, the plaintiff, upon nonpayment of the installments as they became due, had the right to remove them from the house.

Section 1013 of the Civil Code provides:

"When a person affixes his property to the land of another, without an agreement permitting him to remove it, the thing affixed, except as provided in section ten hundred and nineteen, belongs to the owner of the land, unless he chooses to require the former to remove it."

The converse of this is equally true that, when a person affixes his property to the land of another with an agreement permitting him to remove it, the thing affixed does not belong to the owner of the land. So, by virtue of the contract between the plaintiff and Mrs. Borton, giving it the right to remove these beds unless they were paid for, the plaintiff, as between it and said defendants, was acting within the terms of the written contract in attempting to remove the beds, and if they were the only parties interested in this case it would have the clear right to the judgment, as given by the court, to the possession of the beds or their value. This point is clear, and it seems to us to be indisputable.

[3] We think it equally clear that the intervenor has no defense to this action brought by the plaintiff for the possession of the property. It is to be observed that the finding of the court above quoted, to the effect that the real estate was conveyed to the intervenor with the understanding that he represented certain of the creditors of the defendant, and with the agreement that he was to retain the title to the property, sell the same, and if there was any excess above certain obligations due to said creditors, that such excess would be paid to the defendant, is fully sustained by the evidence. In fact, the finding is almost a repetition in narrative form of the testimony of the intervenor himself. The situation then is that, while holding the legal title, he is the voluntary assignee of the defendants to the property, including the beds, for the benefit of their creditors, with the distinct agreement that, after selling the property, whatever excess there might be is by him to be paid over to them. This being his relation to the property, he has no greater rights therein than his grantors would have had had such conveyance not been made. This principle of law is very clearly enunciated in the case of Francisco v. Aguirre, 94 Cal. at page 180, 29 Pac. 495. In that case it appeared that one Mrs. Edmondston, being the owner of certain furniture, executed a bill of sale thereof to Martha O'Hara, but did not deliver possession. Thereafter Mrs. O'Hara made a demand on her for the possession of the furniture, and, being refused such possession, she began an action of claim and delivery therefor. At the time of the making of the bill of sale to Mrs. O'Hara, Mrs. Edmondston was indebted to various parties, and on the morning of February 2d made an assignment to the plaintiff for the benefit of creditors. Mrs. O'Hara brought a replevin suit against Mrs. Edmondston to recover the property, and the sheriff took possession of it. The plaintiff then, as assignee of Mrs. Edmondston, and representing her creditors, sued the sheriff and Mrs. O'Hara for the property, claiming that he had right to it on the ground that the sale to Mrs. O'Hara as against the creditors of Mrs. Edmondston was void for want of delivery and possession. The court, in commenting upon this situation, said:

"Upon the execution of the bill of sale to Mrs. O'Hara, the title to the property therein vested in her; and, although, without an actual delivery and a continued change of possession, such title could not be asserted by her against the creditors of her vendor, yet, as between the parties to the instrument, she could at any time maintain an action to recover the possession from her vendor, irrespective of such non-delivery. The plaintiff, as the voluntary assignee of Mrs. Edmondston, acquired no greater right in the property than she had at the time of the assignment.

"Upon the principle that an assignor cannot confer upon his assignee any greater right than he himself had in the property, it is held, in an almost unbroken line of authorities, that, in the absence of any statute giving such power, the assignee cannot maintain an action to recover property that had been conveyed by his assignor in fraud of his creditors. This rule rests upon the ground that the assignee is merely the representative of his assignor, and does not represent the creditors.

"Under the common law of assignments, the assignee stands in the place of the assignor, and can assert no claim to property which the assignor might not. The assignment, therefore, does not carry with it to the trustee the title to property which the assignor had previously transferred in fraud of his creditors, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding them."

See, also, Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 305, 53 Pac. 911, 59 Pac. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371; First National Bank v. Menke, 128 Cal. 105, 60 Pac. 675; Babcock v. Chase, 111 Cal. 351, 43 Pac. 1105.

The intervenor, as the voluntary assignee of the defendant Mrs. Borton to the property, to be sold by him for the benefit of her creditors, the balance to be paid over to her, has no greater rights to this property than she had at the date of this assignment, and is not a purchaser for value. As the defendant Mrs. Borton has no legal right, by virtue of the terms of her contract, she having defaulted in the payment, to withhold possession of the property from the plaintiff, neither has the intervenor, under the circumstances, and the judgment of the court—regardless of whether the property continued to be personal property, or was so affixed to the building as to become a part thereof—awarding the possession thereof to the plaintiff, is in harmony with the findings and the law applicable thereto.

[4] The appellant raises the point that, because the plaintiff did not exercise its right to take possession of the property immediately upon default in the payment thereof, that it is estopped from exercising such right, especially against the intervenor in this case; but this suggestion is fully answered by the provisions of the contract itself, above quoted, wherein it is provided:

"The failure of the seller to exercise its right of recaption at any time it may have the right to do so herein, shall not be a waiver of its said right, and at any time thereafter it may so exercise its right of recaption without demand or notice."

We think the judgment is in accordance with the law and the facts and the same is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing is denied.

[5] In order that the effect of the decision may not be misunderstood, we deem it necessary to add some details not given in the opinion of the district court. In the house in question certain fixtures were attached to the closet doors and to the floors of the closets in the rooms in which the beds in question were installed, by means of which the beds, which were the subject in controversy in the action, could be placed in the closet and hooked onto the aforesaid fixtures. The effect was that when the closet door was opened the bed would swing around into the room, whereupon, by letting it down upon the floor, it was ready for use. The beds were not built in the wall with the house, nor were they a necessary part of the house itself. They could be taken out without unscrewing any screws or removing any fixtures, and the house would remain habitable as before, except that it was not furnished with beds. It is obvious, therefore, that they were not affixed to the building in the ordinary sense of the word so as to become a part of the realty as between the person who sold the same, retaining title in himself, and a subsequent purchaser of the house without notice of such reserved title. These beds were not fixtures, but were a part of the furniture of the house, not essentially different from beds of any other description. So far as the opinion of the district court places the affirmation upon the proposition that the plaintiff would have effectually retained title to the property as against the defendants, even if the beds had been built in or permanently affixed to the house, we are of the opinion that the question was not involved in the case and was unnecessary to the decision, and we withhold approval of the expressions therein to that effect.

All concur.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 301(1)—Doctrine of ostensible agency will be applied in tort case only in exceptional circumstances to prevent manifest injustice.

An automobile company held not liable, on the doctrine of ostensible agency, resting in estoppel in pais, for the negligent driving of its salesman on commission, an independent contractor, resulting in injury to his customer riding with him in his auto; for application of the doctrine to a tort the case must be characterized by such peculiar and exceptional circumstances that it is necessary to invoke an estoppel to prevent manifest injustice.

3. Trial $\S$ 296(3)—Instruction as to right and duty of one whose auto, changing its course, was struck by another passing, held not erroneous.

As applied to one with whose auto another, attempting to pass, collided, both having changed their course to the left, an instruction, considered with others relative to statute and ordinance as to operation of motor vehicles, and in view of phrase "acted with ordinary care," held not to contain an erroneous statement of her right of assumption as to compliance with the law by others and her duty in that respect.

4. Municipal corporations ☞705(2)—The rear one of two autos turning to the left into a street has not right of way.

Neither an ordinance giving right of way, as against a vehicle turning to the left into a street, to another vehicle already on the street traveling in the same direction, nor any law, gives right of way to the rear one of two autos so turning into a street.

5. Appeal and error ☞1170(9)—No reversal for error in instruction not causing miscarriage of justice.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, reversal is denied for error in instructions where, after an examination of the entire cause, it cannot be said a miscarriage of justice has followed the giving of the instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Tillie Barton and another against the Studebaker Corporation of America and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the named defendant and defendant D. V. Owen appeal. Reversed as to corporation, and affirmed as to individual.

Gurney E. Newlin and Dave Smith, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

B. J. Bradner and Seward A. Simons, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HART, J. The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff Tillie Barton in an automobile accident. Plaintiff Henry Stephen Barton is her husband. A jury found in favor of plaintiffs and against defendants Studebaker Corporation of America and D. V. Owen, and assessed the damages at the sum of $10,000. From a judgment in this amount said defendants, the corporation and Owen, prosecute this appeal.

Vermont avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, runs north and south, and there are double car tracks thereon over which street cars are run. Pico, or Thirteenth street, intersects Vermont avenue at right angles, running east and west. Next on the north is Twelfth street, which runs westerly from Vermont avenue, being closed to the east.

On the 28th day of January, 1916, defendant Lila Parker was driving north on Vermont avenue in an electric automobile, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Rosa. Defendant Owen was driving a Studebaker gasoline automobile, also in a northerly direction, and was accompanied by Mrs. Barton. A street car was proceeding northerly on the easterly car track. Owen passed the street car at a point about halfway between Thirteenth and Twelfth streets, and overtook the electric driven by Mrs. Parker at a point very near Twelfth street. He was about to pass the electric when Mrs. Parker turned suddenly to the left. Owen also swerved to the left, but the right front fender and the forward portion of the running board of his car struck the electric, with the result that the Studebaker car was overturned on a steep incline and Mrs. Barton suffered severe injuries.

It is stated in appellants' opening brief:

"While we do not believe that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding that the accident was due solely or at all to negligence of Owen, and while we do believe that the verdict is excessive, we shall not argue those points separately, because of the established principle of review which must apply thereto. We will, however, call attention to the meager nature of the evidence in connection with our argument as to errors of law."

[1] Appellants' first contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the jury's finding that the defendant Owen was the employé of defendant Studebaker Corporation. The evidence as to the relationship between Owen and the corporation is quite voluminous. We will state, as briefly as possible, a synopsis thereof.

A. P. Drayton, who for two years had been cashier of the Studebaker Corporation, was called as a witness on behalf of plaintiffs and testified:

"Mr. Owen has been commission salesman as far back as I know anything about the records, which is about for two years, up to the present time. When I came here I found him as a commission salesman. He had no particular desk that he used other than any other salesman would use. * * * There was a desk which he could use if he saw fit. I have never seen him use it, not particularly—I couldn't remember whether I saw him use it or not. I have frequently seen Mr. Owen in the office and premises of the Studebaker Company during the time that I have been there. * * * The company has literature and advertising matter which is sent out to their prospects. * * * We keep a ledger account with Owen. I found one there when I came into the position of cashier and have kept it ever since. * * * We furnish business cards with the agent or salesman's name on it. We did that for Mr. Owen as far back as January, 1916. * * * I have the account of Owen covering the period from 1916 down to the present time. The following card was furnished by Studebaker Corporation to Mr. Owen:

"Home 60439
Main 3640

"Studebaker

"The Studebaker Corporation of America,
"Los Angeles Branch.

"D. V. Owen. 1047 So. Grand Ave."

"The Studebaker Company did not furnish oil and gas to Mr. Owen at any time prior to the accident. The sheet which I have is headed 'Accounts Receivable Ledger.' It is used for any ledger work. The word 'Employés' simply means that that is the title of the account. The name 'Dan V. Owen' indicated the defendant. * * * The debit items which occur continuously from the 1st of October, 1915, down to and including the 1st day of February, 1916, represent gasoline, oil, and grease commissions charged back by default on contract which should be borne and paid for by Mr. Owen. He paid us for his oil and gas by allowing a portion of his commissions to be applied against it, or anything else which should be paid by him, by allowing that much of his commissions to be paid on it. * * * I understand that the salesmen carried regular sales contract blanks for the purpose of familiarizing themselves with them, but they are usually signed up in the office. When the prospect has reached the point where he is about to make a decision, the sale must meet with the approval of the manager and the final arrangements are made in the office and the prospect is usually there in person—when you can bring him there. That was so with Owen as with other salesmen."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"I first became connected with the company in Los Angeles in October, 1915, and Mr. Owen had been with the company a long time. * * * Mr. Owen was a commission salesman and received no salary or drawing account whatsoever. The company did not advance Mr. Owen any expenses at all. * * * The only compensation that Mr. Owen received from the company was the commission on cars that he had sold or were sold through his efforts, and if he sold no cars at all, he received nothing at all from the company. He signed no contracts for the company and closed up no deals for the company—that is, he did not accept them as final. All he did was to bring in a purchaser or prospective purchaser and present him to the manager or assistant manager or some one in the office to sign the contract. * * * The items shown in the credit column of the ledger sheet are a summary of the commissions Mr. Owen was entitled to, from the sale of cars."

The ledger accounts referred to by the witness were received in evidence. They are headed:

"Studebaker. Accounts Receivable Ledger. Name, D. V. Owen. Address, Employé."

As to his relations with defendant corporation, defendant Owen testified:

"Up until July, 1915, I was floorman for Studebakers. * * * My occupation in January, 1916, was selling Studebaker automobiles; not necessarily only Studebaker automobiles; any used car of any other make that Studebaker might have owned at that time, on a compensation basis or commission only. During January, 1916, and the two or three months prior thereto I did not receive any salary from the Studebaker Corporation, only commission on cars sold by me. I would get into communication by various means with people whom I thought wanted to buy automobiles. * * * Such person was then my prospect. No one controlled me as to when I should go or when I should come. * * * I went when I thought best and where I thought best. * * * Of course, there are office hours there. If it suited me I was down at office hours, and if it did not I was not. I did not make any report to the company as to what I did during the day or what I was going to do the next day. * * * The automobile I had was owned by myself and my stepson, O. B. Sawyer. I paid the bill for repairs on the car caused by the collision. * * * I used the rooms of the Studebaker plant for showing automobiles at various times from the 15th of July, 1915, on to the time of the accident. I had been bringing people there and closing the contracts there. There is where they are closed. That is where I brought my people under the rules of the company, to close the contract. I did not close any contracts. * * * I made no written report to the Studebaker Corporation. We would sometimes go in and tell them who our prospects were and filed a list in the office from time to time and they kept them on file. I used the automobile in which I was driving on that afternoon in bringing customers to the company when I saw fit. * * * I occasionally acted on the floor of the salesroom. I watched for people to come in, found out what they wanted, answered the telephone; anything that might happen to come up to be done. If anybody wanted to see a car, showed it to them. If they wanted to buy it, I sold it to them. * * * The number of times we could be on the floor depended on how many men were working. We had the right to take turns. If I did not see fit to be on the floor, I wasn't. I went to other work if I wanted to. If we get a prospect we make a note of it and take it down to the place and file it. That entitled me to work that prospect. * * *"

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"I have been with the Studebaker since 1910 as floorman up to July, 1915. That was the designation of employés of the company who remained on the floor itself where the machines stood upon the floor for the purpose of meeting customers or people who were brought there to show the cars. Some time in July I went on a commission basis. I did not act as floorman after that time; not in the capacity that I did prior to that time; not in the same way; nor did we necessarily act at least one day in a week. I used the rooms of the plant for showing automobiles at various times from the 15th of July, 1915, on to the time of the accident. By 'we' I mean to include myself just the same as the regular salesmen, the usual salesmen, and during this period of time I had been bringing people there, that is, from the time I changed to the commission basis until the time of the accident, and closing the contracts there. * * * It was one of the rules of the company that we must close deals with prospects at the office. The prospects were filed under a card system in the office. In the transaction of my business I usually ask advice of the city sales manager or some other official, the assistant manager and general manager."

F. N. Dalton, assistant manager of the defendant corporation, corroborated, generally, the above testimony.

Section 2009 of the Civil Code thus describes a servant:

"A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master."

The evidence disclosing the nature of the contractual relationship between the Studebaker Company and Owen is undisputed, and it is clear therefrom that the relation of master and servant, within the legal definition of that relation as given by the section of the Code above mentioned, did not exist between the defendant Studebaker Corporation (to be hereafter referred to as the Corporation) and the defendant Owen at the time of the accident in which the plaintiff Tillie Barton was injured. On the other hand, it is clear that Owen, while engaged in the business of procuring customers for the Corporation at the time mentioned, was exercising an independent calling. He was, in other words, an independent contractor, and as to the means by which he was to execute or perform the work which he assumed in his engagement with the Corporation to do, the latter had no control over him.

The real test as to whether a person is an independent contractor or a servant is whether the person alleged to be the master, under his arrangement with the other party, has or has not any authoritative control of the latter with respect to the manner in which the details of the work are to be performed, and therefore this test or element "must, in the last analysis, always determine what was the essential nature of the relationship between the person who performed the given work and the person for whom it was performed." Labatt on Master and Servant, § 18, p. 56. As some evidence of the nature of the relationship existing between the Corporation and Owen, in this case, we may refer to the fact that Owen received no definite compensation; that the automobile used by him for the purpose of facilitating conveniently the work he engaged himself to perform for the Corporation was his property; and that he himself paid the expense of its maintenance and care and for the gasoline necessary to run it. But more important than these considerations, which really involve evidence only tending to show the relationship, the probative value of which as disclosing the nature of the relationship must, of course, be measured by other considerations more directly addressed to the fact, is the fact, clearly and unquestionably established, that his business under his engagement with the Corporation was merely that of seeking and finding and procuring purchasers of its automobiles (for which service he was paid a commission), and the further fact that, in prosecuting that business or work, he was at liberty under his engagement with the company to go where and when he pleased and to exercise his own judgment and discretion as to the parties whom he should seek as purchasers or to whom he might present propositions for the sale and the purchase of the Corporation's automobiles. He was, in other words, perfectly free, under his engagement with the Corporation, to choose his own time, place, and means of seeking and procuring purchasers. There was nothing in his agreement with the Corporation to prevent him from employing assistants to aid him in the work of seeking and securing purchasers of the company's automobiles and agreeing to compensate and compensating them out of his own commissions for any customers they might bring to him. In brief, he was perfectly free to prosecute the work he agreed by his contract to do for the Corporation in any manner he saw fit, using such means or methods as to his judgment might seem the most effective for accomplishing the ends of his business. When a sale was made through him he was paid his stipulated commission, but received no compensation unless a sale was effected through him. He was as much engaged in business for himself when prosecuting the work called for by his contract with the Corporation as is the contractor who engages to construct a building for a stipulated sum of money, he agreeing to furnish the labor and materials and not being under the control or direction of the owner as to the means by which he performed the contract or as to the place where he purchased the materials or as to the persons—mechanics and laborers—he employed to assist him in fulfilling the terms of his contract, or as to the wages he should pay such mechanics and laborers. In such case, the limit of the owner's right to interfere in the matter of the performance of the contract is to see that the building is constructed according to the plans and specifications, in conformity with which the contractor has agreed to do the work. And in this case the corporation could exercise no authoritative control over the work of Owen, except perhaps merely the right to require him to carry out its instructions as to the representations he should make to proposed or prospective purchasers of the character of the automobiles in mechanical construction and their durability or serviceable quality, and this authority is analogous only to that of the owner with respect to the contractor who has contracted to erect a building upon the former's land according to certain plans and specifications.

No better description of an independent contractor or a person who is engaged in performing certain acts or work for another but who, in performing such acts or work, exercises an independent calling—that is, a calling as to the means or methods of accomplishing the ends of which no right of control or direction is reserved to or vested in or exercisable by the party for whom the acts or work are to be done—is to be found than is given in Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 99, 100, 78 Pac. 337, 339, as follows:

"An independent contractor is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished. * * * The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for. 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 187. The fact that the work is to be done under the supervision of an architect, or that the employer has the right to make alterations, deviations, additions, and omissions from the contract, does not change the relation from that of an independent contractor to that of a mere servant. 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 187; Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 402. These principles apply 'likewise in favor of the principal contractor as against any liability on his part for the acts of a subcontractor, or of a subcontractor's servants.' 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 194, and cases cited."

The test of control in such cases means "complete control," or the full and unqualified right to control and direct the details of or the means by which the work is to be accomplished. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 811, 159 Pac. 721. See, also, Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 417, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. In the case of Chicago, R. I. & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Bond, Adm'r, etc., supra, the intestate of plaintiff in the trial court, one Turner, was engaged under certain contracts with the railway company to perform certain services for the company, he (Turner) to furnish all the labor required to perform the services. While Turner was walking between the car tracks of the company on his way to attend to some duty connected with his contracts, an engine, two box cars, and a flat car, backing on one of the tracks, ran over and killed him. Damages were sued for for his death under the Employers' Liability Act of Congress (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), and the question was whether deceased was an employé of the company. The United States Supreme Court answered the question in the negative, and, among other things said:

"There was, it is true, and necessarily, a certain direction to be given by the company, or rather, we should say, information given to Turner. But the manner of the work was under his control to be done by him and those employed by him. * * * The power given was one of control in a sense, but it was not a detailed control of the actions of Turner or those of his employés. It was a judgment only over results and a necessary sanction of the obligations which he had incurred. It was not tantamount to the control of an employé and a remedy against his incompetency or neglect."

It is to our minds a very plain proposition that, according to the evidence in this case and the criterion by which it is to be determined whether in a given case a party is a servant or an independent contractor, or one exercising an independent calling in his contractual relationship to the party for whom he has engaged to perform a certain service, the defendant Owen and the Corporation defendant did not, at the time the injuries complained of were received, maintain the relation of master and servant, but that Owen was then attending to and managing his own business, that is, engaged in performing work for himself, of course, under his contract with the Corporation.

But the fact is emphasized, as showing that Owen was the servant of the Corporation, that the former used the rooms of the Corporation's plant for showing automobiles to prospective customers he secured. That fact possesses no significance as showing the nature of the contractual relationship between the parties. We apprehend that there was no other place where the automobiles could be as conveniently exhibited to customers or those contemplating purchasing than at the rooms or in the building where the machines were kept on sale. Owen's engagement was to seek, secure, and bring to the Corporation purchasers of its automobiles, and when taking them to the plant it was only an act which he was required to do to accomplish the work he had assumed to do. If a person should engage to haul grain to another's warehouse and place it therein at a stipulated amount per ton and agree to furnish his own equipment and labor for the doing of the work, it would not, we imagine, be contended that such person would be any the less an independent contractor merely because he was required to use the warehouse of the party with whom he made the engagement to accomplish the results required by his agreement.

Much stress is also laid upon the fact that Owen's authority to act for the Corporation was evidenced by a printed card of the latter and on which Owen's name was printed. The character of the relation maintained by Owen to the Corporation was not stated on the card. This is only and no more than an evidential circumstance, and, under some circumstances, it might cut some figure as proof of the nature of the relationship existing between the parties, but in this case it possesses no significance, in view of the undisputed evidence disclosing the terms of the agreement between the parties and thus the nature of the relationship which said agreement established between them. Naturally, whether a servant or an independent contractor, a party engaged to perform for another acts or work requiring dealings with the public would carry with him some evidence of his authority to do what he claimed the right to do.

We have not thought it necessary to review herein the many cases cited by respondents in support of their position as to the nature of the relationship existing between the Corporation and Owen at the time of the collision. There is one case so cited, however, which we will briefly examine here, inasmuch as counsel insist that in the facts it is precisely analogous to the case at bar. The case is Standard Oil Co. v. Parkinson, 152 Fed. 681, 82 C. C. A. 29. In that case the injury complained of was caused by the negligent act of one Perry, who had a contract with the defendant to sell and deliver oil in four different towns, and who was to receive as his compensation one cent per gallon for each gallon so sold and delivered. During the existence of this contract the company ordered Perry to deliver oil to its customers in a town other than any of those included in the contract of employment. It was while Perry was obeying this order that the accident occurred and the injuries were received. The fact that Perry was shown to be subject to the orders of the defendant as to when and where and to whom he should deliver the oil was, with the other facts, sufficient to uphold the finding of the jury that Perry, at the time of the accident, was acting as a servant of the defendant. In this case, as the undisputed evidence shows, the defendant Owen was not subject to the authoritative control of the Corporation in respect of the details of his work or as to how it should be performed. This was entirely up to him. He could work when he pleased and seek out and select such persons as he pleased as purchasers of the automobiles of the Corporation. Indeed, he was so far from being subject to the control or direction of the Corporation as to the means or mode of and the time for doing his work that he was under no obligation to give any particular time or service to the Corporation. When he brought a "prospect" to the Corporation, he was acting for himself as well as for the Corporation, and if such prospect was transformed into a purchaser, he received his stipulated share of the money for which the machine was sold and nothing if a sale was not effected. It is manifest that there is a marked distinction as to the facts between the two cases.

[2] But the theory is advanced by the respondents that an ostensible agency or the ostensible relation of master and servant between Owen and the Corporation was shown to exist at the time of the accident. The point is argued in respondents' brief exhaustively and authorities are cited in support of that theory as applicable to the instant case.

The doctrine of ostensible agency rests in estoppel in pais or by conduct. It is applicable in particular to contractual obligations and generally invoked in actions sounding in contract, and not in those sounding in tort. There are, however, some cases in tort in which the doctrine of ostensible agency has been applied, and the one upon which the respondent here principally relies is that of Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559. In that case the defendant company had taken a contract to construct a pier on the beach near the Cliff House, in the city of San Francisco. One Stone was the superintendent of the company and was in immediate charge of the work. The plaintiff was employed by the company through Stone, its superintendent. The plaintiff was engaged in working on the pier and was sent by the superintendent, with other employes, to lay a foundation for a jack-screw to raise a pile which had been driven too deep. The blocks were thrown down from a place some 12 feet above where plaintiff was working, and as he stooped to pick up a block he was struck by one thrown from above. Before throwing the block the man who did it asked if all was clear below and was answered in the affirmative by the superintendent and others, and the block was thrown below. At the trial the defendant company attempted to show that it had, previously to the accident, transferred the contract to Stone, its superintendent, and that when the accident occurred it had nothing whatever to do with the contract or the work of constructing the pier. In rebuttal of this defense, the plaintiff was permitted to show and did show that—

Stone "continued at least to be the ostensible agent of the defendant in charge of the work. * * * He showed that no notice was ever given to him of the pretended change of his employers; that the work was conducted under the direction of Stone after the date of the contract in precisely the same manner as that which characterized it before."

The court said:

"An agency is ostensible when the principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes a third person to believe another to be his agent, who is really not employed by him. Civ. Code, § 2300. There is shown in this case an existing agency, a secret termination of it under circumstances designed to transform the agent into the principal, and this, without any knowledge or means of knowledge of the changed conditions afforded to those who had taken original employment under the defendant. The doctrine of ostensible agency draws its support from the equitable principles of estoppel in pais, and it would not be easy to call to mind a clearer instance of ostensible agency than that here presented by the evidence."

The proposition decided in that case could have been disposed of upon the hypothesis that the question whether the defendant was still the principal or master of the plaintiff when the latter received his injuries was one for the jury to determine upon the evidence, and that the evidence, though conflicting, was sufficient to support the theory of the plaintiff that the defendant had not transferred its contract to Stone and was still the employer of plaintiff. But readily it may be perceived how the doctrine of ostensible agency may well be invoked in a case of such circumstances as those of the Donnelly Case, but there is to be noted a marked distinction between that case and this in the facts—a distinction which renders the former case of no force as an authority here. In the Donnelly Case the plaintiff's contract of employment was originally with the defendant. He had no notice of the transfer of the contract which he had been employed to aid in performing, if there was, in fact, any such transfer. A contract of employment presupposes the existence of a number of considerations or elements. It presupposes that the laborer or servant desired to work or perform services for the particular person by whom he was employed. He is entitled to know definitely for whom he has engaged himself to perform labor. He is entitled to know the responsible party. If he should find that he was not in the employ of the person by whom he was led to believe when he entered into the contract of employment he was employed, he might, for reasons sufficient to his mind, cease to labor or to perform the services he had agreed to do or perform. In the Donnelly Case, if there was a transfer to Stone by the defendant of the contract whereby the pier was to be constructed, the laborers employed on that work were entitled to notice of such transfer, so that they might be given an opportunity to determine whether they would continue in their employment, so that they would know to whom they should look for their compensation and know who was the responsible party in case controversies of any character should grow out of the work of performing the contract. In this case the plaintiff was not an employé either of the Corporation or Owen. It was of no interest to her to know whether Owen was a servant of the Corporation or, in the sale of the latter's automobiles, was exercising an independent calling. The only interest she could have in the nature of Owen's contractual status with respect to the Corporation was that he was vested with authority to solicit her trade for the Corporation and to consummate a sale of an automobile upon the terms of his agreement with her. It is not shown that she was influenced in the least degree to ride with Owen because she believed that he was the servant of the Corporation. It is undoubtedly true that she never gave any thought whatever to the nature of the business relation existing between Owen and the Corporation.

A master can be held liable for a tort committed by his servant in the course of his employment as such servant only upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, that is, upon the theory that the torts of a servant committed while the latter is engaged in the performance of the duties of his employment are the torts of the master himself. Therefore, in applying the doctrine of ostensible agency to torts, the case must be characterized, as was true in the Donnelly Case, supra, by such peculiar and exceptional circumstances as that it is necessary to invoke an estoppel to prevent manifest injustice from being done. The authority for applying the principle of equitable estoppel in such a case is statutory, and is found in section 2330 of the Civil Code. That section reads:

"An agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent from transactions within such limit, if they had been entered into on his own account, accrue to the principal."

But the case of Smith v. Belshaw, 89 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 834, is a direct authority against the position of respondent, and between that case and the Donnelly Case we perceive no inconsistency.

In the Smith v. Belshaw Case, the defendant was the owner of a coal mine in which the plaintiff was employed, and while so employed received the injuries to secure compensation for which he brought the action. The evidence was—

"undisputed that at the time of the accident, and for some months prior thereto, the mine was in the exclusive possession and control of defendant Dickenson, under a contract with Belshaw, who was the owner thereof; that under such contract Dickenson employed and paid the workmen; had entire control of and authority over the mine, and received a fixed rate per ton, from Belshaw, for the coal taken therefrom, when the same was delivered to him."

The court, answering the several contentions of respondent which were advanced to support the judgment against Belshaw, said:

"The fact that the miners were paid their wages at defendant Belshaw's store, where they had been paid prior to the contract with Dickenson, and the further fact that some of the miners thought they were working for Belshaw, are circumstances too slight to defeat the express and uncontradicted testimony as to the terms of the contract and the labor performed under it.

"What the miners thought as to who was their employer is entirely immaterial. There is no question of estoppel involved in the case, and appellant, in order to escape liability for the negligence of Dickenson, was not bound to give any notice to the miners that he had given up the control of the mine. This is not an action on contract based upon ostensible agency, but is an action in tort, and must rest upon the actual facts, and the actual relations existing between the parties. Samuelson v. Cleveland Iron M. Co., 49 Mich. 164, 43 Am. Rep. 456; Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., L. R. 2 C. P. D. 206."

Smith v. Belshaw was approved in Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 574, 93 Pac. 377, and Raftis v. McCloud River Lumber Co., 35 Cal. App. 397, 170 Pac. 176. In the last-named case it is said:

"The case of Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559, in no way militates against this conclusion. In that case the evidence showed a clear case of ostensible agency. The prior relations between the parties to the action created a duty upon the defendant therein to notify the plaintiff that their former foreman had become an independent contractor."

The respondents cite other cases, but therein the doctrine of ostensible agency as applied to torts did not arise. In most of said cases it is merely held that where there is conflicting evidence upon the question as to the nature of the relationship existing between the parties, upon the familiar rule respecting a substantial conflict in the evidence addressed to a vital issue of fact, the findings of the court or the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed on review. This is really in effect what is held in Raftis v. McCloud River Lumber Co., supra, and in Glacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co., supra.

We are convinced that there is no room in this case for the application of the doctrine of ostensible relationship, and that the nature of the relationship existing between the Corporation and Owen when this accident occurred must be determined, as is said in Smith v. Belshaw, supra, "upon the actual facts, and the actual relationship existing between the parties," as disclosed by the evidence.

We will now leave that branch of the case and proceed to an examination of some of the other assignments. The rulings respecting the evidence of which complaint is made need not be noticed herein, inasmuch as they affected the question only of the nature of the contractual relation existing between the Corporation and Owen at the time of the accident. Certain given instructions, however, affecting the case of Owen are criticized, and to the criticism of some of these only do we deem it necessary to give special attention herein.

It is deemed proper first to say that the evidence abundantly supports the verdict as against the defendant Owen. Indeed, the evidence clearly shows, that, just prior and down to the very moment the collision occurred, Owen was driving his machine apparently with reckless indifference to the rights of pedestrians and others using the street at the time of the collision.

[3] The following is one of the instructions to which objection is urged by the appellants:

"Defendant Mrs. Parker had a right to assume, until actually aware of the contrary, that any automobile approaching her from the rear would be operated with reasonable care and at a reasonable rate of speed and with the exercise of reasonable caution in giving warning of its approach if reasonable prudence so required, and Mrs. Parker had a right to act on that assumption until actually aware of its violation. And if, in proper reliance on that assumption Mrs. Parker acted with ordinary care, your verdict must be given in favor of defendants Parker."

The converse of the proposition stated in said instruction was embodied in an instruction requested by the defendants, but the court, in view of its position as shown by the above instruction, rejected it.

The state Motor Vehicle Law, as does, substantially, a local regulation of the city of Los Angeles, provides that—

The driver or "person in charge of any vehicle in or upon any public highway, before turning, stopping, or changing the course of such vehicle, and before turning such vehicle when starting the same, shall see first that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety, and if the movement or operation of other vehicles may reasonably be affected by such turning, stopping or changing of course, shall give plainly visible or audible signal to the persons operating, driving or in charge of such vehicles of his intention so to turn, stop, or change his course." Subd. J, § 20, Stats. 1915, p. 408.

It is said that a similar instruction was held to be error and prejudicial in the case of Starck v. Pac. Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 277, 278, 281, 156 Pac. 51, L. R. A. 1916E, 58. In that case, the instruction, as it is given in the opinion, read:

"In determining whether plaintiff was negligent, you will take it that she had the right to assume, until she knew to the contrary, that defendant would not violate the city ordinance and run at a speed over 20 miles per hour."

We should think that it is correct to say that every person using the public streets and highways for the purposes for which they are established and maintained has the right to assume that other persons using such streets and highways for the same purpose will, when so using them, obey the law regulating their use by pedestrians and drivers of vehicles of any kind. But this is not to say that any person, whether pedestrian or the driver of a vehicle, when using such thoroughfares for the purposes they are intended for is not also himself required to exercise due care for his own safety or to observe the duties with which the law expressly charges him. Runnels v. United Railroads, 175 Cal. 528, 531, 166 Pac. 18; Scott v. San Bernardino Tract. Co., 152 Cal. 604, 610, 93 Pac. 677. And, as we read the opinion of Mr. Justice Melvin, in Starck v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., supra, what we here say is in effect what is said there. As is to be observed from the language of the state Motor Vehicle Act above quoted herein, there are certain duties imposed upon a person in charge of a motor vehicle who may be in the act of turning or about to turn his machine when driving over a public thoroughfare, and these he is required to discharge, notwithstanding that he has the right to assume that other persons who may be affected by the act of turning will do their duty or obey the law, and in any case where the driver of a vehicle violates the requirements of the law regulating the use of the public thoroughfares, the violator is guilty of negligence per se if there be damage done as a result, even though it may transpire that such negligence is not the proximate cause of such damage.

The instruction in this case, it will be noted, declared that Mrs. Parker, driver of the electric car with which Owen's machine collided, had the right to assume that any automobile approaching her from the rear would be operated with reasonable care and at a reasonable rate of speed, etc., and then adds that—

"If, in proper reliance on that assumption, Mrs. Parker acted with ordinary care, your verdict must be given in favor of the defendants Parker."

If by the phrase "acted with ordinary care" the court intended to refer to the care as applied to drivers of motor vehicles specifically standardized by the statute, then the instruction, although not as clearly phrased as it should be, would not involve an erroneous statement of the rule. And we think it is, when considered in connection with the instructions explaining the provisions of the statute and the local ordinance regulating the operation of motor vehicles, reasonably susceptible to that construction, and that we may fairly assume that the jury so understood it; and the instruction as so construed does not conflict with instruction No. 12, given at the request of the defendant.

[4] The court instructed as follows in instruction No. 17:

"You are instructed that a vehicle, turning to the left in an intersection and passing the center of the highway in making such turn, has the right of way over any vehicle which it may have preceded into such intersection, and which may be to the left of said vehicle so turning."

Said instruction, it is contended, does not state the law correctly, and as an abstract enunciation of the rule to be observed in such instances prescribed by the ordinance of the city of Los Angeles it may not. But, as applied to the facts of the present case, it states a correct rule.

Section 41 of said ordinance provides:

"The driver of a vehicle turning to the left from one street into another street shall allow the right of way to vehicles traveling in the direction in which such vehicle is turning; and the driver of any vehicle traveling in the direction in which such vehicle is turning shall have the right of way over such vehicle so turning."

As we understand that provision, when a driver of a vehicle turns to the left into a street on which another vehicle is traveling in the direction of the former, the driver turning to the left must yield the right of way to the driver thus traveling in his direction. In this case Owen was traveling on the same street on which Mrs. Parker was traveling, but was in the rear or back of the Parker machine. We can conceive of no reason or principle of law which would require the party turning to the left from one street to another to yield the right of way to the vehicle following him on the same street. If Mrs. Parker, as she testified, gave the required signal of her intention to make the turn and otherwise exercised due care in doing so, she had the right to proceed on beyond the center of the street into which she had turned or was about to turn without yielding the right of way to another vehicle back of her, unless such vehicle was traveling in the direction in which she was turning on the street into which she was thus entering or about to enter. Where two vehicles are traveling in the same direction on the same street, one in the rear of the other, it is the duty of the driver of the rear car to exercise reasonable care with respect to the forward car, and if the driver of the latter indicates by the proper signal his intention of turning to the left into another or cross-street, to yield to him that right. Ordinance or no ordinance, the driver of the rear car would certainly be guilty of the grossest negligence if he attempted to make the same turn in such manner as to cut in on the forward car. The driver of the latter car would certainly have the "right of way" in such a case as between him and the driver of the rear car operating on the same street and in the same direction; and, as before stated, as applied to the facts of this case, the instruction involves a correct statement of the law and did not invade the province of the jury (as counsel contend) by taking from them the determination of a question of fact.

Instruction No. 18 is subjected to the criticism that it, too, passes upon a question of fact, in that, like the instruction last above considered, it told the jury that, under certain indicated conditions, Mrs. Parker had the right of way over Owen's car. What we have said of instruction No. 17 as to a like criticism is applicable to the objection made against instruction No. 18.

[5] There are other instructions the legal soundness of which is challenged. We have examined them with care, and while it may be conceded that they are subject to just criticism because they are not as clearly framed as they should have been, we are persuaded, in view of the convincing proof of Owen's gross negligence in driving his machine at the time of the accident, and also in view of our conviction, founded in an examination of the evidence, that if he (Owen) had exercised reasonable or ordinary care in operating his machine at the time the accident would not have occurred, that the rights of Owen were not materially affected by the errors of said instructions, if indeed, the errors were of such magnitude as to do any harm at all under any set of circumstances. At any rate, we cannot find any reason sufficient to justify us in holding that, after an examination of the entire cause, a miscarriage of justice has followed the giving of the instructions referred to. Const. art. 6, § 4½; Vallejo & Northern R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 Pac. 238. The charge of the court generally viewing it appears to embrace a fair and reasonably accurate statement of all the principles of law applicable to the case as made by the pleadings and the proof, and such a statement as was calculated to lead the jury to a just and enlightened consideration of the evidence.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment as against the defendant Studebaker Corporation of America is reversed, and the judgment as against the defendant Owen is affirmed.

LEE v. DE LA MOTTE et al. (Civ. 2556.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 7, 1920.)

1. Sales ⇨24—Purchaser of automobile had reasonable time to exercise option to repurchase automobile applied on price.

A purchaser of an automobile who received a credit of $450 upon delivery of a Studebaker car to the seller, "to be held for 30 days at a price to net purchaser $650, if not sold in 30 days purchaser has option to buy Studebaker for $500 plus repairs put on it," had reasonable time after the expiration of 30 days within which to exercise his option.

2. Sales ⇨24—Fifteen days a reasonable time within which to exercise option to repurchase automobile.

Where purchaser of an automobile, who received credit of $450, delivered a Studebaker car to the seller "to be held for 30 days at a price to net purchaser $650, if not sold in 30 days purchaser has option to buy Studebaker for $500 plus repairs put on it," 15 days after the expiration of 30 days was a reasonable time within which to exercise the option; the seller having undertaken to make repairs which were not completed prior to such time.

3. Replevin ⇨103(2)—Defendant cannot have return of property in absence of formal demand in answer.

In an action in claim and delivery for recovery of possession of personal property, where plaintiff is put in possession of property by the sheriff, defendant is not entitled to a return of the property, where he does not assert a formal claim for a return in his answer, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 687.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Don Lee against J. De La Motte and Dorothy Millais. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. R. Law, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Henning & McGee, of San Diego, and J. De La Motte, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Action in claim and delivery for the recovery of possession of a certain automobile or its value, which latter was alleged in the complaint to be the sum of $850, together with damages. Defendants had judgment, from which plaintiff has appealed.

In addition to determining that the plaintiff was neither the owner nor entitled to the possession of the automobile in question, the trial court found that the plaintiff had preliminarily obtained the possession of the automobile through the sheriff, and by the judgment directed that the defendants have possession of the same, or recover the value thereof, which was fixed at the same sum alleged by the plaintiff, to wit, $850. The appellant's points may be summarized under two heads: (1) That the evidence was insufficient to support the finding against the ownership or right to the possession of the automobile in the plaintiff; (2) that under the pleadings the judgment directing the return of the automobile to the defendants was unauthorized. A consideration of the first point involves an examination of the main facts of the case as shown by the evidence. Necessarily, in considering the findings as made by the trial court, the evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff must be considered in its strongest light. As defendant De La Motte appears to have been the actual contracting party in the transaction about to be described, we will hereinafter refer to him as the defendant. Defendant Millais, it seems, had possession of the automobile at the time this controversy arose, but her possession was derived from De La Motte, and no question is made but that De La Motte was the party responsible to the plaintiff.

[1-3] On the 17th day of November, 1916, plaintiff made a contract of conditional sale whereby he agreed to sell to the defendant a used automobile for the sum of $850. The contract of sale, signed by both parties, acknowledged the receipt of $450 on account, and provided that payments should be subsequently made, to wit: $75 on December 17, 1916; and $65 on the 17th day of each of the five months immediately following. It was provided that interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum should be paid by the vendee. In conjunction with this contract, promissory notes covering the deferred payments and corresponding to the terms of the contract as to amounts and due dates were made. As a matter of fact, the initial payment of $450, which the contract acknowledged, was not a cash payment, but was a credit which the plaintiff agreed to allow in consideration of the delivery to him by defendant of another used automobile. In other words, the transaction took the form of a partial exchange of automobiles. As a part of the transaction, however, an additional agreement was made, evidenced by the following written term:

"Studebaker car (that being the car delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff), to be held for 30 days at a price to net purchaser $650, if not sold in 30 days purchaser has option to buy Studebaker for $500 plus repairs put on it."

The automobile received from the defendant was not sold within the 30 days by the plaintiff, but was sold on the 6th day of January, 1917, for the sum of $750. Prior to this time, and while the machine was in the hands of the plaintiff, extensive repairs had been made upon it. The installment which fell due on December 17th of $75, by the terms of the contract as hereinbefore stated, was paid by the defendant. The installment due on January 17, 1917, which, as will be noted, was 10 days after the automobile delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff had been sold, was not promptly paid; that is, on January 25, 1917, defendant forwarded to the bank which was making collection of the notes a check for $65, but did not include the small amount of interest due, claiming that he had been overcharged on the interest account. On the same date he wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

"I have been waiting for you to make a settlement of my account on the sale of the Studebaker car which you sold for the sum of $750. I have to-day sent to the bank a check for the sum of $65 and a request that they correct their account with me on account of an overcharge on the interest on all of the notes they have collected, which I have no doubt they will do. I will turn over the car to you if you wish, upon your turning over to me the Studebaker car, or upon the payment to me of the amount of money paid for the same. I think that it is usual under circumstances like that which now exists between us, to at least notify me of the fact that the car was sold and what was paid for the same, so that I would know what was coming to you on that account. I desire a complete statement of the account before the next payment is made."

On January 26th the check was returned to the defendant by the bank with the suggestion that the matter of any offsets be taken up with the plaintiff directly. About the 1st of February defendant appeared at the place of business of the plaintiff and found that the car which he had delivered in part payment was still in the shops of plaintiff, and that the repair charges in full, as stated to him by the plaintiff, amounted to $204. He testified that the manager of plaintiff asked him whether he desired to exercise his option to purchase the car, and that he (defendant) stated that he would so exercise the option, but that on the following morning the same manager told him that the car had been sold and that he could not have it. The defendant demanded that a credit of $650 be given him on his account, instead of $450, which credit, if it had been made, would have more than satisfied the installment notes both for the January and February payments. Under the terms of the contract the defendant had no option to repurchase the Studebaker car until the 17th of December, 1916, or 30 days after the contract was entered into; the plaintiff, within the first 30 days, was required, if he sold the machine, to sell it for a price that would produce for the defendant a credit of not less than $650. Defendant could not have been called upon to exercise his option to repurchase the machine immediately upon the expiration of the 30 days, but must be deemed to have been allowed a reasonable time thereafter within which to exercise that option. Furthermore, certain repairs had been undertaken to be made by the plaintiff on the machine, and these repairs were not completed at the end of the 30 days, and in fact were not completed at the time the defendant had his further dealings with the manager of the plaintiff in February, when, for the first time, the cost of the repairs was calculated and stated to him. This latter date was approximately 45 days after the option period had commenced to run. In view of the fact that the repairs had not been completed and no statement of the same made to the defendant, we think it just to hold that a reasonable time had not elapsed subsequent to the expiration of the first 30 days at the early date in February to which we have referred. That being true, and as it appears that the defendant manifested his desire to repurchase at that time, and the fact, being that the machine had been sold on the 6th day of January by the plaintiff, we think that defendant was entitled to have credited the amount received from the sale of the automobile, less the repair costs as they were stated to him, and less $50, that being the difference between the $450 mentioned as a credit in the contract and the amount for which the defendant was to be permitted to repurchase. If there was no other point to be considered in the case, we might easily determine that these implied findings were made by the court.

The finding that the plaintiff was not the owner of the automobile, possession of which was sued for herein, finds no support in the evidence, although the more material finding that the plaintiff was not entitled to possession of the same is, for reasons already appearing, sufficiently sustained. As to the ownership being in the plaintiff contrary to the finding, the written contract particularly and expressly reserved title in the plaintiff until the automobile purchased by the defendant from him was completely paid for. Under any view of the evidence, it does not appear that the purchase price had been satisfied at the time this action was brought. However, upon a retrial, which it seems is necessary to be had, different findings may be arrived at. Defendant did not, in his answer, claim the right to have the automobile, taken under claim and delivery process, returned to him. Section 667, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to judgments in this kind of action, declares:

"If the property has been delivered to the plaintiff, and the defendant claim a return thereof, judgment for the defendant may be for a return of the property or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had, and damages for taking and withholding the same."

Defendant did, by way of counterclaim, show the fact that the automobile had been taken from his possession by the sheriff at the instance of the plaintiff, and alleged certain damages which he had sustained by reason of such act. In his prayer for judgment he made no demand whatsoever for the redelivery of the automobile; his answer, after enumerating damages, concluding with the following words:

"For which sum, together with the costs and disbursements of this action, defendant asks judgment; and that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that plaintiff's action be dismissed with costs."

Under the authorities, this answer is insufficient to support a judgment for the return of the property. Pico v. Pico, 56 Cal. 453; Banning v. Marleau, 101 Cal. 238, 35 Pac. 772. In Pico v. Pico, supra, the court points out that, ordinarily, in an action of replevin where the issue is made as to the right of the plaintiff to the possession of the property and the facts showed that the defendant was entitled to that possession, a judgment for the return of the property to the defendant was permissible. However, attention is called to the fact that the Code section above cited requires something more:

"Nevertheless, a defendant cannot have judgment for a return of the property or its value, unless he has claimed a return in his answer. But this, even if it be held to require a formal demand, is not because such demand is necessary to eke out the denials, or constitutes of itself an affirmative allegation, but because it is arbitrarily made the duty of defendant to assert his formal claim for a return as a prerequisite to a judgment for the return of the property or its value. Except for this arbitrary requirement of the statute, the formal claim for a return of the property would not be necessary. We have seen that where the facts set forth in a plea of replevin showed that defendant was entitled to the possession of the property when the action was commenced, a formal claim or demand for a return was not essential. In reference to replevin, courts and legal writers have said that a defendant was entitled to a judgment for a return whenever the question, whether a return should be had, was presented by the pleadings; that is, whenever the right of plaintiff was contested, and the right of possession in defendant, or a third person, asserted. Under our system, the general denial contests the right of plaintiff, and under it may be shown the right of defendant or a third person. The denial of plaintiff's right to the possession necessarily includes an assertion of right in defendant, from whom the possession of the property has been taken under the writ; and would authorize a judgment for the return, were it not for the provision of the Code which requires a return to be claimed in the answer."

We are not permitted to assume, under the record as it is presented, that the plaintiff tacitly agreed that a judgment for the defendant for the return of the property would be made. The evidence introduced was pertinent to a claim for damages, which is all that defendant seems to have sought by his answer.

The judgment is reversed.

MARSH v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 3142.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California, March 25, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1) — Judgment on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A judgment supported by evidence, although conflicting, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Trusts ⇨371(2)—Complaint alleging absolute deed was a trust held sufficient.

A complaint, in an action by a mother against her daughter to quiet title as against a conveyance, alleged to have been in trust, but claimed by the daughter to have been absolute, held sufficient as against general demurrer.

3. Appeal and error ⇨193(1) — Special grounds of demurrer to complaint must be made below.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, special grounds of demurrer to complaint not made in lower court cannot be considered on appeal.

4. Trial ⇨140(1)—Refusal proper where affidavits contradicted by affiant's oral testimony on trial.

On motion for new trial in a suit to quiet title, motion held properly denied, where the supporting affidavits were contradictory to oral evidence by affiants in the trial.

5. New trial ⇨102(1) — Properly denied, where affidavits show that new evidence sought to be introduced was known to affiants.

Where affidavits for a new trial show on their face that the evidence sought to be introduced on a new trial was in the possession of affiants long before and during the time the cause was pending, and that they did not see fit to avail themselves of it, a motion for new trial is properly denied.

6. Trusts ⇨43(3)—Evidence as to defendants' expenditures on land held properly stricken out.

In a suit to quiet title, brought by a mother against her daughter as against a conveyance alleged by plaintiff to have been in trust, but claimed by the daughter to have been absolute, evidence relative to expenditures made by defendants on the property was properly stricken out; it appearing that defendants claimed the property absolutely and would have made such improvement regardless of whether the deed had been made or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Suit to quiet title and for injunction by Sallie P. Marsh against Carrie F. Holder

Smith and husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. M. Davis and E. T. Langley, both of Santa Ana, for appellants.

Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action brought to quiet title, and for an injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiff's possession of the property in question, and the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith from conveying or incumbering the title thereto, with a further prayer "that it be adjudged and decreed that, if said defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith has any title in said property, the said title is that of a trust only for the benefit of said plaintiff," as well as for general relief.

The defendants appeared separately. For our present purposes it will suffice to say that each of them, except as to certain formal averments, denied the material allegations of the complaint. The defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith set up, as a further defense, a certain deed alleged to have been executed and delivered to her by the plaintiff, and in consideration therefor the expenditure by said last-named defendant of the sum of $1,100 to satisfy a certain mortgage, and an agreement on her part to advance such other and further sums as might be necessary for the continued maintenance, support, and living of the plaintiff, with the additional proviso that she (plaintiff) "was to live and reside upon said property during the remainder of her natural life"; and that said defendant had done her part since, and expected to continue to carry out her part of the agreement. This defendant further claims to have expended a large sum of money in improving, by certain repairs and the erection of a structure thereon, the property in question, and that she did so in good faith, "understanding that the title to said property was vested in this defendant absolutely"—praying that her title therein be quieted in herself. After trial the court found in favor of plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. There was a motion for new trial, which was denied. The appeal is from the order denying such motion and from the judgment so entered.

Plaintiff is an old lady—nearly 74 years of age at the time of the trial. She is the mother of the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith, and apparently is a woman of the type of "the good old days." The testimony of herself, as well as that of her daughter, shows that she was familiar with the Biblical truths, and that she tried to apply their principles in her daily walks and conversation. The defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith, her daughter, had herself arrived at the age of discretion, being at the time of the trial 52 years of age. She seems to have had a wide experience, both in business and matrimonial enterprises, having been in the real estate calling, and, at the time of the trial, living with her fourth husband, the defendant George Washington Smith. Her first husband, it appears, died; the marriage relation between herself and her second, as well as her third husband, was dissolved by the surgery of divorce.

From the record before us we gather that plaintiff's husband had died several years prior to the trial; that for a long time prior to his death plaintiff and he had owned the particular land described in the complaint, and which is the land in controversy here, as joint tenants with the right of survivorship; that, on the probate of the estate of said deceased, the life estate of the latter was terminated, and the sole title, both legal and equitable, became, and was by the court declared to be, vested in the plaintiff by virtue of a decree duly and legally entered under and in pursuance of the provisions of section 1723 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith, for some reason, was not pleased with this disposition of the property; and that she apparently then devised a plan whereby she might become the owner thereof, notwithstanding said decree.

For many years an intimate acquaintance had existed between plaintiff, plaintiff's said husband, and one William Freeman, a reputable member of the bar of this state. In fact, the plaintiff and her husband had known Mr. Freeman from his boyhood, and each of them regarded him with high esteem, having absolute confidence in him. The trial court found—and, we think, correctly, too—"that said William Freeman acted at all times in the utmost good faith in the settlement of said estate." Notwithstanding this fact, the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith originated and maintained for a considerable time a propaganda designed to and which eventually did arouse in the mind of this plaintiff a doubt as to the integrity of said Freeman, which doubt finally occasioned the supplanting of Mr. Freeman by another equally reputable member of the bar—Mr. Horace C. Head of Santa Ana, Cal.—who, however, would not accept such employment until determining that such substitution was entirely satisfactory to Mr. Freeman. The hook, upon which the argument used by said defendant Smith in poisoning plaintiff's mind against said Freeman was hung, was the fact that the latter had, as a matter of convenience and for the saving of expense, procured a deed from plaintiff, as the administratrix of her deceased husband's estate, to one Dr. Talley and wife, which deed was to be used in a contemplated compromise, authorized at the time by the judge of the probate court wherein the proceedings relating to the probate of said decedent's estate were pending, of certain claims presented by Dr. Talley and wife against said estate. This deed, however, was never used. During the time subsequent to its execution, though, the defendant Mrs. Smith, according to plaintiff's testimony—which was believed by the trial court—kept up her propaganda, insisting that plaintiff "may have signed away" her rights, that she was signing papers the contents of which she did not know, that Freeman might get the property, etc. In this connection plaintiff testified:

"Well, I studied over it and prayed over it, and I thought, well, there couldn't be any harm in it. She and the children would be the only heirs I would have; what difference would it make? I felt that way; but still I thought, well, there could be such a thing that William [Mr. Freeman] might have done such a thing. Of course, things happen we never expect in this life. * * * Honestly, I didn't have any peace now. Every few days we would go over that. I got nervous over that. It worried me to lose confidence in my friend."

This was kept up so long that plaintiff concluded that perhaps, in order to avoid any such possibility as suggested, the best thing to do was to give her daughter, Mrs. Smith, a deed to the property in question, in compliance with the latter's suggestion that by so doing she, the defendant, would thus save the home for plaintiff. According to one of plaintiff's witnesses—Mrs. Wells—a daughter of the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith, the latter said to plaintiff:

"You have signed some papers or deeds, and you do not know but what you have signed away your rights to the place, and Freeman will defraud you from it, and I will protect you in this if you will give me a deed."

The instrument, in the form of a gift deed, was executed accordingly. The trial court found that—

Plaintiff had "no intention of making a gift or parting with her title to the said property. * * * That the said deed was made for the sole purpose of conveying the said property to said defendant, Carrie F. Holder Smith, in trust for plaintiff, to be held for said plaintiff and conveyed to her upon demand, or to carry out plaintiff's wishes in regard to the same."

[1] There is direct conflict on this point, and the findings of the learned trial court are amply supported by the evidence. We cannot, therefore, interfere. The trust referred to above was thereafter deliberately repudiated by said defendant. Her conduct toward plaintiff was, according to a legitimate inference which may be drawn from the evidence, cruel, and almost ruthless. The record shows that she tried to throw things from the house on the premises in question; broke the screen door open by force; took things away; locked up one room which plaintiff had rented; and herself demanded the payment of rent from plaintiff's renters who were occupying rooms upstairs in plaintiff's said premises, which rent, according to plaintiff's own testimony, was her sole source of income.

Appellants urge five points for reversal:

(1) "The complaint does not state a cause of action, and is subject to general demurrer. The causes of action are inconsistent and repugnant, and would not be joined. They are stated and commingled in such a manner that the defendants could not be informed by the complaint of the ultimate facts upon which the plaintiff relied, and whether the plaintiff claimed the property as the owner in fee or as beneficiary of an express trust or of a constructive trust." (2) "The object of the parties and deed at the time of its execution was to convey a legal estate in fee simple as a gift to the defendant for her own use, and not in trust for the plaintiff." (3) "The motion of the defendants for a nonsuit, when plaintiff rested her case in the trial, ought to have been granted by the trial court." (4) "The motion of defendants for the appointment of a receiver should have been granted by the trial court." (5) "The motion of the defendants for a new trial should have been granted by the trial court."

In other words, these five "points" may be divided, for convenience, into two divisions: (1) Errors of law occurring at the trial; and (2) insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

[2, 3] As to the first point urged—the demurrer—it should be suggested that no demurrer, general or special, was on file or before the trial court, but is urged here for the first time. As against a general demurrer, the complaint in this action is sufficient. As to any ground for the special demurrer, that was waived, and cannot be considered here. Section 434, Kerr's Cyclopedic Code of Civil Procedure, and cases cited thereunder.

With respect to the second point, as we have already seen, the trial court found against defendants' contention, and there is abundant evidence to support such finding.

As to the third and fourth points, it logically follows, from what we have said above, that the learned trial court was correct in its ruling denying defendants' motion for nonsuit. And with the same force it may be stated that, the findings being supported by the evidence, and they being in favor of plaintiff, it is not only apparent, but, we think, must now be obvious to all, that no order which the trial court might have made appointing a receiver for plaintiff's property, under the facts disclosed by this record, could stand. The ruling thereon was correct.

A consideration of the fifth point urged discloses the fact that, upon the presentation of the motion for a new trial, two affidavits were filed and presented to the court—one by each of the defendants here. The affidavit of defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith shows, among other things, that her mother (plaintiff) was very much opposed to affiant's marriage to her defendant husband; that the plaintiff had, "about three months prior to said trial," told affiant-defendant that "there is a scheme—we have a scheme by which you will be compelled to give me the property. * * * You had better deed me the property before it is too late"; that she (affiant) forgot to call this fact to the attention of her attorneys before and during the trial; that because of said alleged fact she claimed and charged that there existed between the plaintiff and certain witnesses who testified at the trial, a conspiracy to defraud her out of the property in controversy; and that she did not believe until after the trial that such a conspiracy existed. The affidavit of the defendant George Washington Smith was intended to bolster up the defendant wife's affidavit as to the plaintiff being opposed to their marriage; but even although he claims to have had the conversation to which he refers in his affidavit with the plaintiff shortly after the marriage of defendants, that notwithstanding this fact, he did not mention the incident to defendants' attorneys nor to his defendant wife for the reason, among others, "that this affiant did not wish to prejudice and bias the mind of his wife against her mother," plaintiff here. There were no counter affidavits.

On the trial the defendant George Washington Smith testified in part as follows:

"Q. You are one of the defendants here? A. I ain't much interested in it. Q. You have been attending the trial here? A. Yes. Q. You have heard Mrs. Marsh testify as to certain statements you made to her with reference to her property in question? A. Yes. Q. I will ask you to state whether or not you made such statements? A. That's not true, because I never talked to any of them about that proposition whatever; I would swear to it."

[4] If this testimony be true, then it is unnecessary to point out that the statements made in his affidavit, to which we have just referred, cannot also be true. Under this state of the record, therefore, we cannot say that the trial court erred in refusing to believe the statements made in such affidavit, or in denying the motion for a new trial.

[5] But there is, we think, a stronger reason why the action of the court in denying the motion for a new trial should be sustained, viz.: Assuming that the court believed the affidavits presented, in their entirety, still the motion would have to be denied because they show on their face that the evidence sought to be introduced on a new trial was in the possession of defendants and affiants long before and during the time the cause was pending, and that they did not see fit to avail themselves of it. Hence the motion was very properly denied. County of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681. James v. Oakland Traction Co.,

10 Cal. App. 785, 103 Pac. 1082. Defendants certainly cannot be permitted to assert their own alleged forgetfulness—which is, so far as this case is concerned, but another term for negligence—and expect to succeed in maintaining their contention thereunder.

[6] But one other question need be considered: Did the court err in striking out certain evidence regarding moneys claimed to have been expended upon the property by the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith? We think not. As already stated, defendants claimed to be the actual owners in fee of said property. There was no cross-complaint served, filed in the case or considered by the trial court. Indeed, the defendants claim here to be the absolute owners of the property. Had a cross-complaint been filed, therefore, it might have been stricken from the files. Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195. With this condition of the record, can it be successfully maintained that defendants could legally obtain a judgment against the plaintiff for any moneys which they might have expended?

It is contended by appellants that the defendant Carrie F. Holder Smith "has made large expenditures in the improvement of the property, and it would be inequitable and unjust that these amounts should not be repaid to said defendant in case she is deprived of the property and the deed canceled"; and in support of such contention we are cited the following cases: Sullivan v. California Realty Co., 142 Cal. 201, 75 Pac. 767, Clint v. Eureka Oil Co., 3 Cal. App. 463, 86 Pac. 817, Herman v. Haffenegger, 54 Cal. 161, and Norris v. Lilly, 147 Cal. 754, 82 Pac. 425, 109 Am. St. Rep. 188. None of these cases is, we think, in point. The first case cited does hold that the failure of the trial court to allow defendant expenses necessarily incurred, etc., was error; but that holding was upon a state of facts much different from those with which we are here confronted. In that case it appears from the evidence that the defendant, with plaintiff's consent, had the entire management of the property—a condition not presented in the case at bar. Indeed, there was no dispute in that matter on this phase of the question. Nor was there any evidence indicating an abuse of authority by one occupying a position of trust. This being true, defendant there was entitled, both in law and morals, to the return of any moneys expended by him while so acting. In the case at bar no such facts are found. We have already seen the methods employed by the defendant Mrs. Smith to procure the deed in the first instance. No equity is acquired through fraud. By her own testimony it conclusively appears that the expenditures claimed to have been made were not made because of a reliance upon the deed, but because she claimed that it was her own property—"my father died and he gave me this part of it, as I understood it"; in short, that the expenditures would have been incurred, deed or no deed.

The answer to our query must be in the negative.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WILSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. LAND CO.
(Civ. 3237.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 31, 1920. Rehearing Denied April 30, 1920; Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 27, 1920.)

1. Trial $\S$ 156(2,3)—Every favorable inference given plaintiff on, motion for nonsuit.

— On motion for nonsuit, every favorable inference fairly deducible, and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced, must be considered as facts proved in favor of plaintiff, and any contradictory evidence must be disregarded.

2. Principal and agent $\S$ 48 — Gratuitous agent must exercise good faith.

A gratuitous agent is obliged to exercise good faith toward his principal.

3. Principal and agent $\S$ 70—Acceptance by gratuitous agent of commission from other party renders contract voidable.

Where gratuitous agent for purchaser of land, in accordance with a prior contract with an agent for the seller, received commissions, the contract was voidable at the election of purchaser within a reasonable time after discovery of the fraud, but was not absolutely void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by Charles S. Wilson against the Southern Pacific Land Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. E. Spencer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GOSBEY, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action for the rescission of three separate executory contracts for the sale of real property from the respondent to the appellant. Each contract is the subject of a separate count in the amended complaint. A fourth count was added, being a common count for money had and received.

The plaintiff sought to have said contracts rescinded because of some alleged fraudulent transaction on the part of the person, who, he alleges, was representing him in negotiating for the purchase of the land described in the amended complaint.

Two of the contracts referred to in the amended complaint are dated the 30th day of January, 1914, which we shall hereinafter designate as contracts A and B; the third contract is dated the 14th day of April, 1914, which we shall designate as contract C. Each contract describes certain land located in the county of Riverside, state of California.

The purchase price of the land described in each contract and the payments to be made thereon were agreed to as follows: For the land described in contracts A and B it was $2,080 for each piece, and for that described in contract C it was $3,200. The initial payment mentioned in each contract was 10 per cent. of the purchase price, to be made on the execution of the several contracts. Payments were made as follows: $208 on the 30th day of January, 1914, on each parcel of land described in contracts A and B, and $320 on the 14th day of April, 1914, on the land described in contract C. Payments on the balance of the purchase price, as mentioned in each contract, were to be made in nine equal annual installments, beginning (as per stipulation made between the parties subsequent to the dates of said contracts) on the 30th day of January, 1916, on each of the parcels of land described in contracts A and B, and on the 14th day of April, 1916, on the land described in contract C. Each deferred payment was to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the dates of the contracts, respectively. The contracts further provided that the plaintiff should pay all taxes and assessments against the land described in contracts A and B, beginning with the fiscal year July 1, 1914, and on the land described in contract C, beginning with the fiscal year July 1, 1915.

The plaintiff alleges that the interest and taxes on the land described in contracts A and B were paid up to January 30, 1916, while the interest and taxes on the land described in contract C were paid up to July 31, 1915, and to November 26, 1915, respectively. In all the plaintiff claimed to have paid the sum of $1,461.30 on these contracts, which sum he seeks to recover in the said fourth count.

It is further alleged in said amended complaint that one H. C. Farnum was the agent of plaintiff for conducting and carrying on negotiations for the purchase by plaintiff of the said land; that said Farnum entered into an agreement with and received from H. R. Burns, the agent of the defendant, certain commissions on the sale of said land, which arrangement plaintiff knew nothing of until on or about the 10th day of February, 1917. On the 15th day of February, 1917, the plaintiff, upon discovering this arrangement between Farnum and Burns, notified the defendant that he had rescinded said contracts, offered to reconvey the lands to the defendant, and demanded the return of all moneys which he had paid to the defendant on said contract. The defendant, in its answer, denied that said H. R. Burns was ever its agent for conducting or carrying on negotiations for the said executory contracts (A, B, and C) mentioned in the plaintiff's amended complaint, and also denied that prior to the execution of said executory contracts, or any of them, that Burns, acting as its agent, agreed with Farnum to pay the latter any commissions or compensation, if Farnum should induce the plaintiff to become the purchaser of said land.

The defendant avers that upon the date set forth in the amended complaint, when the plaintiff notified the defendant that he had rescinded said contracts, there was no contractual relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant; but that plaintiff's rights under said contracts A, B, and C had long prior thereto been wholly forfeited, because of the nonpayment of the several installments, mentioned in said contracts, when they became due and payable, as time was made expressly of the essence of said agreements.

The defendant further denied that it was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,461.30, or in any other sum whatsoever.

The evidence produced at the trial of this action established the following facts: H. R. Burns was the agent for the defendant in the sale of the land referred to in the amended complaint. Civ. Code, §§ 2300, 2307. A year or so before the said contracts were executed, Burns had several conversations with Farnum, relative to any sales the latter might make of said land. Before the plaintiff entered into said contracts, or was known as a prospective purchaser of any portion of said land, Burns had promised to pay Farnum $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. commission on all sales of land the latter might make for the former. Subsequently the plaintiff and Farnum talked about buying the land involved herein. This resulted in the plaintiff requesting or asking Farnum to attend to and negotiate for the purchase of said land by the plaintiff from the defendant. Farnum consented to do this, rendered such service for the plaintiff, and succeeded in getting Burns to make the sales of the land upon the terms and conditions set out in said contracts. For the services Farnum rendered the plaintiff he received no compensation, but it was agreed between the plaintiff and Farnum that in case of the sale of the land thereafter that Farnum was to have one-fourth of the profits resulting therefrom, after deducting certain amounts for expenditures, provided such resales should be made on or before one year from the date of said contracts. It was further agreed between them that Farnum might acquire a one-fourth interest in the land within the year by paying therefor one-fourth of all the money expended by the plaintiff for it.

Pursuant to the agreement made by and between Burns and Farnum, the former paid to the latter certain sums of money as commissions on the sales of said land, which had been made to the plaintiff by Burns. The plaintiff was ignorant of the Burns-Farnum agreement and of the payments made thereunder, when he entered into said contracts. He did not discover the same until on or about the 10th day of February, 1917. A few days thereafter he commenced this action.

The plaintiff executed said contracts on the dates they bear. He made the initial payments thereon on the purchase price when he signed the contracts; he also paid interest on the deferred payments, as well as some taxes. The total amount of such payments was $1,461.30. Because of the agreement between Burns and Farnum and the payment of the commissions thereunder, the plaintiff would have said contracts rescinded by a court of equity.

Did the plaintiff make out a prima facie case and was the court warranted in granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit?

[1] It has been well established by a long line of decisions that, upon a motion for nonsuit being made, every favorable inference fairly deducible, and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiff. All the evidence in favor of the plaintiff must be taken as true, and if any contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 586, 82 Pac. 252; Christensen Lbr. Co. v. Buckley, 17 Cal. App. 37, 44, 118 Pac. 466.

[2] The evidence shows that Farnum was a gratuitous agent of the plaintiff in negotiating the sales of the land described in the contracts and in procuring the execution of said contracts. Such agency having been thus established, Farnum was obliged to exercise good faith toward his principal. Kevane v. Miller, 4 Cal. App. 598, 602, 88 Pac. 643; 2 Corp. Juris, 433, 694; Samonset v. Mesnager, 108 Cal. 354, 358, 41 Pac. 337; Civ. Code, § 1975.

"If one of the parties to a business transaction does not deal directly with the other party, but with the latter's agent or employé, and enters into a secret and corrupt agreement with the agent by which the agent undertakes, for a reward or commission, given or promised, to induce his principal to contract with the party so binding him, or to sell the property to him, or otherwise to deal with him, according to the case, the transaction is so far tainted ed with fraud that the principal may rescind and repudiate it, if he acts with due promptness upon discovering the facts." 1 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, 80, § 34.

The court said in Yeiser v. United States Board and Paper Co., 107 Fed. 340, 345, 46 C. C. A. 567, 572 (52 L. R. A. 724):

"We have, on several occasions, held that where one who assumes to act as the agent of another in a given transaction is really acting as the agent of a third person, or in behalf of some scheme of his own, his apparent principal, having no knowledge of such alien purpose, is not bound by such pretended agent's acts, nor by any notice or knowledge of facts which such agent had at the time the transaction was going forward. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Capitol Electric Co., 12 C. C. A. 643, 65 Fed. 341; Wilson v. Pauly, 18 C. C. A. 475, 72 Fed. 129, 134; Louisville Trust Co. v. Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co., 22 C. C. A. 378, 75 Fed. 433, 469."

The court said in U. S. Rolling Stock Co. v. Atlantic & Great Western R. R. Co., 34 Ohio St. 450, 32 Am. Rep. 380:

"The rule that an agent or trustee in matters touching his agency, or pertaining to the trust, cannot bind the principal of cestui que trust, without his consent, by a contract in which the former is adversely interested, rests upon a very satisfactory foundation, and is supported by a great weight of authority." Wade v. Pettibone, 11 Ohio, 57, 37 Am. Dec. 408; Morrison v. Thompson, L. R. 9 Q. B. 480; 1 Lead. Cas. in Eq. 192.

In Story on Agency, § 210, the rule is said to be founded "upon the plain and obvious consideration, that the principal bargains, in the employment, for the exercise of the disinterested skill, diligence, and zeal of the agent for his own exclusive benefits. It is a confidence necessarily reposed in the agent, that he will act with a sole regard to the interest of his principal as far as he carefully may." And in 2 Kent's Com. 618, the same principle is asserted in the following language:

"An agent, acting as such, cannot take upon himself at the same time, an incompatible duty. He cannot have an adverse interest or employment. He cannot be both buyer and seller, for this would expose his fiduciary trust to abuse and fraud. * * * The rule which prevents the agent or trustee from acting for himself in a matter where his interest would conflict with his duty, also prevents him from acting for another whose interest is adverse to that of the principal; and in all cases, where without the assent of the principal, the agent has assumed to act in such double capacity, the principal may avoid the transaction, at his election. No question of fairness or unfairness can be raised. The court holds it constructively fraudulent, and voidable at the election of the principal."

In a case entitled Lightcap v. Nicola, found in 34 Pa. Super. Ct. 189, and which was very fully and ably considered by the presiding judge of said court, the same issues were raised as in the case now under consideration. The facts were stated as follows:

"This was an action of assumpsit upon a contract entered into in the latter part of January, 1902, between Samuel Gilson Lightcap, executor, acting under a power contained in the will of William Walker, deceased, and Frank Nicola, for the sale to the latter of a tract of land known as the Walker Farm. The price stipulated in the contract was $31,000, of which $1,000 were paid when the contract was executed by Nicola and the balance was to be paid not later than June 1, 1902, at which time the deed was to be delivered. The defense set up was that the vendor, without the knowledge of the defendant, entered into a contract with one S. B. Cooley, the defendant's agent or employé, to pay the latter a commission. * * *

"The court having declined the defendant's point for instruction 'that under all the evidence the verdict must be for the defendant,' and the jury having rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs for $36,150.50, the balance of the purchase money, the defendant moved to have all the evidence certified and filed as part of the record, and for judgment non obstante veredicto upon said record. The court sustained the motion and entered judgment in favor of the defendant in the sum of $1,240, the amount, with interest, paid by the defendant at the execution of the contract."

After reviewing the testimony taken at the trial of the action, the learned judge, who wrote the opinion, said:

"The court would have been warranted in instructing the jury that Cooley was the defendant's employé and agent in the purchase of lands, and acted as such in the negotiations which culminated in the contract of sale upon which this action was brought. * * *

"It was not proved that Lightcap knew that Cooley was the defendant's employé or agent; nor was it shown affirmatively that he was ignorant of that fact."

We may determine, however, from the opinion that the court found that Cooley's actions and conversations were doubtless sufficient to warrant the conclusion by Lightcap that he (Cooley) was the employé or agent of the defendant.

"The two legal questions which arise upon the foregoing facts, are: First, whether the defendant had a right to rescind the contract of sale, and recover the $1,000 he had paid upon its execution by him; second, whether he exercised the right within a reasonable time. By whatever name it may be called, whether that of principal and agent or of employer and employé, the relation which existed between Cooley and the defendant imposed on Cooley the duty to act with fidelity and the utmost good faith toward the defendant in purchasing or assisting to purchase this land. When one under such obligation to the purchaser enters into such relation with the seller as is evidenced by the commission agreement in this case, without the knowledge and consent of the purchaser, he puts himself in the position of attempting to serve two masters whose interests are opposed. This is against the policy of the law, and that, too, irrespective of the mode of compensation. A fortiori it is so, if the amount of the commission to be received from the seller depends upon the price the purchaser can be induced to pay for the land. 'The ground for the disqualification,' said Chief Justice Thompson, quoting from 8 Tomlin's Brown, 72, 'is no other than that principle which dictates that a person cannot be both judge and party. No man can serve two masters. He that is intrusted with the interests of others cannot be allowed to make the business an object of interest to himself, because, from a frailty of nature, one who has the power will be too readily seized with the inclination to use the opportunity for serving his own interest at the expense of those for whom he is intrusted. The danger of temptation from the facility and advantage for doing wrong which a particular situation affords, does, out of the mere necessity, work a disqualification.' Everhart v. Searle, 71 Pa. 256. In the same case, speaking of the argument that as the seller was not injured by the arrangement which his agent made with the purchaser, there was nothing wrong in making that arrangement, he said: 'This is specious, but not sound. The transaction is to be regarded as against the policy of the law, and not binding upon a party who has a right to object to it. "It matters not," it is said, page 210 of Hare and Wallace's Notes, 1 Lead. Cases in Eq., "that there was no fraud meditated and no injury done; the rule is not intended to be remedial of actual wrong, but preventive of the possibility of it." This was said of any one who acts representatively, or whose office is to advise or operate not for himself but for others.' * * * Where the seller of land, or his agent in the transaction, has knowledge that there exists between the purchaser and another such a relation that it would be a breach of duty on the part of that other person to enter into a similar relation with the seller, the same principle of law which forbids him to do so while still acting for the purchaser, must, if it is worthy to be called a rule, or policy or principle of law, forbid the seller to enter into that relation with the purchaser's agent or employé without the knowledge and consent of his principal or employer. To hold that the seller, without any risk to himself, can thus be a party to the agent's or employé's breach of duty, and have the benefit of his active service, great or small, in selling the land, or the benefit of the diminution of the diligence he owes to the purchaser, would be contrary to sound principle; it would open the door to fraud of the most mischievous character, and as difficult to detect and prove as it is mischievous. The rule being, not merely remedial of actual wrong, but preventive of the possibility of it, it may be invoked not only against the unfaithful agent or employé in an action involving his commission or other form of compensation, but also against the seller; and under such a state of facts as we have set forth above it must be regarded as the foundation of a right in the purchaser to rescind the contract of sale upon discovery of the constructive fraud."

[3] The actions of Farnum, in the instant case, were very similar to the actions and conduct of Cooley in the case from which we have so fully quoted. Such conduct, however, would not render the contract between Wilson and the defendant void, but only voidable at the election of Wilson, who should act within a reasonable time after he discovered the fraudulent acts and conduct of Farnum. This he did.

We are satisfied the plaintiff made out a prima facie case. The motion for nonsuit was therefore improperly granted.

Judgment reversed.

BERRY v. COHN et al. (Civ. 3267.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 7, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 3, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession ⇨22—Exclusive use of uninclosed land during grazing season may be sufficient.

The exclusive use of uninclosed land for grazing during the grazing season may constitute adverse possession.

2. Adverse possession ⇨27—Persons having possession during grazing season only must negative possession of others.

Persons claiming title to uninclosed land by adverse possession by reason of its use for grazing during the grazing season have the burden of proving that the land was not occupied by any one else during the part of each year it was not in use by them.

3. Adverse possession ⇨33, 38—Evidence sufficient to support finding of exclusive and open possession.

Where defendants claimed title to land by adverse possession by reason of its use for grazing during the grazing season for many years, evidence held sufficient to support a finding of its exclusive and open possession.

4. Adverse possession ⇨27—Evidence sufficient to support finding of adverse possession through agent.

Evidence showing that land was purchased by C. at a void tax sale in the name and on behalf of his brother, that he was his brother's general agent to transact all kinds of business in the county, and that as such agent he rented the property for his brother and paid taxes on it until his brother conveyed the property to him, was sufficient to support a finding that he was authorized to represent his brother to the extent that adverse possession might be acquired through such agency.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered against her in an action to quiet title to real property in Kern county. The defenses relied upon by defendants were that title had been acquired: First, by tax deed to L. Cohn in August, 1904; and, second, by adverse possession under color of title. On the trial it was stipulated that plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the property at the time of the tax sale, and that she had not divested herself of her interest or title therein by any conveyance executed since that date. The trial court found that the tax deed under which defendants claimed title was void for the reason that the property was sold to the state and thereafter by the state to L. Cohn for a less amount in each instance than provided by law. The judgment quieting title in C. Cohn was based upon the second defense, which is the only one to be considered upon this appeal.

On August 13, 1904, the tax collector of Kern county executed a deed of the property involved in this action to defendant L. Cohn. In May, 1914, L. Cohn, by quitclaim deed, conveyed to defendant C. Cohn. The affairs of L. Cohn with relation to the purchase and occupation of this land were conducted by C. Cohn, the latter claiming to have acted as agent for the former.

Appellant contends that the judgment based upon the conclusion of the trial court that title to the land in question is vested in C. Cohn by reason of adverse possession is erroneous because: First, the evidence does not sustain the finding that the possession of C. Cohn was hostile, exclusive, continuous, and uninterrupted; and, second, there is no showing that the acts of C. Cohn claimed to have been done by him as the agent of L. Cohn, and so relied upon as constituting adverse possession by L. Cohn, were done with the knowledge or consent of L. Cohn or under any authority to perform those acts.

All taxes were paid by C. Cohn from the date of the tax deed to L. Cohn to the commencement of this action on October 5, 1917. The land was not personally occupied by either of the Cohns, but was rented to other parties by C. Cohn on behalf of L. Cohn prior to the conveyance of 1914 and thereafter by C. Cohn in his own behalf. C. Cohn testified that prior to 1907 or 1908 he rented the land to one John Maio, who did not himself occupy it, he being in the business of renting to others for sheep-grazing purposes. There is no evidence to indicate the date it was so rented to him, the length of the lease, or the use to which it was put during that period. Maio's tenancy need be given no further consideration, as there can be no doubt that the evidence offered with regard to it failed to meet the requirements for adverse possession. In 1908 C. Cohn rented the land to J. B. Raymond. From that time until the trial, to which time his tenancy continued, the adverse possession of the land by defendants is founded solely upon its occupancy by Raymond. Occupation of the land by Raymond consisted in its use for sheep-grazing purposes only. The land was uninclosed and formed part of a large open tract. Raymond testified that he rented the land from C. Cohn and went there the 1st of January, 1908, remaining until April, that some years he took sheep there in the summer for dry feed which he had stored upon the land—"maybe a couple of times every five or six years"—but in the ordinary years he pastured his sheep upon the land as soon as the fall rains started the green feed, and used all the feed that grew on the land (pasturing 1,500 or 2,000 sheep there for two or three months each year), and that he then took his sheep and left the place entirely. He also testified that he had five or six sections of land, including the half section involved herein, upon which his sheep grazed, that they were not impounded by a fence or in any other way, and that two or three months covered the time spent upon the entire tract and not the time spent upon the Cohn half section alone. The evidence shows that each year he had a sheep corral on this particular half section, sometimes a tent for the herders, and that on some occasions he left a man on it to guard the dry feed when he took his sheep to other pastures. Raymond knew the boundaries of the land in question and testified that during the time he was on the land each year no other sheep grazed on it and it was not used by any one else for any purpose. The witness Reynolds was produced by respondents, and testified that, so far as he was aware, no one else used the land during Raymond's absence. His testimony developed the fact that he lived with his family on a tract of land adjoining the half section from 1910 to the date of the trial, and that, though he was away from that vicinity during a portion of the period referred to, he returned to his home two or three times each week and often remained for two weeks at a time.

[1, 2] The foregoing are the facts relied upon by respondents for the purpose of showing adverse possession. The exclusive use of uninclosed land for grazing during the grazing season may constitute adverse possession. Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 18, 15 Pac. 431. There is no conflict in the evidence as to the use made by respondents. But the additional burden was on them to prove that the land was not occupied by any one else during the nine or 10 months each year it was admittedly not in use by them. Cory v. Hotchkiss, 31 Cal. App. 443, 447, 160 Pac. 841; Saecker v. Cohn (Sup.) 179 Pac. 890.

[3] In this respect respondents were required to prove a negative. No evidence of any character was offered by appellant even suggesting possession or user during any portion of the period of 20 years she had failed to pay any taxes upon the property. The witness Raymond did testify that during the period of his lease, 1908-1918, no one else used or occupied the land during the pasturing season except his sublessee during the season of 1917. The witness Reynolds testified that, with the exception of the same sublessee, the land had not been occupied or used by any one other than respondents' lessee for any other purpose since 1910. This witness lived on the land adjoining that in controversy, and was apparently the one having the best knowledge of the occupancy of the land.

The evidence of adverse possession differs materially from that considered in Cory v. Hotchkiss, supra, and Saecker v. Cohn, supra, and brings the case squarely within the rule of Webber v. Clarke, supra. The evidence, though meager, is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that respondent had maintained an exclusive and open possession for the statutory period.

[4] Appellant also argues that the evidence is insufficient to support the conclusion that C. Cohn was authorized to represent his brother to the extent that adverse possession might be acquired through such agency. But the evidence is that the land was purchased by C. Cohn in the name and on behalf of his brother; that C. Cohn was a general agent to transact all kinds of business for his brother in Kern county; that as such agent he rented this property for his brother and paid all taxes on it for him since 1904 and until 1914, when the brother by deed conveyed the property to him. This testimony was received in evidence without objection, and, taken with the ratification contained in the deed of the principal and the inferences which could properly be drawn from the entire evidence, was sufficient to support the finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

DYER v. MINTURN et al. (Civ. 3045.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1920.)

1. Limitation of actions ⚡54(2) — Account between joint purchasers of property held a "mutual account."

An account between joint purchasers of real estate, containing on one side payments made by one of the parties to persons performing work and furnishing materials in the improvement and repair of the property and payments on the land and interest on deferred payments, and on the other side similar payments by the other party, and showing a balance in favor of one, one-half of which was charged to the other, possessed all the elements of a "mutual account," under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, and section 344, under which limitation ran only from the date of the last item.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mutual Accounts.]

2. Witnesses ⚡167—Party suing estate competent to testify that rejected claim corresponded with his books.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, providing that parties to an action or proceeding against an executor or administrator on a claim against the estate cannot testify as to matters or facts occurring before the death of decedent, was not violated by plaintiff's testimony that his rejected claim, shown him, was a correct statement of the account against decedent, "as shown by his books," as he did not testify that the books were correct, or the claim correct, but only that they corresponded.

3. Witnesses ⚡171—Proof of fact not required to be proved by party suing estate not incompetent.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, was not violated in an action on a claim against a decedent's estate by allowing plaintiff to testify that the account had not been paid, as in seeking to establish nonpayment plaintiff was endeavoring to prove something that the law did not require him to prove.

4. Payment ⚡65(6)—Defendant has burden of proving payment.

The allegation of nonpayment of a debt sued on need not be proved, and the burden of proof of payment is on defendant.

5. Witnesses ⚡167 — Testimony that claim agreed with books of deceased was competent.

In an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, the testimony of one of the defendants, as a witness for plaintiff, that the claim sued on corresponded with the books kept by deceased, did not involve or relate to a matter or fact occurring before the death of deceased, and its admission was not error, especially where defendants afterwards called the same witness and proved that the account sued on and the books of deceased were substantially the same, and offered the books in evidence.

6. Executors and administrators ⚡221(4)—Books of account of deceased, with other evidence, held to support finding of balance due claimant.

In an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, the books of the decedent, supplemented by testimony of a witness for defendants that the account sued on was substantially the same as the account shown by such books, supported a finding that there was a balance due plaintiff, in the absence of proof of payment.

7. Appeal and error ⚡907(5)—Books of account omitted from record presumed to sustain finding.

A finding supported by oral testimony and books of account will be presumed correct, where books were not in the record on appeal.

8. Appeal and error ⚡1152—Error in form of judgment may be corrected by modification.

An error in a personal judgment against executors, in that it does not direct that payment be made by them in the due course of administration, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1504, may be corrected by a modification of the judgment on appeal.

Action by A. B. Dyer against Rozene M. Minturn, executrix, and W. B. Minturn, executor, of the estate of James W. Minturn, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $892.01, in an action instituted by plaintiff against the representatives of the estate of James W. Minturn, deceased, for the purpose of establishing the validity of a rejected claim presented against said estate by plaintiff for a balance claimed to be due upon a mutual, open and current account. Minturn died on May 27, 1917. Defendants deny the indebtedness, aver payment, and plead the statute of limitations.

[1] The question of the application of the statute of limitations depends upon the character of the account sued upon. If, as plaintiff avers, a "mutual, open, and current account" has been shown, the action is not barred by the statute, for the reason that suit was commenced within four years from the date of the last item of the account. Subdivision 2, §§ 337 and 344, Code Civ. Proc. Appellants claim that no mutual, open, and current account has been shown. In this respect it is contended that the account sued upon lacks mutuality and reciprocal demands, and is merely a statement showing payments advanced by plaintiff to third persons for and on behalf of plaintiff and said Minturn, for which suit should have been brought within two years from the date of the last item stated therein. Subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civ. Proc.

From the evidence it is made to appear that plaintiff and the deceased, Minturn, purchased jointly and paid for in installments certain residence property in Fresno, which they remodeled and afterwards used as their home. Both plaintiff and the deceased advanced money to pay for labor and materials in the renovation of the dwelling, and each kept a book of account, in which entries of such payments were made. The account sued upon, which is set forth in the rejected claim, was taken by plaintiff from plaintiff's books. Upon its face it shows the various entries of debit and credit in separate columns. The debit column represents the payments made by plaintiff to persons who performed work and furnished materials in the improvement and repair of said residence and covers a period from September 30, 1912, to January 4, 1914, and also represents the payments made by plaintiff on the land, and the interest on deferred payments, from October 7, 1914, to and including November 13, 1916. The credit column shows the payments made by Minturn to persons performing work and furnishing materials for said residence, and also the payments by him on the land, and the interest on deferred payments. Upon its face the account appears to have been balanced, and shows that plaintiff expended $10,866.51 more than Minturn, and that one-half thereof, to wit, $5,433.25, was charged to Minturn, of which Minturn had paid $4,500, leaving a balance due in favor of plaintiff of $933.26. In other words, on the one side of the account are shown the different items furnished and amounts paid by plaintiff for the joint benefit of himself and Minturn, and on the other side are shown the different items furnished and amounts paid by Minturn for like purposes, and a balance is shown in favor of plaintiff. From the face of the account it appears that the items constitute mutual credits founded on an implied agreement for the set-off of mutual debts; that the parties dealt with each other in the same relation, and the items of the account are capable of being set off against each other. The credit items do not consist of money payments from one to the other, but are made up of demands of a reciprocal character, and the account was permitted to run with a view of ultimate adjustment by the settlement and the payment by one to the other of the balance. Such an account possesses all the elements necessary to constitute a "mutual" account, and it must be so held. Millet v. Bradbury, 109 Cal. 170, 41 Pac. 865; Fraylor v. Sonora Min. Co., 17 Cal. 594; Norton v. Larco, 30

Cal. 126, 89 Am. Dec. 70; Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 84 Pac. 263. Suit was commenced on the account within four years from the date of the last item thereof, and therefore plaintiff's action was not barred by the statute.

[2] Appellants' second point is that the court erred in admitting evidence in violation of the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, the persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against an estate of a deceased person, cannot testify as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person. The instance first complained of is where plaintiff, having been called as a witness in his own behalf, was handed the rejected claim, which had been admitted in evidence without objection, and testified that, with the exception of one item thereof, amounting to $41.25, the rejected claim was a correct statement of the account as shown by his books. It is claimed by appellants that this testimony was admitted contrary to the rule stated in Colburn v. Parrett, 27 Cal. App. 541, 150 Pac. 786, and the authorities therein cited, which hold that, while a plaintiff himself may by his own testimony establish the fact that he kept books of account at a stated time, and that the books produced were the ones kept by him, he may not testify as to the correctness of said books, nor that the entries therein made are true and correct, for the reason that the giving of such testimony by a plaintiff would, in effect, be allowing the plaintiff to testify that he rendered to the deceased the services, or furnished the materials, or delivered the goods, etc., as the case may be, which the entries represent. But the testimony of plaintiff in the instant case did not extend that far. Plaintiff did not testify as to the correctness of his books of account, nor to the correctness of the account embodied in the rejected claim. He merely testified that the account embodied in the rejected claim was correct as shown by his books of account. In other words, he testified in effect that the account embodied in the rejected claim was a correct reproduction of the account shown by his books; that it did not vary or differ from the account shown by his books. That the trial court so understood the testimony, and was guarding carefully against a violation of the provisions of said section 1880, is clearly shown by the court's ruling, made immediately following the admission of this evidence, wherein the court ordered stricken out the affirmative answer given by plaintiff in response to a question asked by plaintiff's counsel, to wit, "And is a true account of your dealings with Mr. Minturn?" and by the court's effort to clarify the record by asking the question, "The question was simply whether your books show that [claim] to be correct, and you have stated in regard to one item that you waive that. Now, otherwise, your answer would be that the books do show it?" To which the plaintiff replied, "Yes, sir." It may be conceded that, if plaintiff had been allowed to testify that his books or the account as set forth in the rejected claim were correct, it probably would have constituted error. Such testimony was held to be admissible in Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 Pac. 284, 60 Am. Rep. 539, but that case was criticized in the later cases of Colburn v. Parrett, supra, and Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142. The cases last cited both hold, however, that the plaintiff may testify that he kept such books of account, and that the books produced were his books. Plaintiff's testimony in the instant case did not go even that far. He merely testified in effect that the account embodied in the rejected claim corresponded with the account in his books. It may be, as stated by the learned trial court in passing upon defendants' objection to the testimony, that such testimony might have been excluded upon the ground that the books were the best evidence. But defendant declined to urge that objection. The testimony, therefore, was properly admitted, and the court's ruling was free from error.

[3-5] Appellants next claim that said section 1880 was violated in allowing plaintiff to testify that the account had not been paid. There was no error committed. By seeking to establish nonpayment, plaintiff was endeavoring to prove something that the law did not require him to prove. In Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127, it is held that the allegation of nonpayment of a debt sued upon, though necessary to make the complaint perfect, need not be proved; but the burden of proof of payment is upon the defendant. Such is the established rule in this state. Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 14 Cal. App. 289, 300, 111 Pac. 760; Miller & Lux v. Dunlap, 28 Cal. App. 313, 152 Pac. 309; Stuart v. Lord, supra. Neither was it error for plaintiff to call as a witness Ward Minturn, one of the executors defendant, to prove by him that the claim sued upon corresponded with the books kept by deceased. Such evidence did not involve or relate to a "matter or fact occurring before the death of the deceased," and the point becomes entirely lacking in force, in view of the fact that defendants afterwards, as a part of their own case, called the same witness and proved by him that the account sued upon and the books of the deceased were "substantially the same." Thereupon defendants offered the books of the deceased in evidence.

[6, 7] There is no merit in the point that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. There were but three disputed issues: The character of the account sued upon, the payment of the balance due, and the statute of limitations. The first and third issues have been discussed and disposed of. That there was a balance due plaintiff was proved by the introduction in evidence by defendant of the books of the deceased, supplemented by the testimony of defendants' witness Ward Minturn that the account sued upon was "substantially the same" as the account shown by the books of the deceased. It is true that the contents of those books were not read into the record or copied into the transcript on appeal, but all intendments are in favor of the judgment of the lower court, and if, as testified to by the defendant Ward Minturn, the books of deceased and the account sued upon were "substantially the same," those books must have shown a similar balance due. The proof of payment of the balance due was, as we have seen, a matter resting upon the defendants, and they offered no proof on that point. In Cowdery v. McChesney, 124 Cal. 363, 57 Pac. 221, it was held that books of account kept by a deceased person, if not containing proof of payment of plaintiff's claim, may be looked to for evidence of the negative fact of nonpayment by deceased during his lifetime, and the foundation for the introduction of said books may be made even by plaintiff, if the books were kept by him.

[8] Appellants' final point is that the judgment is erroneous, because it is a personal judgment against the defendants, without directing, as required by section 1504 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the payment thereof be made by defendants in the due course of administration. Respondent concedes this point. The error may be corrected by a modification of the judgment. Drake v. Foster, 52 Cal. 225; Vance v. Smith, 124 Cal. 219, 56 Pac. 1031; Brinkley-Douglas Fruit Co. v. Silman, 33 Cal. App. 643, 166 Pac. 371.

The judgment is therefore modified, by adding thereto the words, "and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said executrix and executor of said last will and testament pay in due course of administration the amount of this judgment," and, as thus modified, the judgment will stand affirmed. Respondent will recover his costs.

MILLIKEN v. VALENCIA et al. (Civ. 3180.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1920.)

1. Quieting title — 43—Evidence that plaintiff held title in trust for brother held inadmissible as not within pleading.

In an action to quiet title against a judgment creditor and the sheriff who levied execution, testimony that plaintiff held an undivided half interest in the property in trust for his brother, the judgment debtor, held inadmissible on the ground defendants had not pleaded a trust or other equitable interest.

2. Appeal and error — 959(3)—Pleading — 236(3)—Allowance of amendments during trial in discretion of court.

The allowance of amendment to answer during trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, is largely in the discretion of the trial court, whose ruling will not be disturbed unless abuse is clearly shown.

3. Pleading — 236(7) — Amendments to answers properly denied as injecting new issue and failing to state facts showing claimed relation.

In action to quiet title against a judgment creditor and the sheriff who levied execution, allowance of amendments to defendants' answers to set forth a trust relation in which plaintiff stood to his brother, the judgment debtor, in relation to an undivided half interest in the land, held properly denied because adding an entirely new issue to the case, and because failing to state any facts showing the trust relation.

4. Quieting title — 44(4) — Denial of plaintiff's ownership and assertion of title not established by proof of equity.

In action to quiet title, where defense consists merely of denial of plaintiff's ownership, and assertion of title in a defendant, it is not established by proof that plaintiff is the owner of the legal title subject to an equity in defendant through plaintiff's holding in trust for his brother against whom defendant holds a judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Henry Milliken against Alvina Valencia and Frank P. Wilson, Sheriff of Riverside County. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Meserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles, and Richard L. North, of Riverside, for appellants.

M. Estudillo and Sarau & Thompson, all of Riverside, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. [1] This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment quieting title in plaintiff in and to certain tracts of land situate in Riverside county. The complaint alleges ownership in plaintiff, and further alleges that the defendant Frank P. Wilson, as sheriff of Riverside county, levied an execution on said property, issued in an action wherein Alvina Valencia, one of the defendants herein, obtained a money judgment against Phillip Milliken, a brother of plaintiff herein. The answers of the defendants, Wilson and Valencia, on information and belief denied plaintiff's title, and on information and belief alleged that said Phillip Milliken was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in said property. In support of his complaint plaintiff offered proof showing beyond question that he was the owner of the legal title to said property. Defendants then attempted to prove a state of circumstances which they claimed would show that plaintiff, Henry Milliken, held an undivided one-half interest in said property in trust for his brother, Phillip Milliken. Plaintiff objected to this character of testimony upon the ground that defendants had not pleaded a trust or any other equitable interest, and that they were therefore precluded from offering such proof. The court properly sustained the objection. Robinson v. Muir, 151 Cal. 118, 90 Pac. 521. Thereupon defendants asked leave to amend their respective answers so as to set forth such trust relation, but their application was denied by the court upon the ground that the allowance of such amendments would be adding an entirely new issue to the case. Notwithstanding the ruling of the court, much conflicting testimony of an asserted trust relation was injected into the record.

Appellants now contend that the court erred in disallowing defendants' proposed amendments, and that—

It "erroneously found that Henry and not Phillip was the owner of the properties in question, and in holding that Phillip had no interest therein subject to execution levy when the levy here in question was made."

[2, 3] The allowance of amendments during trial is a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court (section 473, Code Civ. Proc.), and it has been repeatedly held that the ruling of the trial court will not be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion is clearly shown. Billesbach v. Larkey, 161 Cal. 649, 120 Pac. 31; Brittan v. Oakland Sav. Bank, 124 Cal. 282, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58; In re Redfield's Estate, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794. We are satisfied that the reason assigned by the trial court for its ruling in denying leave to amend is sound; and furthermore that the amendments themselves as proposed were wholly insufficient to raise the question of the trust relation, because they utterly failed to state any facts showing that relation, merely alleging on information and belief the conclusion:

"That Henry Milliken, plaintiff herein, holds an undivided one-half interest in all of said real property in trust for said Phillip Milliken."

The pleadings, then, as they stood during the trial and at the time of the entry of judgment, consisted merely of an allegation of ownership by plaintiff, and a denial of such ownership by defendants, accompanied by an allegation that Phillip Milliken was the owner of an undivided one-half of said property. In that state of the pleadings the evidence of a trust relation or of an equity in Phillip Milliken was properly ignored by the court in its findings, and even if proved would not have permitted a judgment in defendants' favor to that effect.

[4] The situation here is similar to the one presented in Reilly v. Wright, 117 Cal. 77, 48 Pac. 970, wherein the court said:

"The other questions presented all grow out of an attempt on the part of the defendants to show an equitable title in defendant Wright, which was not pleaded. The whole matter was entirely without the issues raised by the pleadings, and, while the court admitted evidence upon the question, it eventually, and we think properly, entirely ignored such evidence in making its findings, and confined itself to the issues made by the pleadings."

In the later case of Robinson v. Muir, supra, it is held:

"Where the defense consists merely of a denial of plaintiff's ownership and the assertion of title in defendant, such defense is not established by proof that the plaintiff is the owner of the legal title, subject to an equity in favor of defendant."

Judgment affirmed.

1. Licenses $\S$ 16(16)—Seller of tickets at a fixed place of business not a ticket "peddler"; "engaged in business of peddling theater tickets."

One who was selling tickets for his employer at a fixed place of business of his employer was not "engaged in the business of peddling theater tickets" within San Francisco City and County Ordinances, New Series, No. 3361, $\S$ 58, requiring person so engaged to exhibit a ticket peddler's license; the term "peddler" involving the idea of itinerancy or of going from house to house or from place to place (citing 6 Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Engage; Peddler).

2. Statutes $\S$ 181(2)—Statutes not to be given an absurd construction.

A criminal statute is not to be given an absurd construction.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 83(1)—One cannot be deprived of right to do a lawful act.

A person may not be deprived of his liberty of doing an act which is not and cannot be made unlawful.

4. Licenses $\S$ 7(3)—City cannot require license of one to sell an article which others are permitted to sell without license.

Though a city may provide either for a license tax for revenue to be laid upon a business, or in the exercise of its police power for a regulatory license for such business, it cannot, under either the power to tax or the power to regulate a business, make unlawful, without a license, a single sale of an article which is lawfully sold by others without a license.

5. Statutes $\S$ 245—Reasonable doubt to be resolved in favor of citizen.

In the exercise of the prerogative power either of taxation or of regulation of callings, every reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the citizen.

6. Licenses $\S$ 7(9)—Ordinance for ticket peddler's license is regulatory, and not a revenue measure.

San Francisco City and County Ordinances, No. 3361, $\S$ 58, providing for a ticket peddler's license costing \$300 per month, held a prohibitive or a regulatory measure, and not a revenue measure, though it purports to be a revenue measure.

7. Theaters and shows $\S$ 3—Ordinance providing for ticket peddler's license held void.

San Francisco City and County Ordinances, No. 3361, $\S$ 58, requiring a ticket peddler's license for selling theater or other amusement tickets at places other than at the place of entertainment, held void, being objectionable as a revenue measure, in that, if it provides for a tax, it is one upon single sales, and not upon a business, and in that it is directed to a mode of selling without consideration either of essential differences in modes or the volume of business transacted, and being objectionable as a police measure in that it is an unwarranted interference with the liberty of citizens not based upon any reasonable consideration of the public health, morals, or safety, nor of the cost of police supervision.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and I. M. Golden, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The petitioner was arrested for violation of section 58 of Ordinance No. 3361, New Series, of the city and county of San Francisco, which is designated as "Imposing license taxes on certain businesses, callings, trades or employments," etc. Section 58 is as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to sell in the city and county of San Francisco any theater ticket or opera ticket, or ticket of admission to a place of amusement or entertainment at any place other than the office of the management of said theater, place of amusement or entertainment, without having first taken out and obtained a license to be known as a ticket peddler's license.

"Said license shall be issued by the tax collector at the rate of three hundred (300) dollars per month for each license.

"Every person having a ticket peddler's license, and every person engaged in the business of peddling theater, opera or amusement tickets, shall on the demand of any officer of the tax collector's department, or peace officer, produce and exhibit the same."

At the time of his arrest the petitioner was an employé of the Van Noy Interstate Company, a corporation operating news stands in two of the principal hotels in San Francisco, where theater tickets are sold. The sole question presented is whether or not the section in question can be sustained as a lawful exercise of the taxing power of the municipality. It is not contended by the city that the enactment was in the exercise of the police power, but that since it purports to be a revenue measure based upon a business classification the amount of the tax is a matter of legislative concern with which the judicial branch of the government will not interfere.

The petitioner contends, in substance, that the section is in fact such a regulatory measure as to involve the police power rather than the taxing power, and that it cannot be supported as a proper exercise of either. Under these contentions it becomes necessary, in the first instance, to determine whether or not the section is a revenue measure based upon a reasonable business classification.

The ordinance of which this section is a part defines 57 different callings and segregates many of these in classes based on the amount of business transacted or facilities used. Concerning the persons engaged in the business defined in every one of these classes and subclasses, there is a direct enactment that they shall pay some fixed sum per day, month, quarter, or year. By section 1, the tax is made recoverable, by the municipality as a debt, and the further provision is made that "nothing herein shall bar or prevent a criminal prosecution for each and every violation of any ordinance." The words confining the clause to license ordinances are implied from the context. In the 57 sections dealing with other callings there is a direct tax laid on the business upon payment of which the license issues as a token showing the tax to have been paid. In section 58 alone is the procurement of the ticket peddler's license the principal thing required. It is to be issued at the rate of $300 per month. It is not required to be renewed monthly, nor is it clearly provided that it may not be issued at the statutory rate for a shorter period than one month. While those engaged in the business of peddling theater tickets are required, on demand, to exhibit the license, there is no statutory definition of the business of ticket peddling.

[1] The term "peddler" in common speech, as well as in law, has a well-understood meaning, involving the idea of itinerancy or of going from house to house, or from place to place. It is so defined in the dictionaries and in countless decisions under all manner of police regulations and license laws. 6 Words and Phrases, pp. 5260-5267; Id., Second Series, vol. 3, pp. 937-941. One who sells at a fixed place is not a peddler. Gould v. City of Atlanta, 55 Ga. 678-687; Delisle v. City of Danville, 36 Ill. App. 659-662; State v. Hodgden, 41 Vt. 139-141; Randolph v. Yellowstone Kit, 83 Ala. 471, 3 South. 706, 707; State v. Bayer, 34 Utah, 257, 97 Pac. 129-131, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 297. In terms of law or of ordinary language a ticket peddler is one who, without selling at a fixed place of business, sells singly or in small quantities theater or other tickets along the street, or by going from house to house, or place to place, offering them for sale. It is not contended that the petitioner was so engaged in the business of peddling tickets at the time of or before his arrest. On the other hand it appears that all he did was to sell tickets for, and at the fixed place of business of, his employer. In the absence of a restricted or enlarged meaning being given by statute to the phrase "engaged in the business of peddling theater tickets," on the admitted facts it does not appear that the petitioner was arrested, nor that he can be held under that provision of the section which in terms requires one engaged in the business of ticket peddling to exhibit his license. He must therefore be held, if at all, for selling tickets without having procured a ticket peddler's license.

[2-4] It is a matter of common knowledge that itinerant vendors of tickets go from house to house and from office to office offering for sale tickets for all manner of entertainments. Such vendors are ticket peddlers, but they are not necessarily engaged in the business of peddling tickets. They may be, and usually are, offering tickets for a day or two only in aid of some charitable or amateur entertainment. The section under consideration provides that if any person shall sell any ticket to a place of entertainment, at any place other than the place of business of the management of the place of entertainment, the act shall be unlawful, unless a ticket peddler's license is first procured at the rate of $300 per month. Section 1 of the ordinance makes any violation or its terms punishable as a crime. While a criminal statute is not to be given a construction which leads to absurdity, nothing is better settled than that a man may not be deprived of his liberty for the doing of an act which is not, and cannot be, made unlawful. Although the municipality may provide either for a license tax for revenue to be laid upon a business, or, in the exercise of its police power, for a regulatory license for such business, it cannot, under either the power to tax or the power to regulate a business, make unlawful without a license a single sale of an article which is lawfully sold by others without a license. There is no difference in principle between the resale of theater tickets and the resale of ready-made clothing. It may be conceded that a special license to sell such clothing may not be required of the first distributor, and that such a license may be required of one engaged in the business of selling cast-off garments, but no one could be held for the commission of a crime under a statute which purported to make unlawful a sale of an old suit of clothing by its owner to the secondhand dealer without first procuring a license.

[5, 6] In the exercise of the prerogative power either of taxation or of regulation of callings every reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the citizen. Treat v. White, 181 U. S. 264, 21 Sup. Ct. 611, 45 L. Ed. 853. In considering the particular enactment, the fact that it purports to be a revenue measure is not conclusive. "The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the Legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the Constitution." Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 297, 31 L. Ed. 205; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 78, 79, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152. With what greater force does this reasoning apply to a case where the enactment purports to be a revenue measure, while it is in substance a prohibitive statute, or at least a regulatory one, as this so plainly appears to be.

[7] Considered as a revenue measure, the section under consideration, if it provides for any tax, provides for one upon single sales, and not upon a business. It further is directed to a mode of selling without consideration either of essential differences in modes or the volume of business transacted. It cannot be upheld as a revenue measure for these reasons. Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 159-166, 36 Pac. 399; Ex parte Richardson, 170 Cal. 68, 148 Pac. 213. As a police measure it is an unwarranted interference with the liberty of citizens of the state and the United States, not based upon any reasonable consideration of the public health, morals, or safety, nor of the cost of police supervision. Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152; Ex parte Quarg, 149 Cal. 79-81, 84 Pac. 766, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 117 Am. St. Rep. 115, 9 Ann. Cas. 747.

It follows that the petitioner is entitled to be discharged; and it is so ordered.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

DONLEY v. WEST. (Civ. 3171.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California, April 1, 1920.)

1. Public lands ☞128—Person to whom patent is improperly issued by reason of Land Department's mistaken view of the law may be decreed to hold legal title in trust for person entitled to land.

Where by reason of a mistaken view of the law the Land Department has improperly issued a patent to a person not entitled thereto, the patentee in a court of equity may be decreed to hold the legal title in trust for the person who is entitled to the land.

2. Public lands ☞47—Withdrawal of public lands from entry for irrigation works precludes settler thereon from acquiring any rights.

Withdrawal from entry of public lands required for irrigation works, under Reclamation Act, § 3 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4702), is absolute, and, until its restoration to entry, land so withdrawn is not subject to entry, and no right thereto can be initiated by any settler thereon.

3. Public lands ☞29—Order revoking order of withdrawal held to have the effect of an order of restoration.

Secretary of Interior's order revoking previously made order of withdrawal of public lands from entry when noted on the records in the General Land Office had the effect of an order of restoration restoring the land again to settlement as public land subject to entry under the homestead laws of the United States, effective from the date of its record in the General Land Office and the local land office, in view of regulations of the Land Department (40 Land Dec. p. 656).

4. Appeal and error ☞917(1)—Allegations of cross-complaint accepted as true on demurrer.

Appellate court, in reviewing lower court's order sustaining demurrer to cross-complaint, must accept the allegations of the cross-complaint as true.

5. Public lands ☞106(1) — Withdrawal of public land for irrigation purposes not reviewable by courts in absence of fraud.

The withdrawal of land for irrigation purposes under Reclamation Act, § 3 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4702), is a matter that was committed to the Land Department exclusively, and, in the absence of fraud on the part of the officials of that Department, cannot be reviewed by the courts.

6. Public lands ⚡29 — Nature of "vacant land."

"Vacant land" is such as is absolutely free, unclaimed, and unoccupied.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Vacant Land.]

7. Public lands ⚡128—Claimant seeking establishment of trust must allege facts showing himself entitled to patent.

In a suit to quiet land, wherein defendant cross-complained, attacking validity of patent issued to plaintiff on application to make lieu land selection, under Act Cong. of May 2, 1914, and asking that plaintiff be adjudged holder of legal title in trust for defendant, it was not sufficient for defendant, in order to show himself entitled to such affirmative relief, to allege that patent was issued to plaintiff through mistake of law, but was required to allege, in addition, facts showing that a patent should issue to him, but that, in consequence of erroneous rulings of the land officers on a question of law, a patent was denied to him.

8. Public lands ⚡35(5)—Applicant to enter land withdrawn from entry has no preference right upon restoration of land to entry.

Applicant to enter land under the Homestead Law, at a time when the land was withdrawn from entry, was but a naked trespasser; the application giving him no preference right to enter the land if and when it again should be thrown open to settlement and restored to entry.

9. Public lands ⚡35(2) — Occupant of land must apply for entry within three months after restoration to entry.

Occupant in possession of public land at time of restoration to entry held not entitled to affirmative relief as against patentee on ground that land was not vacant at time of patentee's lieu selection thereof, under Act Cong. May 2, 1914, in absence of allegation that the land was selected within three months after it had been restored to settlement for entry under Act May 14, 1880 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4536-4538), and Rev. St. § 2265.

10. Public lands ⚡114(6)—Burden of proving invalidity of patent upon him who attacks it.

As between private parties, rival claimants to the land, all intendments are in favor of the validity of patent issued to one of the parties by the United States government; the burden being upon him who attacks the patent.

11. Pleading ⚡8(3) — Facts showing that complainant was precluded from exercising the right to have patent issued must be pleaded, and not mere conclusion.

In action involving validity of patent as between patentee and one who claims the right to the land, the latter's allegation that he was prevented from exercising his right to take such steps as would entitle him to a patent is insufficient; it being necessary that he allege the facts from which the court can see that by reason of the error at law complained of he was precluded from exercising such right.

12. Pleading ⚡17—Recital of exhibit incorporated into a pleading cannot take the place of a necessary averment of fact.

A recital in an exhibit or in a document incorporated into a pleading cannot take the place of necessary averment of fact.

13. Pleading ⚡312—Recitals in Secretary of Interior's written opinion attached to complaint held not to negative direct averment as to land being open to entry on certain date.

In action involving validity of patent as against patentee and person claiming to have been entitled to issuance thereof, recitals in Secretary of Interior's written opinion incorporated into pleading from which it might be surmised that land had not been completely restored to entry on certain date were insufficient to negative a direct averment that the land at such time "was public land of the United States and open to homestead settlement and entry."

14. Public lands ⚡31—Occupant held to have acquired no right as against patentee, though patent is voidable at the instance of the United States government.

Occupant of public land under license or permission of the government, but without title or initiation of any inceptive right to the title, was without avail as to the holder of legal title under patent from the United States, even though holder's title was voidable at the instance of the grantor, the United States, since mere occupancy of public land and improvements thereon gives no vested right therein as against the United States, and consequently none against any purchaser from the United States.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Sarah F. Donley against Prescott West. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. D. Noel and George H. Banta, both of El Centro, for appellant.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a suit to quiet title. Judgment passed for plaintiff. Defendant appeals, claiming that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to his cross-complaint.

Plaintiff, who claims title as patentee under a patent from the United States, avers in her complaint that she is the owner of the land, a quarter section in Imperial county, that defendant unlawfully occupies it, withholding possession from her, and that defendant claims title adversely to her, but that his claim is without right. She prays for possession, that defendant's claim be declared to be invalid, and that she recover damages. Defendant answered, denying that plaintiff is the owner or entitled to possession, and alleging that he himself is the owner and lawfully entitled to be in possession. In his answer defendant further avers facts intended to establish the invalidity of the patent. In addition to his answer, defendant filed a cross-complaint wherein he set out the nature of his claim and likewise facts intended to show that the patent to plaintiff was issued in consequence of erroneous rulings of the Land Department on questions of law, and praying that he be declared to be the equitable owner, that it be adjudged that plaintiff holds the legal title in trust for him, and that she be directed to convey to him the legal title acquired by her from the United States as patentee. To this cross-complaint plaintiff interposed a general demurrer. The demurrer was sustained. Thereupon a trial was had on the issues tendered by the complaint. Plaintiff adduced evidence in support of her allegations of title and damages. Defendant introduced evidence on the issue of damages only, expressly declining to introduce evidence upon any other issue raised by his answer. Thereupon the court found the fact of title to be as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, and accordingly adjudged her to be the owner of the land and entitled to possession, quieting her title against all adverse claims of defendant.

[1] The question presented is whether the facts alleged in the cross-complaint entitle defendant to a decree declaring plaintiff to be a trustee of the land for his benefit, and adjudging that whatever title she may have received as patentee belongs to defendant, and should be conveyed to him. Defendant, by his cross-complaint, seeks to bring himself within the well-established rule that where, by reason of a mistaken view of the law, the Land Department has improperly issued a patent to a person not entitled thereto, the patentee, in a court of equity, may be decreed to hold the legal title in trust for the person who is entitled to the land.

The case alleged in the cross-complaint is substantially as follows: On April 2, 1909, the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to authority vested in him by the act of Congress of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats. at L. p. 388 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700-4708]), commonly known as the Reclamation Act, withdrew from entry over 100,000 acres in Imperial county. This withdrawal order was made in connection with the Yuma irrigation project, and included the land in controversy here.

[2] The withdrawal was under the first form provided for by the Reclamation Act, section 3 of which provides for two classes of withdrawals:

(1) "The Secretary of the Interior shall * * * withdraw from public entry the lands required for any irrigation works contemplated under the provisions of this act." (2) He is authorized to withdraw from entry "any public lands believed to be susceptible of irrigation from said works."

Those withdrawn under the first form are lands that may be needed in the construction and maintenance of irrigation works; while those included in the second form are lands which may be irrigated from such works. A withdrawal under the first form—that is, a withdrawal of lands required for "irrigation works"—is intended as a permanent reservation for governmental use. It amounts to a legislative withdrawal, and is absolute. United States v. Hanson, 167 Fed. 881, 93 C. C. A. 371. Until its restoration to entry, land withdrawn under the first form of withdrawal is not subject to entry, and no right thereto can be initiated by any settler thereon. By its withdrawal the land is segregated from the public domain, and is excepted from the operation of the public land laws. No right of a private settler attaches to, or hangs over, the land so withdrawn, to interfere with such action as the government may thereafter see fit to take in respect to it. Woodcock's Case, 38 Land Dec. 349; Pratt's Case, 38 Land Dec. 146; Wolsey v. Chapman, 101 U. S. 755, 25 L. Ed. 915; Bullard v. Des Moines & Ft. D. R. R. Co., 122 U. S. 167, 7 Sup. Ct. 1149, 30 L. Ed. 1123; Spencer v. McDougal, 159 U. S. 63, 15 Sup. Ct. 1026, 40 L. Ed. 76; Scott v. Carew, 196 U. S. 100, 25 Sup. Ct. 193, 49 L. Ed. 403; Whitehill v. Victorio L. & C. Co., 18 N. M. 520, 139 Pac. 184, L. R. A. 1918D, 593.

[3] On March 18, 1913, the Secretary of the Interior revoked his order of withdrawal, in so far as it affected the land in controversy here, and directed his order of revocation to be noted on the records in the General Land Office and in the local land office. We can see no reason why this order revoking the previously made order of withdrawal should not, when noted on the records in the General Land Office and in the local land office, as directed by the Secretary's order, have the effect of an order of restoration, restoring the land again to settlement as public land subject to entry under the homestead laws of the United States. At any rate, the cross-complaint does not allege any fact tending to show that this order of revocation should not be operative as a completely effective restoration order when noted on the records of the local land office and the General Land Office, as directed by the Secretary of the Interior. We shall therefore treat it as a restoration order, restoring the land to entry, and effective for that purpose from the date of its record in the General Land Office and in the local land office. There is a regulation of the Land Department which provides that all orders for the restoration of lands that have been withdrawn from entry shall become effective "on the date they are received in the local land office, unless otherwise specified in the order." 40 Land Dec. p. 656. See, also, Pratt's Case, supra.

[4] It does not appear from the cross-complaint just when the restoration order was received in the local land office, or just when it became effective. Indeed, cross-complainant seems studiously to have avoided alleging any fact that will enable the court to say with certainty just when the land ceased to be withdrawn from entry and again became open to settlement and to entry as public land subject to disposal by the Land Department to qualified purchasers. There is, however, a direct allegation in the cross-complaint that on August 6, 1914—the date when the Land Department finally decided against the validity of cross-complainant's attempted homestead entry—the land "was public land of the United States, and open to homestead settlement and entry." If this allegation be true (and, as against cross-complainant, who is the appellant, we must accept it as true), then appellant, who at all times has been in the exclusive occupancy of the land, could have renewed his application to make entry of the land under the homestead laws at any time after August 6, 1914, and before respondent initiated a right to the land by making her lieu land selection, which, as we presently shall see, she made on May 10, 1915.

On January 19, 1912, while the land was still withdrawn from entry under the Secretary's withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, defendant filed in the local land office an application to make a homestead entry upon the land in controversy. This application was rejected by the register and receiver of the local land office on the day it was filed, upon the ground that the land had theretofore been, and at the time of defendant's attempted entry still continued to be, withdrawn from entry by the Secretary of the Interior's withdrawal order of April 2, 1909. Defendant appealed successively to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and to the Secretary of the Interior, by both of whom his right to make such entry while the land was withdrawn for irrigation works was denied.

[5] Pending defendant's appeal to the Secretary of the Interior the officers of the United States Reclamation Service reported that the lands withdrawn were not necessary to the reclamation project, and recommended the revocation of the withdrawal order. We may pause here long enough to say that it cannot successfully be maintained that the Secretary of the Interior withdrew more land than was necessary, or withdrew land that was not necessary for the contemplated irrigation works, or land that he did not intend for that purpose. The withdrawal of the land is a matter that was committed to the Land Department exclusively, and, in the absence of fraud on the part of the officials of that Department, cannot be reviewed by the courts. There is no allegation of fraud or of fraudulent intent on the part of any officer of the Land Department, and, therefore, the withdrawal order, conceded to have been made under the first form of withdrawal provided by the Reclamation Act of June 17, 1902, is conclusive on the courts, and they may not hold that the Secretary of the Interior did not intend to withdraw the lands under the first form of withdrawal, or that their withdrawal was unnecessary. See Spencer v. McDougal, supra.

The decision of the Secretary of the Interior on cross-complainant's appeal, affirming the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, was filed August 6, 1914. The opinion accompanying the Secretary's decision reads, in part, as follows:

"At the date of the proffer of this application the land was withdrawn, and therefore not subject to entry; and while it had been determined to open this tract, with adjoining lands, to disposition, the plan to govern such disposition has not been determined upon. Such plan will not, however, admit of according any preference right under this application. The application having been properly rejected, the decision appealed from must be, and is accordingly, hereby affirmed."

At all times mentioned in his cross-complaint defendant was a citizen of the United States, possessed of all the qualifications essential to qualify one to make a homestead entry on the public lands of the government. At all times since January 15, 1912, the land has been in the exclusive occupancy of defendant, who on that date went upon the land, made settlement thereon with the intention of perfecting title thereto under the homestead laws, and since then has cultivated the whole tract and expended a considerable sum for improvements thereon. All these facts were known to the officers of the Land Department.

On May 10, 1915, or approximately nine months after the Secretary of the Interior had ruled adversely to defendant's attempted homestead entry, and more than two years after that officer had made his order revoking his withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, and had directed the revocation order to be noted on the records in the General Land Office and in the local land office, plaintiff filed in the local land office an application to select the land under the provisions of the act of Congress of May 2, 1914 (38 U. S. Stats. 372). By this act of May 2, 1914, it is provided that—"The state of California or its grantees may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, reconvey to the United States any of the lands heretofore granted to said state in the townships authorized to be resurveyed by the act of July 1, 1902, * * * and select in lieu thereof an equal amount of vacant, unappropriated, surveyed, unreserved, nonmineral public lands within said state."

It also is provided by the act that "the Secretary of the Interior may make proper rules and regulations" for carrying the act into effect.

It is alleged in the cross-complaint that, prior to the filing of plaintiff's application to make such lieu land selection under the act of May 2, 1914, and during the pendency of defendant's appeal from the decision of the register and receiver of the local land office denying his application to make a homestead entry, the Secretary of the Interior promised plaintiff that he would allow her to make application for the land under the act of May 2, 1914, and would waive the Department regulation requiring an affidavit of nonoccupancy, and that he would notify the register and receiver of the local land office, when her application should be received by them, to forward it immediately to the General Land Office. Plaintiff did not file with her application to select the land any affidavit showing the land to be unoccupied. It further is alleged in the cross-complaint:

That on November 29, 1915, the Secretary of the Interior "rendered a decision in writing, in which, * * * stating and admitting that said land was occupied land and claimed by others than said Sarah F. Donley, * * * he stated and admitted that said land was reserved land, directed the allowance of the said application of said Sarah F. Donley, and directed that she be excused from making any affidavit of nonoccupancy, or from making any affidavit that the said lands were of the kind and character which were subject to entry under said act of Congress; * * * that prior to the making of said decision by the Secretary there was never made any order for the restoration of said land to entry from the withdrawal hereinbefore alleged, other than the revocation hereinbefore mentioned"

—referring to the order of revocation made by the Secretary on March 18, 1913. It then is alleged that thereupon, in accordance with said decision of the Secretary of the Interior, plaintiff's lieu land selection was allowed, and that thereafter the patent was issued to her.

Upon these allegations it is claimed that officers of the Land Department, by mistake of law, have given to plaintiff land which, on the undisputed facts, defendant was entitled to acquire from the government; that therefore plaintiff in equity stands as trustee for defendant; and that a court of equity will compel her to make a proper conveyance to him.

The principal ground for the assault upon the patent is that, at the date of plaintiff's lieu land selection, the land was not "vacant," because it was in the exclusive occupancy of defendant; that that fact was well known to the officers of the Land Department; but that, solely by reason of their mistaken view of the law, they decided that defendant's occupancy did not constitute an obstacle to the issuance of a patent to plaintiff. Without doubt, if the allegations of the cross-complaint be true, and as such they must be accepted here, the officers of the Land Department, at the time when plaintiff made application to select the land, and at all times during the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the patent to her, had knowledge of all the facts respecting defendant's exclusive occupancy of the whole tract. There was, therefore, no mistake respecting these facts. Knowing the facts, the Land Department concluded, nevertheless, that, notwithstanding the land was at all times exclusively occupied by defendant, plaintiff was entitled to select it under the provisions of the act of May 2, 1914. That act expressly declares that the land selected in lieu of that reconveyed to the United States must be "vacant, unappropriated, surveyed, unreserved, nonmineral, public land."

[6, 7] Vacant land is such as is absolutely free, unclaimed, and unoccupied. Cosmos Exploration Co. v. Gray Eagle, etc., Co., 112 Fed. 4, 13, 50 C. C. A. 79, 61 L. R. A. 230. It is contended, therefore, that since the land was exclusively occupied by defendant at the date of plaintiff's lieu land selection, and also because the Secretary of the Interior, solely for plaintiff's benefit, waived the Department regulation requiring an affidavit of nonoccupancy, the patent to plaintiff was issued in consequence of errors of law on the part of the Land Department officials. But, even if this contention be maintainable, nevertheless, to entitle cross-complainant to the affirmative relief that he prays in his cross-complaint, it is not sufficient merely to show that the Land Department has fallen into error through a mistake of law. It must also be shown that the error was injurious to cross-complainant's vested rights; for:

"To enable one to attack a patent from the government, it is not sufficient for him to show that there may have been error in adjudging the patent to the patentee; he must show that by the law, properly administered, the title should have been awarded to him. This does not mean that at the moment of time the patent issued it should have been awarded to him. The acts performed by him may or may not have reached that completeness; but the claimant against the patent must so far bring himself within the law as to entitle him, if not obstructed or prevented, to complete his claim." 10 Ency. of U. S. Sup. Ct. Repts. p. 261.

The rule is that, to entitle a party to relief against the patentee, he must show a better right to the land. He must show such a right as should have been respected by the officers of the Land Department, and, being respected, would have given him the patent. He must allege facts sufficient to show that a patent should issue to him, but that, in consequence of erroneous rulings of the land officers on questions of law, a patent was denied to him. His pleading, complaint, or cross-complaint must contain allegations showing that, before the patentee's title to the land attached, he himself had performed all the acts required by law to be done and performed by him, up to the time of filing his complaint or cross-complaint, in order to entitle him to the patent, or that he has offered to do all the acts which were required by the law to be done, but that he was prevented from doing them by reason of the errors of law committed by the officers of the Land Department and of which he makes complaint. Pierson v. Loveland, 16 Idaho, 628, 102 Pac. 340. In Bohall v. Dilla, 114 U. S. 47, 5 Sup. Ct. 782, 29 L. Ed. 61, the court, having under consideration a case somewhat like the one at bar, said:

"To charge the holder of the legal title to land under a patent of the United States, as a trustee of another, and to compel him to transfer the title, the claimant must present such a case as will show that he himself was entitled to the patent from the government, and that, in consequence of erroneous rulings of the officers of the Land Department upon the law applicable to the facts found, it was refused to him. It is not sufficient to show that there may have been error in adjudging the title to the patentee. It must appear that by the law, properly administered, the title should have been awarded to the claimant."

We do not think defendant has brought himself within the rule announced in these cases. We do not think that he has shown that, at the date of plaintiff's lieu land selection, he had initiated any inchoate right which, on compliance with all the requirements of the Homestead Law, would have ripened into a right to a patent.

[8] When, on January 19, 1912, defendant made his application to enter the land under the Homestead Law, it was withdrawn from entry. By the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, the land had been segregated from the public domain. It was not public land open to settlement or entry; defendant, when he filed his application, was but a naked trespasser. For this reason, his application to make the entry did not, of itself, give him any preference right to enter the land if and when it again should be thrown open to settlement and restored to entry. Pratt's Case, supra; Woodcock's Case, supra.

[9] The only other ground upon which cross-complainant could possibly base a claim to a preference right to make entry under the Homestead Law, if and when the land should again be restored to the status of public land subject to sale and open to entry, is the fact of his occupancy of the land, exclusive and continuous from the day of his settlement thereon—January 15, 1912. But his cross-complaint fails to show that at the date of plaintiff's lieu land selection he, by reason of his occupancy of the land, had any such preference right, since it fails to negative the possibility that the land had been restored to settlement and entry three months or more before plaintiff initiated her inceptive right to the land by her lieu land selection. The Homestead Law gives to an occupant of public land that is open to settlement, and who intends to make a homestead entry, three months after he settles upon the land within which to file his homestead application. Act May 14, 1880, 21 Stat. L. 140 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4536-4538), in connection with sections 2265 and 2266, Rev. Stats.; Moss v. Dowman, 176 U. S. 413, 20 Sup. Ct. 429, 44 L. Ed. 526; Rio Grande Western R. Co. v. Stringham, 38 Utah, 113, 110 Pac. 868. It will be seen, therefore, by an examination of the statutes referred to, that a person claiming a legal settlement under the homestead laws, and a right to exclusive occupancy, must base his claim either upon an entry, lawfully made, in the Land Office while the land is open to entry, or upon a lawful settlement made within three months prior to such entry. For if, within the three months afforded the settler by the act of May 14, 1880, the preference right thereby given him is not exercised by him by filing the application that initiates an inchoate right to the land, the offer of the government is not accepted, and no right in the occupant to acquire the title is initiated. The title to the land remains unaffected, subject to the control and disposition of the government, as before the settler's occupancy. Buxton v. Traver, 130 U. S. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. 509, 32 L. Ed. 920; Rio Grande Western R. Co. v. Stringham, supra.

Therefore, in order to show that, at the date when plaintiff made her lieu land selection, cross-complainant possessed a preference right by reason of his occupancy, he must allege and prove that at that date the land had not been completely restored to entry for a period of three months; for, if it had been, and he thereby was afforded all of three months after his settlement became lawful within which to make application to enter the land in the Land Office, he lost his preference right at the expiration of the three months. He has failed utterly to allege facts necessary to show the retention by him of such preference right up to the time when plaintiff made her lieu land selection. As we already have said, he seems studiously to have refrained from attempting to show the precise date when the land was completely restored to entry. There is, however, the allegation, heretofore adverted to, that on August 6, 1914, the land "was public land of the United States, and open to homestead settlement and entry." This allegation shows, beyond peradventure, that the restoration order of March 18, 1913, became effective as a complete restoration of the land to entry much more than three months before plaintiff made her lieu land selection on May 10, 1915. If the land was open "to homestead settlement and entry" on August 6, 1914, as alleged, then cross-complainant had all of nine months before plaintiff's selection within which to renew his application to enter the land under the Homestead Law.

[10, 11] The rule is that, as between private parties, rival claimants to the land, all intendments are in favor of the validity of a patent issued to one of the parties by the United States government. The burden is upon him who is attacking the patent; for, as we have seen, to entitle a party to relief against a patent issued by the government, he must show a better right to the land than the patentee, such a right as, in law, should have been respected by the officers of the Land Department, and, being respected, would have given him the patent. It is not sufficient to show that the patentee ought not to have received the patent. From this it follows that the burden is upon defendant to allege in his cross-complaint, and prove at the trial, that he has performed, or at least offered to perform, each and every act required by law to entitle him to a patent, excepting only such acts, if any, as he may have been prevented from performing by reason of the error of law claimed to have been committed by the Land Department; and, as to the latter acts, the burden is upon him to allege and prove every fact necessary to show that he was prevented from exercising his right to take such steps as would entitle him to a patent. It is not sufficient merely to allege, as the bald conclusion of the pleader, that defendant was prevented from exercising his right. He must allege the facts from which the court can see that, by reason of the error of law complained of, he was precluded from exercising his right to have the patent issue to him. To make such a showing, it was incumbent upon defendant to allege in his cross-complaint the facts, if any, which show that the land had not been completely restored to entry until within three months prior to plaintiff's selection.

[12, 13] From recitals in the written opinion handed down by the Secretary of the Interior, when that officer ruled adversely to defendant's attempted homestead entry—an entry attempted to be made while the land was withdrawn for irrigation works—we might surmise that, at the time when the Secretary's opinion was rendered, August 6, 1914, the land had not as yet been completely restored to entry, notwithstanding that the order of March 18, 1913, revoking the withdrawal order of April 2, 1909, had been made more than sixteen months prior to the decision of the Secretary on August 6, 1914. But a recital in an exhibit, or in a document incorporated into a pleading, cannot take the place of a necessary averment of fact. Much less can such recital be treated as negating the direct averment that on August 6, 1914, or a little more than nine months before plaintiff made her lieu land selection, the land "was public land of the United States, and open to homestead settlement and entry."

[14] It cannot successfully be contended that, after the expiration of the three months next following the date when the land was restored to settlement and entry, cross-complainant's continued occupancy of the land gave him a right that entitles him to attack the patent that has been issued to plaintiff. As against a mere intruder, or one having no higher or better right than the occupant, one in possession of public land is, it is true, to be treated as the owner of the land as against all but the United States; but, as against one connecting himself with the government title, this mere occupancy must yield to the higher right. Therefore defendant's occupancy, under license or permission of the government after the land was restored to entry, but without title or the initiation of any inceptive right to the title, is without avail against plaintiff, as the holder of the legal title, even if it be true, as claimed by defendant, that plaintiff's title is voidable at the instance of the grantor, the United States government. Mere occupancy of public land and improvements thereon give no vested right therein as against the United States, and consequently none against any purchaser from the government. Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 408, 6 Sup. Ct. 102, 29 L. Ed. 428; Mott v. Hawthorn, 17 Cal. 58; Doran v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 24 Cal. 245; So. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Garcia, 64 Cal. 515, 2 Pac. 397; McLaughlin v. Menotti, 89 Cal. 363, 26 Pac. 880; Rio Grande Western R. Co. v. Stringham, supra. In Sparks v. Pierce, supra, Mr. Justice Field, speaking of a somewhat analogous situation, said:

"The case presented, therefore, is that of occupants of the public lands without title, and without any attempt having been made by them, or by any one representing them, to secure that title, resisting the enforcement of the patent of the United States on the ground of such occupation. Mere occupancy of the public lands and improvements thereon give no vested right therein as against the United States, and consequently not against any purchaser from them. To entitle a party to relief against a patent of the government, he must show a better right to the land than the patentee, such as in law should have been respected by the officers of the Land Department. * * * It must affirmatively appear that the claimant was entitled to it, and that, in consequence of erroneous rulings of those officers on the facts existing, it was denied him."

At no time after August 6, 1914, when the land again became subject to lawful settlement and to entry under the homestead laws, did defendant, or any one representing him, make any attempt to take the steps necessary to secure the government's title. At any rate, if any such attempt was made, the cross-complaint fails to show it.

For these reasons we are constrained to hold that cross-complainant has not shown that at the date when plaintiff's inceptive right to the land attached—the date of her application to make a lieu land selection under the act of May 2, 1914—he possessed any preference right to enter the land under the Homestead Law. He has failed to connect himself with the paramount source of title. The demurrer to the cross-complaint was therefore properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

LITTLE v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 3186.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 6, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §907(2)—Failure to find on issue alleged raises presumption of want of evidence.

Ordinarily, in the absence of a record of the evidence showing to the contrary, the failure of the court to find on matters affirmatively alleged in the pleadings raises the presumption that no evidence was offered in support of such affirmative matters.

2. Judgment §725(6)—Conclusive as to issue on which evidence was excluded for defective pleading.

A judgment for defendant in an action to cancel a deed for undue influence and fraud is conclusive on the issue of undue influence, though all evidence on that issue was excluded by the court because the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action on that issue.

3. Judgment §588—Concludes subsequent action to set aside same deed on new ground.

In suing to set aside a deed, plaintiff must allege all grounds which he claims entitled him to the relief; and, after judgment has been rendered against him in a suit to set aside the deed for undue influence and fraud, he cannot bring another suit to cancel it for mental incapacity of grantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by George J. Little, as special administrator of the estate of William A. Smith, deceased, against S. F. Smith and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Earl E. Moss, of Ventura, and Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wiley & Lambert, of Bakersfield, and Argabrite & Drapeau, of Ventura, for respondents.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of defendants in an action brought by plaintiff as special administrator of the estate of William A. Smith, deceased, to set aside two deeds, executed by deceased to defendants, upon the grounds of undue influence and mental incompetency. The defendants, besides denying the two principal charges, pleaded in bar of plaintiff's recovery a former judgment rendered in a suit previously commenced by plaintiff as such special administrator against these defendants to set aside the same deeds upon the grounds of undue influence and fraud. The court in the action at bar found against the issues of undue influence and mental incompetency, and further found that said former judgment was a bar.

Plaintiff urges three grounds for reversal: First, that the former judgment is not a bar; second, that the court erred in not compelling the defendant S. F. Smith, who was the attending physician of the deceased during his last illness and also one of the grantees named in the deeds, to testify as to the mental and physical condition of the said grantor at or about the time of the execution of the deeds; and, third, that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings to the effect that there was no undue influence or mental incompetency.

The principal question in the case is whether or not said former judgment is res adjudicata. If it shall be determined that it is, the other two questions become immaterial.

It is the contention of appellants that said former judgment cannot be held res adjudicata for two reasons: First, because the issue of undue influence was not determined in the former action, and, secondly, because in the instant case there is set forth an entirely new and separate cause of action, namely, the mental incompetency of the grantor.

The facts are that on October 1, 1914, plaintiff, as special administrator, commenced suit in Ventura county against these defendants to set aside the deeds in question, upon the grounds of undue influence and fraud. On stipulation that action was transferred to Kern county, and tried by the court sitting with a jury. When plaintiff offered proof in support of the issue of undue influence the court sustained the objection of the defendants upon the ground that the complaint, in so far as that issue was concerned, did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and further proof on that issue was excluded. No leave to amend was asked or granted. At the conclusion of the trial the court declined to adopt the special verdicts of the jury, and entered a decree in favor of defendants, upholding the validity of the deeds. No appeal was taken. On October 14, 1916, plaintiff, as special administrator, commenced the present action in Ventura county, against the same defendants, attacking the same deeds, upon the grounds of undue influence and mental incompetency. The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, with the result already stated, that is, the court found against the issues of undue influence and mental incompetency and held that the judgment in the former action constituted a bar.

[1] The evidence offered and received in the lower court upon the question of res adjudicata consists of the judgment roll in the former action and certain oral testimony given by one of plaintiff's attorneys. The judgment roll discloses that there was an attempt made by plaintiff to plead a cause of action upon the ground of undue influence, but the findings and judgment are silent on that issue. Ordinarily it would be held, in the absence of a record of the evidence showing to the contrary, that the failure to find upon matters affirmatively alleged in the pleadings gives rise to the presumption that no evidence was offered in support of such affirmative matters (Hertel v. Emireck, 178 Cal. 534, 174 Pac. 30), from which it would necessarily follow that the judgment in the action determined all matters presented by the pleadings. (Woolverton v. Baker, 98 Cal. 628, 33 Pac. 731. In the present action, however, plaintiff, over the objections of defendants, was allowed to supplement the contents of the judgment roll by the oral testimony of one of plaintiff's attorneys, who testified that when plaintiff offered proof in that action of undue influence the court sustained the objection of the defendants and excluded all such proof, upon the ground that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Upon this oral testimony appellant predicates the theory that the issue of undue influence was not heard or determined in the former action, and consequently the judgment in that case cannot be held res adjudicata. In support of such theory defendant relies principally upon the cases of Purcell v. Victor Power, etc., Co., 29 Cal. App. 505, 156 Pac. 1009, Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 81

Pac. 542 and Southern Pacific Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 415, 143 Pac. 597. Those cases do not support appellant's views, however, and are clearly distinguishable from the action at bar. In Purcell v. Victor Power Co. the first action "was one in ejectment, in which alone was involved the question of the right to the possession, not of the whole premises of the Bonanza claim, but of a fractional part thereof; while the present is a suit to quiet title, in which the question of the ownership of the fee in another and different fractional portion of the lands of said claim is involved." It will thus be seen that the two actions did not involve the same subject-matter. In Bank of Visalia v. Smith there was a finding upon an issue which was not tendered by the scope of the pleadings, and the judgment was silent thereon. It was held that the judgment did not operate as an estoppel in a subsequent action brought to determine that issue. In Southern Pacific Co. v. Edmunds it was in substance held that if during trial an issue is withdrawn on stipulation from the scope of the case, the judgment in the case does not constitute res adjudicata on that issue. The rule in the case last cited is in accord with the later case of Miller & Lux v. James et al. (Sup.) 179 Pac. 174, wherein it is said:

"The rule of res adjudicata is to prevent vexatious litigation and to require the parties to rest upon one decision in their controversy; but, where they expressly agreed to withdraw an issue from the court, the reason for the rule ceases. The issue is not in fact adjudged, and the parties themselves having consented to that method of trial are not entitled to invoke the rule which requires parties to submit their whole case to the court. If they consent to adjudicate their differences piecemeal, there is no reason that the court should extend the rules of law to prevent that which they had expressly agreed might be done."

[2] There can be no question but that such is the law. But the rulings of the two cases last cited are founded squarely upon the fact that the issue upon which no finding was made was withdrawn on stipulation from the consideration of that case. In other words, it was reserved for further consideration between the parties. Here a different state of facts exists. The issue of undue influence was not withdrawn. Plaintiff relied upon it, and offered proof in support of it, but such proof was excluded by the court upon the ground that the complaint failed to state sufficient facts. Plaintiff accepted the ruling of the court, failed to amend, and did not appeal. In that state of the record we are of the opinion that the position of plaintiff in the present action has not been brought within the rules stated in any of the cases above cited, and that he is concluded by the former judgment on the issue of undue influence. The fact that the judgment may have been based upon a defective complaint did not render the judgment void (Gillespie v. Fender [Sup.] 180 Pac. 332; Estate of Ross [Sup.] 182 Pac. 752) nor minimize its effectiveness concerning all issues raised by the pleadings.

[3] The other question involved, briefly stated, is this: Can a party who seeks to set aside deeds commence and maintain against the same parties as many consecutive, independent suits to accomplish that purpose as he has grounds upon which to make the attack? In other words, may he under the law attack the deeds first upon the ground of undue influence, and, if not successful, then commence a second suit against the same parties to set aside the same deeds upon the ground of mental incompetency, or must he embody all of his alleged grounds of invalidity in one action? We are of the opinion that he must embody them all in one action. In Woolverton v. Baker, 98 Cal. 628, 33 Pac. 731, it is held:

"Her cause of action was the breach of the agreement under which she alleged that this conveyance had been made, and involved the determination of the rights of the parties flowing from that transaction, and it was incumbent upon her to set out in her complaint all the facts which constituted this cause of action. She is estopped by the judgment therein rendered from thereafter asserting any cause of action depending upon the facts so omitted, as fully as she would be if at the trial she had omitted to introduce evidence in support of her averments or present argument to satisfy the court of the justice of her claim. A party cannot litigate his cause of action by piecemeal, and, after a judgment against him, seek in another action to obtain relief dependent upon the transaction therein adjudged, by bringing forward claims and demands properly belonging to the first action. The judgment against him is conclusive, not only of what was in fact determined, but also of all matters which might have been presented in support of his cause of action and litigated therein. The rule is stated by Vice Chancellor Wigram in Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 115: 'Where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in and of adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not, except under special circumstances, permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as a part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res adjudicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time.' See, also, Wharton on Evidence, § 717;

2 Black on Judgments, § 729; Rogers v. Higgins, 57 Ill. 244; Stockton v. Ford, 18 How. 418; Sullivan v. Triunfo M. Co., 39 Cal. 464; Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367; Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131."

In Greer v. Greer, 142 Cal. 519, 77 Pac. 1106, wherein an action was brought by a wife for divorce, for alleged desertion, and for the cancellation of a deed of the husband to his daughter, a former judgment for the defendant in an action by the wife for maintenance grounded upon the same alleged desertion, and seeking the same relief, was held to be res adjudicata. The court there said:

"If the deed made by defendant Greer, having been once attacked by plaintiff and found valid by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, can again be attacked by the same plaintiff against the same parties in a different suit, there would be no end to the litigation. The plaintiff might bring a separate action for a divorce every year on each of the different causes set forth in the Code, and each time claim that she had the right to investigate the validity of the transfer. It is evident that such proceedings might be kept up beyond the lifetime of defendant Greer. It is the rule that when a matter is once fairly before the court and adjudicated between the same parties, involving the same question, it cannot afterwards be litigated, even upon grounds not disclosed in the former case. Wheeler v. Eldred, 137 Cal. 37; Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175."

In the Estate of Harrington, 147 Cal. 124, 81 Pac. 546, 109 Am. St. Rep. 118, it was held that, where a claim of widowhood of a deceased person was litigated upon issue joined upon the petition of the alleged widow for a homestead, and was then determined against her, she could not afterwards litigate the question of her widowhood upon distribution of the estate. The court there said:

"But where an issue of fact vital to the controversy has been tried between parties litigant, and a judgment depending for its sufficiency upon the finding of fact has become final, that determination of fact is forever binding in every court between the parties to that litigation and their privies. Otherwise, as has been repeatedly declared by the courts, there could be no end to litigation. 'If a new action could be commenced and a case retried because of the discovery of new facts after the case had been finally disposed of, there would be no end of litigation, and a case be kept in court forever.' Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 505, 62 Pac. 825. And again: 'If she failed to assert her claim properly, or to present the proper evidence in the first suit, she will not now be permitted in a second to litigate it. The principles herein stated are elementary.' Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 68 Pac. 597. And says Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 260: 'It is sufficient that the status of the action was such that parties might have had their lawsuit disposed of according to their respective rights, if they had presented all their evidence and the court had properly understood the facts and correctly applied the law. But if either party fails to present all his proofs, or improperly manages his case, or afterwards discovers additional evidence in his behalf, or if the court finds contrary to the evidence or misapplies the law—in all of these cases the judgment, until corrected or vacated in some appropriate manner, is as conclusive upon the parties as though it had settled the controversy in accordance with the principles of abstract justice."

In Black on Judgments, vol. 2, § 754, the rule is stated in the following language:

"A party cannot relitigate matters which he might have interposed but failed to do in a prior action between the same parties or their privies in reference to the same subject-matter. And if one of the parties failed to introduce matters for the consideration of the court that he might have done he will be presumed to have waived his right to do so. If a party fails to plead a fact he might have pleaded, or makes a mistake in the progress of an action, or fails to prove a fact he might have proven, the law can afford him no relief. When a party passes by his opportunity the law will not aid him."

Other authorities to the same effect are Suisun L. Co. v. Fairfield School Dist., 19 Cal. App. 587, 127 Pac. 349; Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 322, 165 Pac. 935; Flynn v. Hite, 107 Cal. 455, 40 Pac. 749; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 38; Estate of Bell, 153 Cal. 331, 95 Pac. 372.

Even the cases cited by appellant adhere to the same rule, for in Southern Pacific Co. v. Edmunds, supra, it is said:

"The rule undoubtedly is that a former judgment between the parties to an action is conclusive in all subsequent actions involving the same question, not only as to the matters actually decided in the former controversy, but as to all matters belonging to the subject of the controversy and properly within the scope of the issues which also might have been raised and determined; the presumption being that all such issues were presented and decided."

There are several grounds upon which a deed may be set aside under the law. Among them are fraud, undue influence, mental incompetency, duress, menace, etc. If a party is allowed to urge one ground at a time, or even all grounds except one or two, it would result in piecemeal and endless litigation, which, as we have seen from the authorities above cited, the law seeks to avoid.

The sole object of plaintiff's first action was to obtain an adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction that the deeds were void. In that action he should have urged all the grounds upon which he claimed the invalidity existed, and if he did not do so the law, as we have seen, will not allow him to commence another action against the same parties to litigate the same controversy.

In view of the fact that plaintiff's action is barred by the former judgment, the other questions involved in the appeal are immaterial.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

SLAYDEN v. O'DEA et al. (Civ. 2046.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1919.)

1. Corporations ⇨630(6)—Judgment against defunct corporation absolutely void.

The effect of a forfeiture of the charter of a corporation, whether from nonpayment of its corporation license tax or for other cause, is to terminate its existence as a legal entity, and a judgment against it in a suit thereafter brought is a mere nullity; any attempted appearance for it conferring no jurisdiction.

2. Corporations ⇨617(1)—Title on dissolution passes to stockholders subject to power of directors to administer.

Upon dissolution of a corporation for nonpayment of its license tax, the title to all the property owned by it at the time of its demise passes to the persons who were its stockholders at the time of its death, who hold the property subject to the right vested in the persons who were the directors in office at the time of dissolution to possess the corporate assets under the power to administer the same in the settlement of the affairs of the defunct corporation for the benefit of the creditors and those who were stockholders during the corporate existence.

3. Corporations ⇨630(6)—Judgment against defunct corporation can be impeached by stockholder or any interested person.

Not only is an attempted judgment against a defunct corporation void, but such a judgment can be impeached and its invalidity shown by any one interested, as, for example, one entitled as creditor or stockholder to participate in the assets of the corporation, or one who, as stockholder, may be liable for the debts of the corporation, unless by their acts or omissions they have estopped themselves from denying the validity of the judgment.

4. Estoppel ⇨91(1)—Stockholder of defunct corporation held estopped to deny validity of judgment against it.

Where a stockholder who was president of a corporation knew at the time of the institution of a suit against the corporation that it was defunct by reason of having failed to pay the license tax, and advised with the attorney representing the corporation concerning the suit, and thus adopted a course of action calculated to lead plaintiff and other parties to believe that the corporation was an existing corporate entity, and thereby induced plaintiff to prosecute the action to final judgment against the corporation, and other defendants to litigate their claims in the belief that the corporation still enjoyed corporate life, he estopped himself from moving on behalf of the corporation for any modification of the judgment based on the theory that the corporation was not an existing entity when the action was commenced, and that the judgment was void.

5. Abatement and revival §39 — Action against corporation becoming defunct continued against directors without substitution.

In view of St. 1907, p. 745, § 2 (10a), and subsequent amendatory acts, when an action is commenced against a corporation which later becomes defunct by reason of failing to pay the necessary license tax, the directors or managers of the corporation may be substituted as parties to the action, but such substitution is not essential; for without any substitution or parties or change of attorney they may control and manage the action and defend in the name of the corporation, notwithstanding the forfeiture of the charter.

6. Appeal and error §413—Directors of defunct corporation deemed to have received notice of appeal.

On forfeiture of a corporate charter for nonpayment of the license tax after the commencement of an action against the corporation, it is the duty of the directors in office to manage and control the action on behalf of the corporation, and, although not substituted as parties defendant, they must be deemed to have received due notice of an appeal taken under the alternative method by filing a notice of appeal with the county clerk as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 941b.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by H. R. Slayden, doing business under the name of the H. R. Slayden Company, against M. F. O'Dea and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appealed. Motion by O. O. Farmer in behalf of the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company to dismiss the appeal and remand the cause, with directions to lower court to vacate the judgment. Motion denied.

George W. Crouch, Crouch & Crouch, Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. C. Labrie, of Los Angeles, for defendant Farmer.

J. W. Morin, of Pasadena, and Willoughby Rodman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. O. O. Farmer, a defendant in the action, and who likewise is a stockholder of the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company, also a defendant in the action, has moved this court to dismiss the appeal and to remand the cause, with directions to the lower court to vacate the judgment. The motion is made on behalf of the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company and is based upon affidavits and a certified copy of a proclamation by the governor showing that the Imperial Engineering &

Construction Company is, and at the time of the commencement of the action was, a defunct corporation, by reason of nonpayment of the state corporation license tax.

The action was brought by Slayden to recover a judgment against the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company for certain sums alleged to be due for materials furnished by himself and assignors and used by the corporation in the construction of a highway under a contract with the county of Los Angeles, made pursuant to the provisions of the Road District Act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 806). By his complaint plaintiff asks that the amounts so due be adjudged to be secured by two road bonds issued by the county pursuant to the act; that the bonds be sold to pay such sums as may be adjudged due him; and that he have judgment against the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company for any deficiency remaining after the sale. The complaint further alleges that the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company is a California corporation. Defendant O'Dea, answering, denies practically all of the material allegations of the complaint, pleads the statute of limitations, alleges that he owns the bonds, and prays that he be adjudged to be the owner thereof. The Imperial Engineering & Construction Company and O. O. Farmer, appearing by A. C. Labrie, Esq., as their attorney, filed a disclaimer, disclaiming all right to the bonds. The county, answering, admitted that the bonds were in the possession of the county treasurer, and prayed the court to determine the conflicting claims of plaintiff and the other defendants thereto. In its written findings of fact the court specifically finds that "the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company was and still is a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California." By its judgment the court adjudged that plaintiff have and recover of and from the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company certain designated sums; that plaintiff has a lien on the bonds to secure the amounts so adjudged due him; that the bonds be sold; that the balance, if any, after their sale be paid to defendant O'Dea; and that in case of a deficiency plaintiff have judgment therefor against the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company. The only appeal from the judgment is that taken by defendant O'Dea, who has appealed under the new, or alternative, method, by filing his notice of appeal with the county clerk, as provided by section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The motion now made in this court by Farmer on behalf of the defunct corporation is: (1) A motion to dismiss the appeal; and (2) a motion to remand the case to the lower court with instructions to vacate the judgment.

It appears from the affidavits of Farmer and Labrie that the authorized capital stock of the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company is, or rather during the corporate existence was, divided into 7,500 shares. Of this total of 7,500 shares that might lawfully be issued, 5,605 were issued to and owned by Farmer. It further appears from these affidavits that the corporation did not pay its license tax for the fiscal year 1913, and that, pursuant to the proclamation made by the Governor on September 16, 1913, the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company, on November 30, 1913—which was some time prior to the commencement of the action—forfeited its charter. Labrie, in his affidavit, says that at the time he filed the disclaimer as attorney for the company he was not aware, and had not been informed, that it had forfeited its charter. Farmer, who was president of the corporation at the time of its demise, does not say that he did not know that the corporation had forfeited its charter. It further appears that Farmer consulted with Labrie concerning the filing of the disclaimer. From the certificate of the secretary of state, filed with the motion to dismiss, it appears that the license tax remains unpaid and the corporate charter still remains forfeited to the state. In the discussion that follows it should be remembered that the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company was nonexistent at and prior to the time when this action was commenced. It is this fact that differentiates the case from such cases as Brandon v. Umpqua Lumber Co., 166 Cal. 322, 136 Pac. 62.

[1-3] Except as and when it is otherwise provided by the statute, the effect of the forfeiture of the charter of a corporation, whether for nonpayment of its corporation license tax or for other cause, is to terminate its existence as a legal entity. It is dead. It is incapable of suing or being sued as a corporate body, or in its corporate name. It can no more be proceeded against as a corporation than could a natural person after his death. Being dead, it can confer no authority upon any one to appear for it. Any appearance for it or in its name is unauthorized and void. It is not like the case of an unauthorized appearance for a living man, or for an existing corporation, where, under certain circumstances, not necessary to enumerate, certain presumptions of authority to make the appearance will be indulged. The corporation being dead, there is no one who can give any authority to appear for it. Any attempted appearance confers no jurisdiction and is an absolute nullity. Jurisdiction no more can be obtained by a court over a defunct corporation than over the person of a dead man. The dead corporation cannot be served with process, cannot appear, cannot admit any fact, nor authorize any one to do so for it. Any attempted judgment against it is void—a mere nullity. Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., 150 Cal. 575, 89 Pac. 335; Newhall v. Western Zinc Min. Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 Pac. 1040. Upon the dissolution of the corporation for nonpayment of its license tax, the title to all the property owned by it at the time of its demise passes to the persons who were its stockholders at the time of its death, who hold the property subject to the right vested in the persons who were the directors in office at the time of the dissolution to possess the corporate assets under a power to administer the same in the settlement of the affairs of the defunct corporation for the benefit of the creditors and those who were stockholders during the corporate existence. Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161. Not only is any attempted judgment against a defunct corporation void but such judgment, in a proper proceeding, can be impeached and its invalidity shown by any one interested, as, for example, one entitled as creditor or stockholder to participate in the assets of the corporation, or one who, as stockholder, may be liable for the debts of the corporation. Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., supra. And those sufficiently interested to be allowed to assail the judgment cannot be held bound by any unauthorized appearance attempted to be made on behalf of the dead corporation, unless by their acts or omissions they have estopped themselves from denying the validity of the judgment. Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., supra. Though the judgment be void, estoppel may bar the way to a successful assault upon it. For, notwithstanding the nullity of the judgment against the dead corporation, one who otherwise might be entitled to attack it on behalf of the defunct corporation may estop himself by his acts of omission or commission from questioning its validity. Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 Pac. 986.

Appellant, the defendant O'Dea, resisting the motion made by Farmer on behalf of the defunct corporation, contends that the admitted facts show that Farmer is estopped to question the validity of the judgment. We think this contention must be sustained.

To entitle Farmer to move on behalf of the defunct corporation, it must appear that he has some interest to be protected, and that he is not estopped by his conduct. As one who was a stockholder at the date of the dissolution, he has a property right in what were the assets of the corporation at the time of its demise; that is, upon the dissolution of the corporation, the title to the corporate assets vested in him and the other stockholders, whoever they may be. Rossi v. Caire, supra. Also, as a stockholder, he is interested in defeating any claim against the corporation for the payment of which, in whole or in part, he may be liable as a stockholder. As a stockholder, therefore, he has a sufficient interest to entitle him to assail the judgment against the corporation. But notwithstanding this interest, if, by his conduct, he has estopped himself from questioning the judgment, this court cannot grant that part of the motion whereby we are asked to remand the case with directions to the lower court to vacate the judgment. That Farmer is estopped appears from the affidavits of himself and Mr. Labrie.

[4] From the affidavit of Labrie it appears, inferentially at least, that at the time of the forfeiture of the corporate charter Farmer was president on the now defunct corporation. As such, he must have known that it had forfeited its charter prior to the commencement of the action. At any rate, Farmer is careful not to deny such knowledge in any part of his affidavit. And yet, notwithstanding such knowledge on his part—knowledge which, under the circumstances, should be imputed to him—he advised with Labrie about the disclaimer, and, after so advising with Labrie, the latter, on behalf of Farmer and the defunct corporation, filed the disclaimer whereby both disclaimed any right, title, or interest in or to the bonds. We think it clear that Farmer knowingly concealed from plaintiff and the other parties to the action all knowledge that the corporation had suffered dissolution, and adopted a course of action calculated to lead plaintiff and appellant O'Dea, and all other parties, to believe that the corporation was an existing corporate entity, thereby inducing plaintiff to prosecute his action against the corporation to final judgment, and O'Dea and the other defendants to litigate their claims in the belief that the corporation still enjoyed corporate life and was properly a party to the action for the determination of all conflicting claims and interests. For these reasons we think Farmer is estopped from now moving in this court, on behalf of the corporation, for any modification of the judgment based upon the theory that the corporation was not an existing entity at the time when the action was commenced, and that that part of the motion whereby we are asked to remand the cause to the lower court with directions to vacate the judgment must be denied.

[5] In view of Farmer's estoppel to move in this matter, it is unnecessary to determine to what extent evidence dehors the record on appeal may be considered to refute the express finding of the court that at the time of the trial the corporation was in existence.

Conceding that notice of appeal is essential to appellate jurisdiction, and assuming that such cases as Judson v. Love, 35 Cal. 463, and Bell v. San Francisco Savings Union, 153 Cal. 64, 94 Pac. 225—wherein it is held that the death of a natural person in whose favor judgment was rendered terminates the authority of his attorney to represent him or to receive notice of appeal—are applicable to appeals under the new, or alternative, method, where the notice is filed with the clerk, still, where a corporation is a defendant in an action, and that corporation is an existing corporate entity at the time when the action is commenced against it, the statute provides that the action shall not abate by reason of the subsequent forfeiture of the corporate charter for nonpayment of the license tax, but that the action "may be prosecuted to final judgment * * * with the same force and effect and in like manner as though no forfeiture had occurred." Section 2 (10a), Acts 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 745), and the subsequent amendatory acts. By reason of this provision of the statute, the action, if the corporation be in existence when it is commenced, may be continued and prosecuted to final judgment in the name of the corporation, under the control and management of the directors or managers in office at the time of the forfeiture. And while doubtless such directors or managers may be substituted as parties to the action, such substitution is not essential; for, without any substitution or parties or change of attorney, they may control and manage the action and defend in the name of the corporation, notwithstanding the forfeiture of the charter. Lowe v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 714, 134 Pac. 190; Brandon v. Umpqua Lumber Co., supra.

[6] For reasons already stated, the moving party here is estopped to assert the nonexistence of the corporation at the time when the action was commenced. As to him, the situation must be regarded as though there had been no forfeiture of the corporate charter prior to the commencement of the action; and if there were no such forfeiture prior to the commencement of the action, then, even though it be admitted that the corporation is now defunct, still the action may continue in the name of the corporation, without any change of attorney, and this appeal may be prosecuted "with the same force and effect and in like manner as though no forfeiture had occurred," the directors in office at the time of the forfeiture, whom the statute makes "trustees for the corporation and stockholders," being deemed to be in control and management of the action so far as the corporation's interests are concerned, even to the extent of receiving notice of appeal, through the attorney of record for the defunct corporation, by looking to the files to ascertain whether or not an appeal has been taken. Because the mover of the motion is estopped to deny the corporate existence of the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company at the date of the commencement of the action, and because, if it were in existence when the action was commenced, it would be the duty of the directors in office, in the event of a subsequent forfeiture of the corporate charter for nonpayment of the license tax, to manage and control the action for and on behalf and in the name of the corporation, as much so as if they had been substituted for it as parties defendant, they must be deemed to have received due notice of the appeal; for, as is said in Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 255, 139 Pac. 69, it is the design of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the event that an appeal is taken under the alternative method as therein provided, "to compel the prevailing party to look to the files to ascertain whether or not an appeal has been taken."

Motion denied.

SLAYDEN v. O'DEA et al. (L. A. 4670.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 26, 1920.
Rehearing Denied, April 16, 1920.)

1. Highways — 113(1)—Stop notice statute not applicable where work is performed on public highway; "wagon road"; "any other structure."

Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing that, in case of property which is not subject to lien, the owner shall withhold sufficient money to pay the claims of persons serving notice, is not applicable to public work on public highways performed under the Road District Improvement Act; the terms "wagon road" and "or any other structure" in Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, not including public highways, in view of St. 1911, p. 1422, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1191.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Any Other.]

2. Highways — 113(1)—Right to lien and to stop notice limited to persons described.

The right to a lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, relating to furnishers of labor and material, and to a stop notice under section 1184, is limited to those persons described in section 1183, namely, those who perform work on structures therein described at the request of the owner.

3. Highways — 113(1) — Contract between contractor and creditor held not to give other creditors any rights in bonds of highway improvement district.

A contract between a contractor and his creditor providing that certain highway improvement district bonds be left in escrow with the county treasurer until the question of the validity of claims of certain other creditors should be settled held only a plan by which the legality of the claims of the other creditors should be determined, which gave such other creditors no rights in the bonds which they did not before have, although the contracting creditor withdrew the remainder of the bonds and the other creditors released any claims against county as to the bonds delivered.

Olney, J., Angellotti, C. J., and Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by H. R. Slayden, doing business under the firm name of H. R. Slayden Company, against M. F. O'Dea and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Judgment reversed in part.

See, also, 189 Pac. 1062.

Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles (Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

J. W. Morin, of Pasadena, and Willoughby Rodman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff, having furnished certain supplies to a contractor, brought this action to recover on his own and certain similar assigned claims. M. F. O'Dea appeals from that portion of the judgment giving to respondent a lien upon two bonds, Nos. 9 and 10, of improvement district No. 5, of the county of Los Angeles, which bonds are now in the custody of John N. Hunt, treasurer of the county of Los Angeles, and which represent two-tenths of the contract price payable to the contractor for the improvement of certain streets within such district (Stats. 1907, p. 806), under a contract of January 18, 1912, between the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles and one S. M. Kerns. S. M. Kerns gave a surety bond of the Maryland Casualty Company in an amount equal to 50 per cent. of the contract price, for the benefit of laborers and materialmen, as required by law. Stats. 1911, p. 1422. On the following day, with the consent of the surety, Kerns assigned his contract to the defendant Imperial Engineering & Construction Company, of which company defendant O. O. Farmer was manager and principal stockholder. On the 18th of March, 1912, this company, for the purpose of securing funds for the carrying on of the work, assigned to M. F. O'Dea the contract and the bonds to be thereafter issued, and notice of the assignment was filed with the board of supervisors. O'Dea advanced over $10,000 to the contractor for the performance of the work, which was completed July 13, 1912. During the months of September and October, 1912, before the issuance of any of said bonds to O'Dea, and while the same were in the custody of the county treasurer, plaintiff and his assignors filed with the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county notices that they had furnished supplies and material for the doing of this work, and therein claimed a lien upon the bonds to be issued therefor, and demanded that said bonds be withheld from the contractor. Because of the stop notices plaintiff claims a lien against said bonds, upon the theory that section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure was applicable. In addition, plaintiff claims that by reason of certain transactions between the various parties interested, in January, 1913, reference to which is hereafter made, whether or not plaintiff was theretofore entitled to any lien upon said bonds, said transactions resulted in an equitable lien thereon in his favor for the amount of such claims.

[1,2] Before considering the effect of the latter transactions, it is well to dispose of the contention of respondent based upon the stop notices. Is section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, applicable to public work of this nature performed under the road district improvement act? This section provides:

"* * * In the case of property which, for reasons of public policy or otherwise, is not subject to the liens in this chapter provided for, the owner or person who contracted with the contractor, shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim."

This provision for a stop notice is the only remedy provided by sections 1183 and 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, for persons furnishing materials to a contractor for use upon public improvements. This provision for a stop notice was virtually a re-enactment of the rule which had been developed by the courts in the interpretation of section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood before the amendment. It had been held that this section as originally enacted provided two remedies for the laborers and materialmen, one a lien upon the structure or improvement created by his labor, and the other a stop notice in the nature of a garnishment, and that the latter was the only remedy to be applied in the case of improvements upon public property, which could not be subject to a lien for reasons of public policy. Bates v. Santa Barbara, 90 Cal. 543, 27 Pac. 438; Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 205, 157 Pac. 5. Section 1183 defines the structures and improvements upon which liens attach under the Mechanic's Lien Law. This section, so far as it relates to the matter here under consideration, is as follows:

"Mechanics, materialmen, * * * furnishing materials to be used or consumed in * * * or furnishing power contributing to the construction * * * of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, * * * railroad, wagon road or other structure, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have * * * furnished materials, for the value of * * * materials furnished and for the value of the use of such * * * power, whether at the instance of the owner, or of any other person acting by his authority or under him." (Italics ours.)

This statute does not purport to give a lien upon a public street or highway. Such highway does not belong to the county, but to the people of the state of California. People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 223, 37 Pac. 203, 26 L. R. A. 659. At the time the term "wagon road" was introduced into the Mechanic's Lien Law, April 4, 1864 (Hittell, General Laws of California, p. 656, § 4496), the law provided for the incorporation of wagon road companies (Stats. 1853, p. 114) and for the securing of rights of way for such wagon roads. The term "wagon roads" was used for long roads connecting distant cities and towns for the use of which tolls might be charged. Stats. 1851, p. 323; Stats. 1857, p. 272; Stats. 1858, p. 48; Stats. 1859, pp. 228, 323. The supplement to the Mechanic's Lien Law enacted in 1864 provided for liens upon wagon roads and railroads and nothing else. It is apparent, therefore, that in using the expression "wagon road" the Legislature did not intend to include a public road or highway. It is not to be assumed that the Legislature intended to provide for a lien upon or the sale of a public street or highway or wagon road to pay the cost of its improvement. This is clear, not only from the fact that a public highway is not included within the description of improvements made at the request of the owner in section 1183, but also by the fact that the Legislature in the Mechanic's Lien Law has provided a separate and distinct method of enforcing rights of laborers and materialmen in the case of work done upon a public street or highway where such work is done at the instance of the owners of lots abutting upon the street, by providing for a lien, not upon the street, but upon the abutting lots. Section 1191, Code Civ. Proc. This special provision also indicates that the Legislature did not intend by the general language contained in section 1183, "or any other structure," to include streets or highways which were specifically provided for by the same statute in another section. See Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 257, 31 Pac. 109. It is true that this court has held that section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, applies to the case of contracts for the erection of public buildings and other public improvements therein specifically described, to the extent of authorizing the stop notice. Bates v. Santa Barbara, supra. In other words, where the statute expressly authorizes a lien upon a building constructed by the owner thereof, this court has held that the garnishment provisions of the statute contained in section 1184 apply, notwithstanding the fact that a proper construction of this statute compels the conclusion that the Legislature did not intend to create a lien upon such public building. Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110, 28 Pac. 646, 23 Am. St. Rep. 451; Bates v. Santa Barbara, supra. The Mechanic's Lien Law was enacted upon the mandate of the Constitution (section 15, art. 20) for the purpose of securing to mechanics and materialmen the liens therein provided for, but it has been held that this constitutional provision does not provide for liens upon public buildings. Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, supra. It was there said with reference to this constitutional provision:

"The public policy appealed to is laid down in the Constitution itself. It is a constitutional policy. The section under consideration [1183] on its face purports to be a Code provision providing a remedy by individuals against individuals. The constitutional policy referred to but emphasizes the rule of construction, which would have been sufficient of itself."

The claim was there made:

"That public buildings are included both in the word 'property,' used in the Constitution, and in the phrase 'any building,' used in the Code, and therefore it must necessarily follow that mechanics and materialmen are, by these provisions, given a right to a lien upon such buildings. But this ignores the rule of statutory construction, that the state is not bound by general words in a statute, which would operate to trench upon its sovereign rights, injuriously affect its capacity to perform its functions, or establish a right of action against it."

In Bates v. Santa Barbara, supra, it is conceded that a lien could not be acquired against a public building, but the court said:

"It does not follow that the claims of Booty and Holmes are not subordinate and subject to the claims of the plaintiffs. * * * Under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the mechanic or materialman may give the owner of the building upon which he has performed labor or for which he has furnished material written notice of his claim, and thereupon it becomes the duty of such owner to retain sufficient funds to answer such claim. * * * Upon receipt of the notice the owner becomes liable as on garnishment or assignment. * * * The equitable garnishment provided for by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a cumulative remedy in ordinary cases; but in this instance it is the only remedy provided by the Lien Law, because the pursuit of the remedy by foreclosure would involve the taking of buildings which, on the grounds of public policy and public necessity, are exempt from execution and forced sale. And this remedy is one which does not contravene any principle of public policy."

But neither these decisions nor the amendment to section 1184 justify the conclusion that there is a lien, or, in the absence thereof, a right to a stop notice in the case of street improvements that are not described in section 1183 and are not covered by the provisions thereof. The right to a lien, under section 1183, and to a stop notice, under section 1184, is limited to those persons described in section 1183, namely, those who perform work on structures therein described at the request of the owner.

Another consideration leads us to the same conclusion. The Legislature of 1911 not only enacted the Mechanic's Lien Law under consideration, but, by a separate and distinct act (Stats. 1911, p. 1422), required the execution of a bond in the amount of 50 per cent. of the contract price in the case of a contract for public improvements, conditioned for the payment of laborers and materialmen working upon such improvements. Section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, provides for a similar bond, but the giving thereof is optional with the contractor and owner. This statute provided (section 2) that any materialmen, etc., whose claim has not been paid by the contractor shall, within 90 days from the time the contract is completed—"file with the commissioners, managers, trustees, officers, board of supervisors, board of trustees, common council, or other body by whom such contract was awarded, a verified statement of such claims, together with a statement that the same has not been paid. At any time within six months after the filing of such claim, the person, company or corporation filing the same may commence an action against the sureties on the bond, specified and required by section 1 hereof."

This constitutes an ample remedy for the protection of mechanics and others performing labor upon a public highway, and indicates that the Legislature did not consider that sections 1183 and 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, covered every structure and improvement made by public contract, such as streets and highways.

From the foregoing considerations we conclude that neither section 1183 nor section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to work on a public street or highway, and that the remedy of materialmen in case of a contract let by the public authorities for street work is upon the personal responsibility of the contractor and his sureties, and in the case of a private contract upon a public highway under section 1191, Code of Civil Procedure. A large part of the work upon public highways is done under the Vrooman Act and its amendments. We have recently held that in such cases the stop notice feature of section 1183 did not apply. That decision was based upon the fact that there was no indebtedness from the owner to the contractor to which the statute could apply. Here there was no owner within the meaning of section 1183. Adamson v. Paonessa, 179 Pac. 880.

In this view of the case it is unnecessary for us to determine whether food, coal, distillate, and gasoline are "power" or materials

"consumed" in said work within the meaning of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, as claimed by respondent.

[3] The next question is as to whether or not the transaction of January, 1913, between the parties resulted in an equitable lien upon such bonds in favor of respondent and his assignors. This transaction may thus be summarized:

On January 28th M. F. O'Dea and O. O. Farmer signed a contract concerning said bonds, to wit:

"Agreement.

"This agreement, made and entered into between the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company, a corporation of the state of California, and O. O. Farmer, of the first part, and M. F. O'Dea, of Los Angeles, Cal., of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, M. F. O'Dea at divers times has advanced certain moneys to the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company to the extent of ten thousand three hundred and thirty-six ($10,336.00) dollars, for the purpose of enabling said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company to carry on its contract to a completion for the improvement of an extension of Colorado street in road district No. 5, under road improvement of 1907, in Los Angeles county, Cal.;

"And whereas, said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company finds that certain claims have been filed with the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, Cal., for supplies by R. H. Slayden, Sarah Schweikert, and Globe Grain & Milling Company to the amount of two thousand four hundred ninety-four and $\frac{62}{100}$ (\$2,494.62) dollars;

"And whereas, the validity of these liens so filed with the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county is questioned, and for the purpose of settling this liability the parties hereto have consented that the county of Los Angeles shall retain two of the bonds issued against this improvement, to wit, bonds Nos. nine (9) and ten (10), amounting to two thousand six hundred forty and $\frac{80}{100}$ (\$2,640.80) dollars, which said two bonds so left in escrow with the county treasurer of said Los Angeles county are to remain with said county treasurer until the question of the validity of these three claims has been settled either in court or out of court;

"And whereas, said M. F. O'Dea has agreed to release all claims against the eight (8) other bonds which have been issued against the aforesaid improvement, provided, he is protected against the claim of H. J. Slayden, Sarah Schweikert, and Globe Grain & Milling Company, and said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company will defend all suits that may be brought against the amount of these two bonds so left in escrow, or against any parties having any interest in said bonds, and said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company will enter into a satisfactory bond to the amount of three thousand ($3,000) dollars protecting said M. F. O'Dea against the contingent claim of said H. R. Slayden, Sarah Schweikert, and Globe Grain & Milling Company, and further saving harmless against any suits that may be entered, and in case of any final adverse judgment will pay the same and all costs and attorney's fees in connection therewith:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed between the parties hereto that said M. F. O'Dea, in consideration of his executing the release to the county of Los Angeles of his claim under his assignment of the contract in relation to said Colorado street improvement on eight (8) of the bonds issued therefor (of which he retains six (6) to apply on his account), and in further consideration of two (2) bonds remaining in escrow with the county treasurer of Los Angeles county as above stated, for the purpose as hereinbefore stated, said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company will enter into a bond to the amount of three thousand ($3,000) dollars to save said M. F. O'Dea harmless against any suits that may be entered, and in case of any final adverse judgment pay the same and deliver to said M. F. O'Dea the said two bonds out of which he shall be paid his demand against said Imperial Engineering & Construction Company or pay in cash the balance and interest due said M. F. O'Dea, and said M. F. O'Dea, upon receiving the security [written in ink on margin, "Erased before agreement signed"] bond as aforesaid for $3,000.00 for the purposes herein stated, surrender and return unto the Imperial Engineering & Construction Company and O. O. Farmer all of the notes and stock security which he now holds against either of said parties.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto signed this agreement this 28th day of January, A. D. 1913. O. O. Farmer.

"M. F. O'Dea.

"Witnessed by Ben C. Brock.

"Office of the Treasurer of Los Angeles County, Los Angeles, California. John N. Hunt, treasurer.

"Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 31/13.

"Received of the Imperial Eng. & Const. Co. (6) six bonds of road district improvement No. 5, par value of $1,332.40 each.

"M. F. O'Dea."

In addition to this agreement, the only one in which M. F. O'Dea participated, the several claimants whose rights were subsequently assigned to the plaintiff notified the county treasurer in writing that they released him and the county from all obligation with reference to eight of the ten bonds then on deposit with him, and also executed releases to the Maryland Casualty Company of its obligation upon its surety bond. The Imperial Engineering & Construction Company agreed that bonds numbered 9 and 10 should remain with the county treasurer as security for the payment of the claims of plaintiff and his assignors. This company had no power to create a lien upon these bonds in the hands of the county treasurer superior to the claims of M. F. O'Dea under his prior assignment. The plaintiff and his assignors had no right in or to said bonds, and the agreement of January, 1913, resulted from the refusal of the county authorities to deliver the bonds without the consent of the plaintiff and his assignors, and not from any legal right on their part to prevent such delivery. It is necessary to consider further the terms of the contract signed by M. F. O'Dea and O. O. Farmer. Plaintiff and his assignors, not being parties to such contract, are only entitled to any benefit therein stipulated to accrue to them by reason of the rule that, where a contract is made between two persons for the benefit of a third, that person can enforce the contract. Section 1559, Civ. Code. There was apparently no dispute as to the amount of the indebtedness due from the construction company to the plaintiff and his assignors. The only dispute was as to whether or not the supplies were furnished to be used and were used upon the improvement for which the bonds were issued, and, if so, whether or not the stop notices of plaintiff and his assignors created a lien on or garnishment of such bonds in their favor. The recitals in this agreement are that the validity of the liens claimed by the plaintiff and his assignors were questioned, and that "for the purpose of settling this liability, the parties hereto have consented that the county of Los Angeles shall retain two of the bonds issued against this improvement, to wit, bonds Nos. 9 and 10, amounting to $2,640.80, which said bonds so left in escrow with the county treasurer of said Los Angeles county are to remain with said treasurer until the question of the validity of these three claims has been settled either in court or out of court." The contracting company agreed that it would defend "all suits that may be brought against the amount of these two bonds so left in escrow or against any party having any interest in said bonds." It is evident that the purpose of the parties was to arrange for a plan by which the legality of the claims of the plaintiff and his assignors in and to the bonds should be determined; M. F. O'Dea and the contractor evidently claiming that these bonds were not subject to such liens. Inasmuch as the plaintiff and his assignors had no right in or to the bonds in question and no lien thereon, this agreement providing for their custody pending the litigation of that question created no right in them in or to said bonds not already existing, and the contract of the construction company with the lien claimants could not create such rights without the consent of M. F. O'Dea, and the mere withdrawal of the other bonds, to which he was already entitled, did not operate as such consent, nor create any estoppel against him.

It follows that so much of the judgment as declared a lien on such bonds superior to the claim of M. F. O'Dea is erroneous. The respondent is entitled to a lien thereon by reason of his contract with the Construction Company, but subject and subordinate to the prior claims of the appellant for reimbursement for the balance due him from the contractor.

The judgment, so far as it affects M. F. O'Dea and the right to the bonds in question, is reversed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; SHAW, J.; KERRIGAN, Judge pro. tem.

OLNEY, J. I dissent. The main opinion holds that the case is not one in which stop notices can be given under the Mechanic's Lien Law. Section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, provides specifically that upon such notice being given by a workman or materialman "in the case of property which, for reasons of public policy or otherwise, is not subject to the liens in this chapter provided for, the owner or person who contracted with the contractor shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor to answer such claim." The essential purpose of this provision is to create, by means of the stop notice, an equitable garnishment in all cases of public work where, if the work were on private property, the workman or materialman would have a lien. This is the established construction of the provision (Bates v. Santa Barbara, 90 Cal. 543, 27 Pac. 438), and one plain on its face. The real question, therefore, is as to whether or not a workman or materialman would have a lien in such a case as the present if the work were done on private property.

This question is not touched on in the main opinion. The main opinion reasons that the word "wagon road" in section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure (the section providing for liens), means a private wagon road, and not public, and that therefore the provision of section 1184 as to stop notices in case of public work does not apply. This is a complete non sequitur and simply begs the whole question. Of course, section 1183 applies only to private wagon roads. It applies only to private property in any case, whether it be a wagon road or a building or what not. But it does not follow that, because section 1183 means private wagon roads only, section 1184 does not apply to public wagon roads. The very purpose of the latter section is to make the stop notice good in the very case of public work where section 1183 does not apply to give a lien because the work is public, and not private. If the reasoning of the main opinion is sound, it means that in no case of public work will a stop notice be effective, since in no case does section 1183 apply to public work and property, but always to private work and property. Yet our decisions are all the other way.

In this connection it should be noted that section 1183 does not apply to public work, not because of any limitation on the power of the Legislature so to provide, but because it has been held that it was intended to apply only to private work. Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110, 26 Pac. 646, 23 Am. St. Rep. 451, the leading case in this state on the point.

The main opinion also advances the argument that, because section 1191, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, where street work is done at the instance of an abutting property owner, workmen and materialmen shall have a lien upon the abutting property, it is to be inferred that they are to have no right under a stop notice where the work is not done at the instance of a private party, but by the public. I do not see any ground for such inference, and no ground is stated. On the contrary, it seems to me the inference is very plainly the other way. Section 1191 is a part of the Mechanic's Lien Law. When it provides for a lien on private property for street work done at the instance of a private property owner, where no lien exists upon the property improved, the street, because it is public property, the inference would seem to be plain that such work, street work, does come within the general operation of the Mechanic's Lien Law so far as that law can be applicable. If this is true, the provision in regard to stop notices applies.

The main opinion also advances the argument that because, by a separate act of the Legislature, a bond in favor of workmen and materialmen is required of a contractor for public work, when, under the Mechanic's Lien Law, the giving of such a bond is optional in the case of private work, it is to be inferred that such bond is the exclusive protection for workmen and materialmen under a contract for street work. But why exclusive as to street work as distinguished from other kinds of public work? If the act mentioned required such a bond in the particular case of street work alone, then, possibly, there might be some ground for inferring that the bond was intended as the sole protection in such a case. But the act does not so provide. It covers all kinds of public work, work as to which there can be no doubt that it is not the exclusive protection. If it were not intended to be exclusive as to public work in general, to which it in terms applies, why is it exclusive as to a particular kind of public work, to wit, street work. There is nothing in the act to indicate such distinction. Street work, in fact, is not mentioned in the act.

It is also intimated, rather than plainly stated, in the main opinion, that the provision of the statute for stop notices in case of public work does not apply to street work for the reason that in such a case the work is not done at the instance of the "owner." Presumably the thought is that streets and highways belong to the public at large, so to speak. But certainly, in the doing of street work, the county or municipality is the instrumentality or agency through whom the public at large acts, and why should not a stop notice to it, the agency, and the paying agency, be effective? Furthermore, the Code section specifically provides that in case of public work the stop notice may be given to either "the owner or person who contracted with the contractor," and certainly the county or municipality is the person who contracts with the contractor. As to the case of Adamson v. Paonessa, 179 Pac. 880, to which the main opinion refers in this connection, suffice it to say that the conclusion there reached was very carefully put wholly upon the ground that, under the particular act involved, there was no fund upon which the stop notices could operate, and they were therefore ineffective. Such is not the case here. The contractor is paid directly by the county, and by the county alone, and there is a fund upon which the notices can operate, and that fund is in the hands of the county, which is, in the language of the statute, "the person who contracted with the contractor," and who is required to recognize the notices.

When we come to the real question in the case, namely, whether or not the improvement here is of such a character that a lien would exist upon it if it were a private improvement upon private property, there can be little doubt as to the correct answer. Section 1183, after enumerating a number of improvements for which a lien may exist, concludes the enumeration by the words "wagon road or other structure." A reasonably fair construction of the word "wagon road" would probably include the improvement in the present case. It would seem fairly certain that "wagon road" is used in contradistinction to the word "railroad," which immediately precedes it in the enumeration, and means a road in the ordinary sense, a way prepared and used for ordinary vehicular traffic. The present improvement is just that, whether it be termed a street, or a highway, or a county road. But, however this may be, it certainly comes within the words "or other structure" when those words are used in immediate connection with a "wagon road." If a wagon road is a structure, certainly the street or road here is an "other structure." In Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. 352, approved in Williams v. Mountaineer, etc., Co., 102 Cal. 142, 34 Pac. 702, 36 Pac. 388, and Hines v. Miller, 122 Cal. 517, 55 Pac. 401, it was held that the word "structure," as used in the Mechanic's Lien Law, included an excavation on the property. If an excavation be a structure, certainly a built road is one. The question may be tested by a practical illustration. Would there be any doubt but that, if private parties upon their own land had built an improvement such as that here (and private parties have done that very thing), a lien would exist in favor of workmen and materialmen contributing to the work? But, if workmen and material men would have a lien in such a case upon private property, they are entitled here to the equitable garnishment which the statute provides they shall have in case of public work, when, because the work and the property are public, they cannot have a lien.

LUTZ v. BROWN. (L. A. 5336.)

182 Cal. 707

(Supreme Court of California. May 7, 1920.)

1. Action  Demand not necessary before action on agreement to pay on demand deficiency after sale of collateral.

Before action can be maintained against one not a surety, but under primary obligation to pay on his agreement, incorporated in note of himself and another, to pay "on demand" any deficiency after sale of collateral security and application of the proceeds, demand is not necessary.

2. Costs  260(4)—Damages ordered for appeal for delay.

A sum ordered added to the costs as damages; conclusion that appeal is frivolous and taken for delay being unavoidable.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by E. May Lutz against Payne Brown. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Kirk and E. O. Holley, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. C. Mouser, of San Diego, J. De La Motte, of Los Angeles, and John W. Rumage, of San Diego, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment against the defendant. The action was upon a promissory note, payable 60 days after date, executed by the defendant and another as joint makers in favor of the plaintiff. The trial court specifically found that the defendant was not a surety. The note was secured by the pledge of certain shares of stock under a pledge agreement incorporated in the note, and which, after providing that the holder of the note might sell the security in case of default and apply the proceeds on the debt, further provided:

"And the undersigned [the defendant] agrees to pay the holder thereof any deficiency upon demand."

Default was made in the payment of the note, and the plaintiff sold the security, applied the proceeds on the debt, leaving a deficiency, and then, without demand upon the defendant, brought the present action to recover the deficiency and obtained judgment for it.

[1, 2] The sole point presented on appeal is that, by virtue of the provision quoted from the pledge agreement, whereby defendant agreed to pay any deficiency after sale "upon demand," a demand was necessary before the plaintiff could maintain an action for such deficiency. But the rule is thoroughly well established that in the case of a primary obligation to pay money on demand the institution of an action for the recovery of the money is the only demand necessary. This is almost a matter of common, as distinguished from legal, knowledge in the case of notes or bills payable on demand. It applies equally, however, to money obligations generally, and this has been explicitly decided in this state, and that in a case where, as here, the obligation was for the deficiency existing after the sale of securities. Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 266. Between this decision and the present case there is no possible distinction. Defendant's counsel cite First National Bank v. Story, 200 N. Y. 346, 93 N. E. 940, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 154, 21 Ann. Cas. 542, in support of their position. But there the action was upon the obligation of a surety, the decision is expressly put upon the distinction between such an action and one upon a primary obligation, and the general rule in regard to an action of the latter character is recognized. Here, as we have said, there is a direct finding that the defendant was not a surety. We cannot avoid the conclusion that the appeal is frivolous and taken for delay.

Judgment affirmed, and let there be added to the costs against the appellant the sum of $250 as damages for an appeal taken for delay.

DOBBINS v. ECONOMIC GAS CO.
(L. A. 6171.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1920.
On Petition for Rehearing May 6, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser — Mortgage outside chain of title not constructive notice.

Where plaintiff conveyed land to a company by a deed which was lost without being recorded, and subsequently quitclaimed to another company, of which the first company was a subsidiary, with the understanding that the title conveyed was to be subject to a mortgage executed by the first company to secure bonds issued in payment for the property, the mortgage, being outside the chain of title, was not constructive notice to subsequent purchasers, though recorded.

2. Mortgages — 28 — Vendor and purchaser — 228(1) — Mortgage outside chain of title held valid as against parties to subsequent agreement and purchasers with notice.

Where plaintiff conveyed land to a company whose deed was lost without being recorded, and which gave a mortgage thereon to secure bonds, and plaintiff subsequently quitclaimed to another company, with the understanding that the title was to be subject to the mortgage, the understanding was effective as between the parties, and the mortgage, though outside the chain of title, was a valid lien as between the parties and against subsequent purchasers with notice.

3. Lis pendens — 22(1) — Purchasers pending suit to foreclose mortgage in which their grantor was party held charged with notice.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, defendant's grantor was made a defendant on allegations that it claimed an interest subject and subordinate to the mortgage, and a lis pendens was duly recorded, naming it as one against whom relief was sought, defendant, who purchased pending the suit, was charged with constructive notice of the mortgage, and took subject thereto, though the mortgage was executed by a party whose deed was not recorded, and was therefore outside the chain of title.

4. Mortgages — 497(1) — Adjudication as to whether title is subject to mortgage binding when question voluntarily litigated.

If the parties to a foreclosure suit voluntarily litigate the question whether the interest of a defendant is subject to the mortgage, and such question is determined by the decree, such determination is a valid adjudication, notwithstanding the general rule that adverse titles may not be litigated in a foreclosure suit.

5. Mortgages — 497(1) — Declaration in foreclosure decree held adjudication that interest of defendant was subject to mortgage.

Where plaintiff conveyed land to the S. company, whose deed was not recorded, and subsequently quitclaimed to the P. company, with the understanding that the title conveyed should be subject to a mortgage executed by the S. company, and in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, the P. company by its answer specifically alleged the execution of the quitclaim deed, and claimed title thereunder, and the court on such issue found specifically the facts regarding the making of the deed and the decree declared the interest of the P. company subject to the mortgage, such declaration was a binding adjudication that such interest was subject to the mortgage.

6. Mortgages — 497(1) — Decree to be construed in light of pleadings, findings, and conclusions.

A foreclosure decree must be viewed and construed in the light of the pleading on which it is based and the findings and conclusions of law.

7. Lis pendens — 21 — Purchaser not bound by judgment on new cause of action subsequently introduced by amendment.

Where a new cause of action is injected into a suit by plaintiff by amendment or otherwise, a previous purchaser pendente lite from a defendant of the subject-matter of the suit is not bound by the judgment upon such new cause of action, unless made a party.

3. Mortgages ⚡459(1)—Question whether defendant's interest is covered by mortgage properly determinable.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, the issue as to whether the interest of a defendant is covered by the lien is properly determinable.

9. Lis pendens ⚡21—Purchaser held bound by decree adjudging that grantor's interest was subject to mortgage.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, one of the defendants by amendment of its answer raised the issue as to whether its interest was subject to the mortgage, one purchasing pendente lite prior to such amendment was bound by the decree determining such issue.

10. Lis pendens ⚡21—Purchaser bound by result on issues subsequently raised, if material and proper.

A purchaser pendente lite is bound by the result of the suit, though that result may be based upon issues raised subsequent to his purchase, provided the matter adjudicated be the cause of action subject to which he bought, and the issues be material and proper to that cause of action.

11. Adverse possession ⚡58—Possession insufficient to give title unless adverse.

Possession alone, no matter how exclusive and complete, is not sufficient to create a title by prescription unless adverse.

12. Lis pendens ⚡26(2)—Possession of purchaser pendente lite not adverse during litigation.

The possession of land by one purchasing it pending a suit to foreclose a mortgage from a defendant in the suit is not adverse to the mortgage during the pendency of the litigation.

13. Mortgages ⚡143—Possession of purchaser from mortgagor not adverse to mortgagee.

Though no suit is pending to foreclose the mortgage, the possession of one purchasing from the mortgagor is not adverse to the mortgagee, so that he can secure title by prescription.

14. Gas ⚡8—Mesne profits recoverable without recovery of possession by purchaser at mortgage foreclosure sale when property devoted to public use.

A purchaser of property of a gas company required for public service at a foreclosure sale may recover mesne profits accruing subsequent to the sale, conceding that an owner cannot recover possession of property appropriated to a public use which would be interfered with by giving her possession, and that ordinarily mesne profits cannot be recovered except as an incident of the recovery of possession.

15. Trial ⚡404(1)—Findings construed, and held to require judgment for mesne profits.

In a suit by a purchaser at a foreclosure sale against one purchasing pendente lite, for mesne profits, findings held to entitle plaintiff to judgment, notwithstanding findings that defendant had been in the exclusive adverse possession ever since he took possession, and that plaintiff was not the owner of the property, and the absence of any findings connecting the interest of the party from whom defendant purchased with the mortgage or the title of the mortgagee.

16. Trial ⚡404(1)—Findings to be considered by themselves.

The findings must be construed by themselves where the decree and judgment roll in a former suit are not a part of the findings.

17. Trial ⚡404(1)—Finding that foreclosure decree "adjudged" superiority of lien construed.

In a finding that a foreclosure decree adjudged that the lien of the mortgage was prior and superior to the interest of the company under whom defendant claimed, "adjudged" was the equivalent of adjudicated, and meant a judicial determination of that fact, and not a mere declaration.

On Petition for Rehearing.

18. Lis pendens ⚡26(2)—One taking possession under deeds from party could not acquire adverse possession, though such party had no title.

Where the P. company was in possession of land at the time of the filing of a cross-complaint upon which a decree of foreclosure was based, and was made a party defendant by the cross-complaint, and a lis pendens was recorded, naming it as such, and the decree adjudged that its interest was subject to the mortgage, and foreclosed it, and pending the suit it conveyed to H., who conveyed to defendant, and defendant took actual possession under the deed from H., defendant was a purchaser pendente lite and its possession was not adverse to the mortgagee, though the P. company had no title.

19. Gas ⚡8—Purchaser of property at foreclosure sale entitled to recover for use and occupation of everything sold.

Where property of a gas company devoted to a public use was sold on foreclosure of a mortgage, if improvements had been made which were not covered by the mortgage, the remedy was in the foreclosure proceedings, and, though the inclusion in the decree was erroneous, the purchaser was entitled to recover for the use and occupation of everything sold by the foreclosure decree, in an action for mesne profits.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Caroline W. Dobbins against the Economic Gas Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Goodwin & Mortgage and Porter & Sutton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John E. Biby, of Los Angeles, Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, Ward Chapman, and L. M. Chapman, Gurney Newlin, and Allen W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action to recover the mesne profits of certain real property in the possession of the defendant, a public utility gas company, and used by it as a part of its gas plant. The plaintiff had recovered a judgment foreclosing a mortgage upon the property, to which mortgage the defendant was not a party, and had bought in the property at the foreclosure sale, and claims to be the owner by reason of such foreclosure. The profits sought to be recovered are for the period subsequent to the foreclosure sale. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals. The ultimate question in the case is, Did the foreclosure decree affect the defendant's interest?

[1, 2] The plaintiff, Mrs. Dobbins, was the original owner of the property. In April, 1903, she conveyed it to a corporation known as the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company, which for brevity we will call the Suburban Company. In consideration of this conveyance the Suburban Company gave Mrs. Dobbins $50,000 in par value of its bonds, part of an authorized issue of $300,000 secured by mortgage or trust deed previously executed and recorded, and which in anticipation of the conveyance from Mrs. Dobbins described the property involved here as a part of the property mortgaged. It was this mortgage which was subsequently foreclosed and under the decree foreclosing which Mrs. Dobbins purchased and now claims. The deed by Mrs. Dobbins to the Suburban Company was never recorded and was apparently lost. The result was that the Suburban Company was on the record not connected with the title; the mortgage by it, although recorded, did not come into the record chain of title, and constructive notice of it was not given by its record to subsequent purchasers, and Mrs. Dobbins remained as the record owner of the property free of any incumbrance.

In this state of affairs Mrs. Dobbins, in June, 1906, conveyed the property by quitclaim deed to a company known as the People's Gas Company, which, in turn, conveyed the property to the People's Gas & Coke Company. The latter was really nothing but the former under another name, and for the purposes of discussion the two may be treated as one. The effect of the conveyance by Mrs. Dobbins to the People's Company was, of course, so far as the record is concerned, to put the title in the latter free and clear of any incumbrance, and, in particular, of the mortgage by the Suburban Company.

In fact, however, the quitclaim deed was not intended by the parties to put the title in the People's Company free of that mortgage. The Suburban Company was merely a subsidiary of the People's Company, all of its stock practically being owned by the latter, and the latter having taken over the Suburban plant. This was represented to Mrs. Dobbins, together with the fact that her original deed to the Suburban Company had been lost without being recorded, and the quitclaim deed was executed by her upon the understanding that it was to confirm to the People's Company the title conveyed by the lost deed to the Suburban Company. According to this understanding the record title which the People's Company obtained by the quitclaim deed was to be subject to the mortgage securing the bonds taken by Mrs. Dobbins in original payment for the property.

This understanding would, of course, be effective as between the parties. The result was that while the quitclaim deed had the effect of putting the record title in the People's Company free and clear of all incumbrances, yet the mortgage by the Suburban Company was as to the record owner a valid and subsisting lien, although not one of which the record would give any one purchasing from the record owner constructive notice. In other words; the case was one where the record title was subject to what was, in effect, an unrecorded mortgage. It follows that any one subsequently purchasing for value from the People's Company would take free of the mortgage if he purchased in good faith and without notice, but otherwise he would not. The People's Company did sell to one Hayes, and Hayes in turn sold to the defendant. Both purchased for value, and if either purchased without notice the record title acquired by such purchaser was at once freed of the latent equity of what was in effect the unrecorded mortgage by the Suburban Company. The question, therefore, which is determinative of the real merits of the case as between Mrs. Dobbins and the defendant is, Did either the defendant or Hayes purchase without notice, actual or constructive, of her mortgage?

[3] The evidence that both Hayes and the defendant had actual notice of Mrs. Dobbins' claim when they purchased is ample and conclusive. It is unnecessary, however, to state the facts showing such notice, for constructive notice was plainly given them by the record. Prior to the purchase by Hayes suit had actually been begun to foreclose the Suburban mortgage. It was originally begun by one Gallagher, who claimed to own some bonds secured by it. Mrs. Dobbins and the People's Company were both made defendants. Mrs. Dobbins appeared and filed a cross-complaint, seeking for herself as the owner of $50,000 of bonds to secure the foreclosure of the mortgage. The People's Company was made a party defendant to the cross-complaint, which alleged that the People's Company claimed some interest in the property, but that such interest was subject and subordinate to the mortgage. When Mrs. Dobbins' cross-complaint was filed a lis pendens was duly recorded, naming the People's Company as one against whom relief was sought. It was subsequent to the filing of the cross-complaint and the recording of the lis pendens that Hayes purchased from the People's Company, and the defendant, in turn, from Hayes. Hayes and the defendant were therefore notified of Mrs. Dobbins' complaint and of the nature of the cause of action there set up. At the same time they had notice from the record that the People's Company was the holder of the record title by deed from Mrs. Dobbins. But of necessity Mrs. Dobbins could not be maintaining a suit to subject the interest of the People's Company to foreclosure except upon a claim that for some reason not appearing on the face of the record the unincumbered title which she had apparently conveyed to the People's Company was, in fact, incumbered. In other words, the nature of the suit, taken in connection with the record chain of title, was unmistakable notice to Hayes and the defendant of her claim. It follows at once that if her claim was valid, as it was, they took subject to it, and their interests were subordinate to the mortgage. This being the case, the interest of the defendant was foreclosed by the foreclosure and sale, and Mrs. Dobbins is now the owner of the property.

Our discussion so far has been concerned with the underlying facts which go to the real merits of the matter as between the parties. It is also claimed, however, on behalf of Mrs. Dobbins that the very question as to whether or not the interest of the People's Company was subject to the mortgage was litigated in the foreclosure suit itself, and there determined adversely to that company, and that the defendant here is bound by that adjudication as a purchaser pendente lite. The defendant, on the other hand, claims, first, that there was no such adjudication against the People's Company; and, second, that if there were, it was not binding upon the defendant here.

Mrs. Dobbins' cross-complaint contained the averment as to the People's Company usual as to a defendant in a foreclosure complaint other than a party to the mortgage, viz. that the People's Company claimed some interest in the mortgaged property, but such interest was subject to the lien of the mortgage. The answer of the People's Company admitted that it claimed an interest, but denied that it was so subject. This was the state of the pleadings at the time when Hayes and the defendant purchased. The foreclosure decree subsequently rendered declared the interest of the People's Company to be subject to the mortgage. If this were all, the defendant's claim that there was no adjudication that the interest of the People's Company was subject to the mortgage would have to be sustained. The case would come directly within the rule of Beronio v. Ventura Co., 129 Cal. 232, 61 Pac. 958, 79 Am. St. Rep. 118, where it was held that just such a declaration in a foreclosure decree upon just such pleadings was not an adjudication of the fact that the interest of the defendant was subject to the mortgage. This decision has been followed in a number of subsequent cases, and as recently as Hartfield v. Howard, 181 Pac. 385.

The ground upon which the decision in Beronio v. Ventura Company is put should, however, be carefully noted. The case was one where the foreclosure defendant whom it was sought to bind by the foreclosure decree had an adverse and, in fact, superior title to the property. The opinion lays down the established rule, repeatedly followed in this state, that a foreclosure suit cannot properly be turned into a suit to quiet title, and that the question of superiority between a mortgage lien, or more accurately between the title upon which it is a lien, and an adverse independent title cannot properly be litigated in such a suit, with the result that even if a judgment of foreclosure be rendered against a defendant other than the mortgagor, the judgment, unless there is some special adjudication in it, will effect only such interest as the defendant may have which is subject to the mortgage, and not any interest he may have which is not subject. The real question in the case was whether or not the particular foreclosure decree under consideration did contain a special adjudication by reason of the averment of the complaint that the defendant's interest was subject to the mortgage, the denial of this by the answer, and the declaration of the decree in accordance with the averment of the complaint. Upon this point, which was the real point of the case, the court held the averment of the complaint was not one of fact, but of a conclusion of law; that it, therefore, tendered no determinable issue, and its denial in the answer raised no issue, and that it followed that the question of superiority of title had not been involved, and had not been adjudicated. The correctness of this ruling is by no means free from doubt, and it would certainly seem to be directly opposed to Elder v. Spinks, 53 Cal. 293, upon which it relies. But it has too long been the rule in this state to warrant us in now reopening the point decided. But it is not necessary to extend it any further, and in that connection two things are to be noted regarding it.

In the first place, while it holds to the rule, and properly so, that adverse titles may not be litigated in a foreclosure suit, it does not decide that it is not proper in such a suit to determine the question of whether or not the title claimed by the defendant is in fact adverse. That question is not discussed, and is very different from the question of superiority between adverse titles, which is discussed. Our decisions have repeatedly laid down the rule that a person who claims an adverse interest merely is not a proper party defendant in a foreclosure suit, and, if he is made a party, is entitled to be dismissed therefrom. Croghan v. Minor, 53 Cal. 15; Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 428, 23 Pac. 705; Houghton v. Allen, 75 Cal. 102, 16 Pac. 532; Cody v. Bean, 93 Cal. 578, 29 Pac. 223. But how is it possible to determine whether he is a proper party and entitled to be dismissed without determining whether his claim is adverse or not? An adverse title, whether it be superior or inferior, cannot be foreclosed because it is not subject to the mortgage. But whether the title claimed be adverse or not so that in the one case it cannot be foreclosed and in the other it can be would certainly seem to be a question directly involved in it. It would seem as if it were one of the proper functions of a foreclosure suit to determine what it is which can be and is foreclosed. In Boggs v. Fowler, 16 Cal. 560, 76 Am. Dec. 561, the opinion by Judge Field, speaking of the function of a foreclosure suit under our law, says:

"Here, what is termed a foreclosure suit is only a proceeding for the legal determination of the existence of the lien, the ascertainment of its extent, and the subjection to sale of the estate pledged for its satisfaction. Upon the validity and extent of that lien the owner of the estate, whether mortgagor or his grantee, has a right to be heard, and no valid decree for the sale of the estate can pass until this right has been afforded to him." (The italics ours.)

The question whether the title of a defendant is adverse or is subject in the strict sense to the mortgage is surely more properly determinable by pleadings and trial before judgment than subsequently upon proceedings after judgment and sale for a writ of assistance to obtain possession. And yet, if the question is not determinable in one or the other of these ways, but must always be left to a separate action, it means that in every case where the mortgagor has transferred possession it is not possible for the foreclosure purchaser to obtain possession against the objection of the mortgagor's transferee except by the slow process of an independent action. So far as we are aware, none of our decisions goes as far as this, or holds that, when by proper averments of fact the question is presented in a foreclosure suit as to whether or not the interest of a defendant is adverse or is subject in the strict sense to the mortgage, such question is not properly determinable there. In actual practice the question is usually so determined, and the point seems to have been presented and decided in Savings & Trust Co. v. Bear Valley Irr. Co. (C. C.) 112 Fed. 693, 703. In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 461, 168 Pac. 1036, the court proceeded in a foreclosure suit to consider and determine (176 Cal. p. 467, 168 Pac. 1036) whether or not the interest of a defendant who was a lessee from the mortgagor was subordinate to the lien, and at the same time refused (176 Cal. p. 475, 168 Pac. 1036) to consider a claim of adverse title by the same defendant. While the distinction is not discussed in the case, it is nevertheless observed.

[4] In the second place, it is expressly stated in Beronio v. Ventura Co. that if the parties voluntarily proceed in the foreclosure suit to litigate the question of title, and such question is determined by the decree, such determination will be a binding adjudication. The statement, perhaps, is dictum, but it is manifestly correct, and Johnston v. S. F. Savings Union, 75 Cal. 134, 140, 16 Pac. 753, 7 Am. St. Rep. 129, is directly in point. Much more would it be true where the question determined was not one of titles, but as to whether the defendant's interest was one not adverse but subject to the mortgage.

[5, 6] Coming back to the case at bar, according to Beronio v. Ventura Company, as we have said, the foreclosure decree here, if it rested upon the pleadings as they stood at the time Hayes and the defendant purchased, would not be an adjudication that the interest of the People's Company was subject to the Suburban mortgage, in spite of the declaration it contains to that effect. But the People's Company did by subsequent amendment to its answer specifically allege the execution of the quitclaim deed by Mrs. Dobbins, and that it transferred the title to it. The effect of this amendment was at once to raise the issue as to the character of the title under which the People's Company claimed, and upon this issue the court found specifically the facts as we have previously stated them in regard to the making of the deed, from which it follows at once that the title of the People's Company was subject to the mortgage. Following such a finding, the conclusions of law of the trial court in the foreclosure decree declare that the interest of the People's Company was subject to the mortgage. The foreclosure decree, with its declaration to the same effect, is based upon the pleading as so amended and upon the findings and conclusions of law. It must be viewed and construed in the light of them and, in fact, with them as a part of it. So viewed and construed, the decree is very different from that in Beronio v. Ventura Company. An issue of fact was presented. It was tried and determined. The foreclosure decree in suitable words declares the result of that determination. Under these circumstances such declaration was an adjudication binding upon the party defendant, the People's Company, against whom it was made. It was an adjudication of an issue properly presentable in the suit, and so presented. It was also an adjudication within the statement of Beronio v. Ventura Company, and the ruling in Johnston v. S. F. Savings Union, supra, that if the parties voluntarily present and litigate an issue not properly involved in the action, they will yet be bound by the resulting determination.

Passing now to the second point in connection with the foreclosure decree, the question as to whether it is binding upon the defendant here, even if it were binding upon the People's Company from whom the defendant purchased pendente lite, the defendant's position is based upon the fact that at the time the People's Company sold its answer had not been amended so as to raise the issue as to the subsergency of its title to the mortgage. The defendant's contention is that as a purchaser pendente lite it is bound only by the determination of those issues which were presented at the time it bought.

[7-10] It is, of course, the rule that where a new cause of action is injected into a suit by the plaintiff by amendment or otherwise, a previous purchaser pendente lite from a defendant of the subject-matter of the suit is not bound by the judgment upon such new cause of action unless he is made party. The simple reason is that the introduction of the new cause of action is in effect the commencement of a new suit, and, since the purchaser bought prior to its commencement, he is not as to it a purchaser pendente lite. Whether the same rule would apply where, as here, it is not the plaintiff, but the defendant, from whom the purchaser buys, who injects the new cause of action into the litigation we need not inquire. It would be necessary to inquire, if the issue raised by the answer of the People's Company had been one as to superiority of title, had been one whereby the foreclosure suit was as to such issue transformed into a suit to quiet title. But that is not the case. The issue raised by the defendant's amendment was as to the subsergency of its interest to the mortgage, that is, not as to whether it was superior to the title or interest upon which the mortgage was a lien, but as to whether it was covered by that lien, whether it was the estate or a part of the estate mortgaged. This issue, as we have just held, was a proper one in the foreclosure suit, and properly determinable there as a part of the action for the foreclosure of the lien. The amendment did not inject a new cause of action, but merely raised a new issue material to the original cause of action presented by the cross-complaint.

There can be no doubt that under these circumstances the defendant here is bound as a purchaser pendente lite by the determination of that issue, although it was raised by subsequent amendment. It may be that the defendant was not required to anticipate the introduction into the action, even by the party from whom it purchased, of a new cause of action, and would not be bound by the course of such party in so doing. But certainly a purchaser pendente lite is bound by the result of the suit, although that result may be based upon issues raised subsequent to his purchase, provided the matter adjudicated be the cause of action subject to which he bought and the issues be material and proper to that cause of action. This is directly decided in Tilton v. Cofield, 93 U. S. 163, 23 L. Ed. 858, whose language in fact goes further than is necessary for the purposes of this case. It is said (page 163 of 93 U. S., 23 L. Ed. 858):

"There is another objection to the case of the appellees, which must not be overlooked. They are not subsequent attaching creditors, nor creditors at all; they are purchasers lite pendente. The law is, that he who intermeddles with property in litigation does it at his peril, and is as conclusively bound by the results of the litigation, whatever they may be, as if he had been a party to it from the outset. Inlowe's Lessee v. Harvey, 11 Md. 524; Salsbury v. Benton, 7 Lans. [N. Y.] 352; Harrington v. Slade, 19 Barb. S. C. [N. Y.] 162; 1 Story's Eq., § 406. The appellees voluntarily took the position they occupy. They chose to buy a large amount of property, including that in controversy, from the fugitive debtor. This was done after the latter had been seized under the writ of attachment and while the suit in which it was issued was still pending. They took the title subject to the contingencies of the amendments that were made, and of everything else, not coram non iudice, the court might see fit to do in the case. The attachment might be discharged, or the judgment might be larger than was then anticipated. They took the chances, and must abide the result. Having obtruded themselves upon the property attached, they insist that their purchase narrowed the rights of the plaintiffs and circumscribed the jurisdiction of the court. Such is not the law. After their purchase, the court, the parties, and the res, stood in all respects as they stood before; and the judgment, sale, and conveyance have exactly the same effect as if the appellees and the facts upon which they rely had no existence."

The general rule in regard to amendments is thus stated in 25 Cyc. at page 1473:

"An amendment to the bill or complaint, after a purchase or the acquisition of other rights pendente lite, which does not alter the cause of action, does not affect the lis pendens, since it relates back to the filing of the original bill. On the other hand, if the cause of action is changed by the amendment, or a new cause added, the lis pendens does not relate back, but dates from the filing of the amended complaint."

See, also, Mellen v. Moline Iron Works, 131 U. S. 352, 9 Sup. Ct. 781, 33 L. Ed. 178; Miller & Lux v. Rickey (C. C.) 146 Fed. 574; Norris v. Ile, 152 Ill. 190, 38 N. E. 762, 43 Am. St. Rep. 233; Brock v. Pearson, 87 Cal. 581, 588, 25 Pac. 963.

Our conclusion is that the adjudication against the People's Company that its interest was subject to the mortgage is binding upon the defendant here as a purchaser pendente lite. It follows that for this reason also the interest of the defendant was foreclosed by the foreclosure decree and sale, and that Mrs. Dobbins, as the purchaser at the sale, is now the owner of the property.

This conclusion, reached both upon the underlying facts and because of the scope of the foreclosure decree, is determinative of the real merits of the case at least, but there are further points which require discussion. Defendant's counsel, in their brief, take the position that the defendant was not a purchaser pendente lite. In fact, a large part of their argument is based upon this assumption. This position is rather puzzling, since the record is plain that the defendant purchased from Hayes and Hayes from the People's Company, and the People's Company at the time of the purchase was a party defendant in the foreclosure suit, and named as such in Mrs. Dobbins' cross-complaint, and had, in fact, appeared and answered. Furthermore, it was under the conveyance from the People's Company that the defendant received possession, and it had no other muniment of title or right of possession. Just why it is said under these circumstances that the defendant was not a purchaser pendente lite is rather difficult to see.

[11-13] Apparently what is meant is that, although the defendant was a purchaser pendente lite, yet it now has, not that it then had, a title by adverse possession, and that such title is not one purchased pendente lite, and as to it the defendant is not a purchaser pendente lite. This, of course, is true, provided the defendant has a title by adverse possession. The question is, has it such a title. Defendant's counsel maintain stoutly that it has, and the lower court so found, and based its judgment for the defendant upon that finding. The finding of adverse possession, however, is specifically only of a possession commencing with the defendant going into possession. The court also finds specifically that the defendant took possession under the purchase through Hayes from the People's Company, then a party defendant to the foreclosure suit. The salient fact, in other words, as shown by the findings themselves as well as by the evidence, is that the possession which it is now claimed has ripened into a title by prescription was possession acquired under a purchase from a party defendant to a foreclosure suit, against whom a foreclosure decree was subsequently rendered. Now there is no doubt that from the time the defendant took possession of the property in June, 1909, until the commencement of the present action the period of five years required to give it a title by adverse possession had more than elapsed, and that during the whole of the period the defendant was in the exclusive and complete possession of the property, and claimed to be the owner of it, as in fact it was up to the time at least of the foreclosure sale. But possession alone, no matter how exclusive and complete, is not sufficient to create a title by prescription. In order to do that the possession must be adverse. The question here is, Was the defendant's possession adverse to the mortgage whose foreclosure it is now sought to defeat? and this question is hardly discussed in the briefs. Upon this point the fact that the defendant was a purchaser pendente lite and acquired possession as such is most material, and, in fact, decisive. The question may be stated thus: During the pendency of a mortgage foreclosure suit, A. purchases the property from a defendant in the suit who holds it subject to the mortgage, and takes possession under and by virtue of such purchase. Is A.'s possession, so acquired and held, one which is adverse to the mortgage, so that the statute begins to run in favor of the purchaser and against the mortgagee? The answer to the question seems to us evident. If such were the rule no mortgage would be safe. If suit were brought to foreclose it, and the mortgagor then conveyed the property to a third person and gave the latter possession, the mortgage could be completely defeated if only it were possible, as too frequently it would be, to toll the foreclosure suit along until 5 years had elapsed. The truth is that, even if no suit were pending at the time of the purchase and acquisition of possession from the mortgagor, the possession of the purchaser would not be adverse to the mortgagee, so that he could secure title by prescription. His possession is but that of the mortgagor whose successor in interest he is, and is no more adverse to the mortgagee than would be that of the mortgagor. It is, in fact, merely the possession of the mortgagor transferred. Much more is this true where, as here, the purchase is made pendente lite. Then the case comes within the elementary principle that the statute does not run during the pendency of litigation against rights involved in the litigation, and which are subsequently reduced to judgment therein. If it be true, as it plainly is, that the People's Company, if it had remained in possession during the pendency of the foreclosure suit, could not have acquired by such possession a title superior to the mortgage subject to which it held the property and to the judgment foreclosing the mortgage, the same thing must be true as to the defendant who, as a purchaser pendente lite, merely stands in the shoes of the People's Company. This is not saying that the defendant, if it had an independent and a superior title not subject to the mortgage, might not assert and rely upon it. It is saying only that a superior title cannot be created by possession acquired during the litigation from a party defendant to that litigation. The claim of the defendant here is just that and nothing more.

The case comes exactly within Pratt v. Pratt, 96 U. S. 704, 24 L. Ed. 805. There the statute of Illinois provided a limitation of 7 years on actions for the recovery of real property. The action was ejectment, and both parties claimed from one Speer. The plaintiff had obtained a judgment against Speer in 1857, which was a lien upon the land. In 1863 the land was sold on execution upon the judgment, and in 1865, pursuant to the sale, was deeded by the marshal to the plaintiff. After the recovery of the judgment and its becoming a lien, but long before the sale, Speer sold the land to another, from whom it came by mesne conveyances to the defendant, the possession of the property passing with such conveyances. Within less than 7 years after the plaintiff received the marshal's deed, but more than 7 years after Speer had parted with the property and the defendant had taken possession, the action before the court was brought. The defendant's claim was that the statute had run in his favor. His possession was, as here, of a character sufficient for that purpose, provided the case were one where his possession prior to the making of the marshal's deed could be adverse. It was held, however, that it was not such a case. The court said:

"The defendant, having purchased the land of the person who had the legal title, does undoubtedly hold adversely to everybody else. He admits no better right in any one. He is no man's tenant. The right by which he holds possession is superior to the right of all others. He asserts this, and he acts on it. His possession is, in this sense, adverse to the whole world. But it is not inconsistent with all this that there exists a lien on the land—a lien which does not interfere with his possession, which cannot disturb it, but which may ripen into a title superior to that under which he holds, but which is yet in privity with it. In the just sense of the term, his possession is not adverse to this lien. There can be no adversary rights in regard to the possession under the lien, and under the defendant's purchase from the judgment debtor, until the lien is converted into a title conferring the right of possession. The defendant's possession after this is adverse to the title of plaintiff; and then, with the right of entry in plaintiff, the bar of the statute begins to run."

And again:

"If we are wrong in what we have supposed to be the law, it must follow that, in all cases in which the owner of real estate owes money, which is a lien on the land in his hands, the statute of limitation begins to run against that lien as soon as he conveys the land with possession to some one else. It can make no difference in the principle asserted whether the lien be created by a judgment or by a mortgage. Nor can it make any difference whether the debt secured by the lien be due when the conveyance is made, or has 10 or 20 years to run before the lien can be enforced against the land. The principle asserted is applicable in all these cases, namely, that from the day of the conveyance, by the debtor, of the land on which the lien of the debt exists to some third person, accompanied by transfer of possession, the possession of the purchaser is adverse to the lienholder, and the limitation of 7 years begins to run. If this be established to be the law, the owner of real estate may borrow money on 10 years' time, to the value of that estate, and give a mortgage on it to secure payment; and by a sale and conveyance of the land to a third person, with delivery of possession a week afterwards, the lien is utterly defeated. For, according to this doctrine, the statute of limitations begins to run against the mortgagee the moment the title and possession are vested in the purchaser, and the bar of the statute becomes perfect against all the world by 7 years' possession; whereas the mortgagee can take no steps to foreclose his mortgage until his money comes due, 3 years later.

"And this doctrine is asserted in the face of the fact that there is a limitation law specially applicable to the enforcement of the judgment lien by sale under execution, and of the mortgage lien by foreclosure."

See, also, Jefferson v. Wendt, 51 Cal. 573; Leonard v. Flynn, 89 Cal. 535, 26 Pac. 1097, 23 Am. St. Rep. 500.

To close up our discussion of this point of a title acquired by the defendant here by adverse possession, we may say that it resolves itself into the very simple rule which can hardly be gainsaid, that the statute of limitations does not run during the pendency of the litigation in favor of a purchaser pendente lite any more than it does in favor of the party from whom he purchases, and that he will not be regarded as holding the property adversely during the litigation. Christy v. Spring Valley Water Works, 97 Cal. 21, 31 Pac. 1110; In re Grider, 81 Cal. 571, 22 Pac. 908. The creation of an independent title by adverse possession during the litigation is very different from the assertion of a superior title existing independently of such possession. The defendant here has no such superior independent title, and asserts none. Its only claims are its right derived from the People's Company, which was foreclosed, and its right by possession during the litigation. But such possession could not be adverse, and the general finding of the lower court that the defendant acquired a title by adverse possession, and that the plaintiff therefore is not the owner, is not only contrary to the evidence, but is contrary to the facts specifically found with regard to the defendant's possession, and is completely negated by those facts. The general finding is, in truth, but a conclusion of law erroneously drawn from the particular facts found.

[14] The remaining contention of the defendant which requires consideration is that it is a public utility corporation; that the property involved is an integral part of its plant, and required for adequate service to the public; that the plaintiff cannot be given possession without interfering with such service; that, therefore, even though she be the owner of the property, she cannot have possession of it, and that an action for mesne profits will not lie except as an incident of the recovery of possession. It may be admitted that the plaintiff, although she is the owner of the property, cannot have possession of it because it has been appropriated to a public use which would be interfered with by giving her possession. It may also be admitted that ordinarily mesne profits cannot be recovered except as an incident to the recovery of possession. But it does not follow that the owner of real property in the peculiar situation of the plaintiff here may not maintain an action for mesne profits, although she cannot have possession. She would be entitled to possession, and could recover it except for the public interest which intervenes between her and the defendant and prevents her having the full measure of relief to which otherwise she would be entitled. But the public interest should not be permitted to affect the rights of the parties further than the protection of such interest itself requires. So far as may be done without interfering with the public interest, the position of the plaintiff should be that which she would have except for its intervention. Without its presence she would have the right both to possession and to mesne profits. With it present she cannot have possession, but as to mesne profits, the public interest will in no wise be injuriously affected by permitting their recovery. There is no public interest which intervenes as to them.

The case comes within the principle of Nathan v. Dierssen, 164 Cal. 607, 130 Pac. 12. There an action was brought for mesne profits, by a plaintiff out of possession. Pending the action the defendant surrendered possession, and thereafter judgment was given against him for mesne profits without any judgment for possession. The absence of such judgment was relied upon on appeal as a ground for reversal. It was held, however, that there was no occasion for a judgment for possession, since the plaintiff already had possession. It follows that if a plaintiff is for possession, he may have judgment for the profits alone. The present case is of that character. The plaintiff cannot have a judgment for possession, if the defendant's contention be correct, but for a reason which does not affect her right to the mesne profits. To them she is entitled, and she should therefore be permitted to have judgment for them without a judgment for possession.

[15] The various conclusions we have stated necessitate a reversal of the judgment against the plaintiff. They go further. They show that the plaintiff was plainly entitled to judgment upon the evidence presented at the trial. It remains to consider whether judgment can be entered for her upon the findings. The findings set forth that the plaintiff was the original owner of the property; that she conveyed it to the Suburban Company, which executed its mortgage; that the mortgage was foreclosed upon the plaintiff's cross-complaint; that the People's Company was made a defendant to the cross-complaint and a lis pendens, naming it as a defendant, was recorded by the plaintiff at the time the cross-complaint was filed; that the foreclosure decree "ordered, adjudged, and decreed * * * that said mortgage was a lien prior and superior to any and all rights, title, and claims and interests of any of the defendants in said action on the property described in the judgment [foreclosure decree]; that the property was sold at foreclosure, and bought in by the plaintiff, and the sheriff's deed to her executed; that the defendant was a purchaser pendente lite from the People's Company, who was at the time in possession; that the defendant entered into possession, claiming title only under such purchase; that it has remained in possession ever since; that the property is part of a public utility plant; and that the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the property was $415 a month. These findings are sufficient to require judgment for the plaintiff except, possibly, in two respects.

In the first place, there is, in addition to the findings stated, the finding that the defendant has been in the exclusive adverse possession ever since it took possession, and that the plaintiff is not the owner of the property. This finding we have already discussed at length. If it stood alone it would, of course, be a finding of an ultimate fact which could not be disregarded. But it does not stand alone. With it are findings as to the particular facts with relation to the defendant's possession. These findings are to the effect that while the defendant's possession ever since it took it has been exclusive and complete under a claim of ownership, yet such possession was acquired from one who was at the time a defendant in the foreclosure action, and against whom the foreclosure decree subsequently rendered operated, and was acquired by way of purchase from such defendant and not otherwise. These particular facts so found completely negative the possibility of the defendant's possession being adverse so as to ripen into a title by prescription good against the final decree in the action subject to the result in which the property was purchased and possession acquired. It appears clearly that the general finding that the defendant had been in the exclusive adverse possession of the property for more than 5 years and the plaintiff was not the owner is but a conclusion from the fact that the defendant had for more than 5 years been in the exclusive possession of the property under a claim of ownership. But the fact also found that such possession was acquired under grant from a party to an action then pending with relation to the property affirmatively shows that the conclusion is erroneous. As such it comes within the principle of such cases as Savings & Loan Society v. Burnett, 103 Cal. 514, 538, 39 Pac. 922, Howeth v. Sullenger, 113 Cal. 547, 550, 45 Pac. 841, and McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 253, 72 Pac. 997, and may be disregarded.

In the second place, there is no finding connecting the interest of the People's Company with the Suburban mortgage or the title of the Suburban Company. The finding, on the contrary, is that the People's Company had no right whatever in the property other than that of possession. If the fact as shown by the findings was merely this, it would not appear that the interest of the People's Company to which the defendant succeeded had been foreclosed and purchased by the plaintiff. The case would come within the rule that in the absence of a special adjudication a foreclosure decree operates only upon such interests as are subject to the mortgage, and it would not appear from the findings that the interest of the People's Company was of that character. But the findings go further. They find not merely the foreclosure of the Suburban mortgage, but they find that the foreclosure decree "ordered, adjudged and decreed" that the Suburban mortgage was a lien prior and superior to the interest of the People's Company. In other words, the findings show that the interest of the People's Company was actually foreclosed upon, so that in this respect as well the findings are sufficient to justify and to require judgment for the plaintiff.

[16, 17] It may perhaps be objected that while the foreclosure decree itself when considered, as we have heretofore considered it, in connection with the judgment roll of which it is a part, shows that the interest of the People's Company was foreclosed upon, yet neither the decree nor the balance of the judgment roll are a part of the findings here; that the findings here must be construed by themselves, and that so construed they amount on this point only to a finding that the foreclosure decree contained the usual declaration as to defendants not parties to the mortgage, a declaration which, under Beronio v. Ventura Company, would not, in the absence of anything more, be an adjudication that the interest of the People's Company was foreclosed. It is true that neither the foreclosure decree nor the judgment roll is a part of the findings, and that the findings must be construed by themselves. But even so, the construction that they find merely that the foreclosure decree contained a possibly inoperative declaration of the character mentioned cannot be sustained. The language of the findings is that the foreclosure decree "adjudged" that the lien of the mortgage was prior and superior to the interest of the People's Company. Adjudged is the equivalent of adjudicated, and means a judicial determination, and not a mere declaration which may be operative or not.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with the findings as to the value of the use and occupation of the property.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [18] In denying the petition of the defendant for a rehearing we deem it well to discuss two points which are raised by the petition. The first is that the trial court found that the People's Gas & Coke Company never had any title to the mortgaged property, and from this it is argued that the defendant by its purchase through Hayes from the Gas & Coke Company acquired no title, and was therefore not a purchaser pendente lite, and not subject to the rule that the statute of limitations will not run in favor of such a purchaser in possession during the pendency of the litigation. It is true that the trial court found that the People's Gas & Coke Company never had any title to the property, the finding being based upon the supposed invalidity of the deed whereby the Gas & Coke Company purported to acquire the interest of the People's Gas Company. The right of the defendant to question the validity of this deed is open to serious question, but the point need not be determined, for the finding is wholly immaterial in any case. It makes no difference how invalid the title of the People's Gas & Coke Company was. The facts are, and the trial court so finds: That that company was in possession of the property at the time of the filing in the foreclosure suit of the cross-complaint of Mrs. Dobbins upon which the decree of foreclosure was subsequently based; that the Gas & Coke Company was made a party defendant by the cross-complaint, and a lis pendens was recorded, naming it as such; that the foreclosure decree adjudged that its interest, whatever it might be, was subject to the mortgage so that it was foreclosed upon; that pending the foreclosure suit instruments of conveyance purporting to convey the property from the Gas & Coke Company to Hayes were executed; that Hayes, in turn, executed a deed purporting to convey the property to the defendant; and that the defendant "entered into the actual possession of said property, and each and every part thereof, under said deed executed by said Hayes, as aforesaid, claiming and asserting title to said property by reason of said deed to it from said Hayes and under no other written instrument."

In other words, as found by the court, the title or claim of title of the Gas & Coke Company, however invalid it might be, was the only right or title which the defendant had when it took possession, and it took possession as the holder of such title and not otherwise. Such title was plainly acquired by the defendant as a purchaser pendente lite subject to the determination of the foreclosure suit, and of necessity the possession which accompanied such title and which was taken and held only by virtue of it was likewise held by the defendant as a purchaser pendent lite, and was subject to the determination of the foreclosure suit, and could not ripen as against the result in that suit into a title by adverse possession.

Defendant's counsel in support of their position quote from Irving v. Cunningham, 77 Cal. 52, 18 Pac. 878, as follows, the italics, however, being ours:

"Persons not parties to an action of ejectment cannot be put out of possession of the premises involved, unless they entered under the defendant, either in good faith or collusively"

—and from Graham's Heirs v. Kitchen, 118 Ky. 18, 80 S. W. 464, as follows, the italics again being ours:

"It is thought, though, that there is something in the doctrine that an entry by a stranger to the suit pendente lite affects him by the judgment as if he were a party to the record, as controlling the case before us. This doctrine can have no application here. It applies only when the stranger enters under some person who is a party to the suit. In that event he is bound by the record and decree by privity of his relation to him from whom he took title. He is bound in law to take notice of the records affecting his vendor's title, but he is not bound to take notice of, nor is he bound by, a suit over the property between strangers to his chain of title and right of entry."

We do not question the correctness of these statements, but the present case comes directly within the rule implied in the first quotation and expressly stated in the second that—

"When the stranger enters under some person who is a party to the suit, * * * he is bound by the record and decree, by privity of his relation to him from whom he took title."

The People's Gas & Coke Company was a party defendant to the foreclosure suit. The defendant here entered under that company while it was such a party and not otherwise. That company was not a stranger either to the defendant's chain of title or to its right of entry. The defendant's possession was acquired and held solely by virtue of the privity of relation between it and the People's Company, and such possession cannot be considered as any more adverse to the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit than could the possession of the People's Company, if it had remained in possession. The privity of relation between the defendant and its grantor, the People's Gas & Coke Company, does not depend in any way upon the grantor having a valid title, and is not affected in the slightest by the fact that it had no valid title.

Defendant's counsel also urge that upon the point under discussion the case is governed by Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 675, 34 Pac. 120. But the facts there, while in some aspects resembling those here, really presented a very different situation. The facts were that the owner of certain land mortgaged it. Suit to foreclose the mortgage was brought, and after decree of foreclosure and sale the interest of the mortgagor was attached in an action against him by a third person. The period of redemption from the foreclosure sale then expired without redemption, as a result of which the foreclosure purchaser became the absolute owner of the property free and clear of the attachment lien, which was, in effect, destroyed. In this situation the mortgagor deeded the property to one Thornton who took possession and thereafter maintained it. Thornton's possession so taken after the expiration of the period of redemption was, of course, hostile and adverse to the foreclosure purchaser, the real owner of the property, and, if allowed by the latter to continue, would ripen into a title by prescription against him. It was allowed so to continue, and thereby Thornton became the real owner of the property. Years later judgment was obtained in the attachment action against the original mortgagor, execution was issued upon it, and the property sold thereunder. The execution purchaser then brought ejectment against Thornton, and upon the foregoing facts the court held that he could not recover. This decision was plainly correct. The plaintiff, the execution purchaser, had no right in the property whatever. In order to have any right he had to depend upon the attachment lien. But the attachment lien had been wiped out by the foreclosure sale. On the other hand, the defendant Thornton was the real owner of the property. He had acquired a complete title by prescription against the true owner, the foreclosure purchaser. Such title was a wholly independent title so far as the execution purchaser was concerned, and was not acquired by possession hostile to him, but hostile to the foreclosure purchaser whose right was superior to the attachment lien, and therefore to the execution purchaser. The case, in reality, is but one coming within the general rule that a person entering into possession under a party to pending litigation may yet assert an independent title against the result of that litigation. It does not contravene the very necessary rule, applicable in the present case, that the possession of such a person pending the litigation may not be considered as hostile so as to defeat the litigation.

[19] The second point we desire to discuss is the plea that instead of directing judgment for the plaintiff the cause, at most, should be sent back for a new trial. This plea is made on the ground that the defendant has added very substantial improvements to the property while it has been in possession under a claim of right; that the property, the value of whose use and occupation is found by the court, includes these improvements; that the defendant has the right to remove such of the improvements made by it as can be removed without injury to the realty, and should not be held liable for the value of the use and occupation of what may be so removed; and that a new trial is necessary to determine what may be so removed, and the value of the use and occupation of the property after such removal. The answer to this is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the use and occupation of whatever was sold by the foreclosure decree, and that the property, the value of whose use and occupation is found by the court, is the same as that which is found to have been sold by the foreclosure decree. That the property was improved by the defendant is now immaterial. If such improvements were included in the foreclosure decree and should not have been, the defendant's remedy was in the foreclosure proceedings. If they were not included in the foreclosure decree, the findings show that they were not included in the property, the value of whose use and occupation is found, and for the value of whose use and occupation, as found, we have directed judgment for the plaintiff.

There are other points discussed in the petition but they are all determined by what has been said in the original opinion, and we see no reason for departing from the conclusions there stated.

Rehearing denied.

LOWE v. LOS ANGELES SUBURBAN GAS CO. et al. (L. A. 4840.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 7, 1920.)

1. Gas ⚡8—Writ of assistance not granted as to property of gas company necessary for public service.

A writ of assistance, applied for by the purchaser at foreclosure sale of property of a gas company, was properly denied as to property forming part of its distributing system necessary for service to the public, where the purchaser had no franchise to engage in the gas business.

2. Gas ⚡8 — Writ of assistance improperly granted for recovery of land on which gas company had generating plant.

A writ of assistance, applied for by a purchaser at foreclosure sale of the property of a gas company, was improperly granted as to land on which the company had a generating plant, though the normal supply of the company was natural gas, and the plant was not usually operated, but was held in readiness as an auxiliary plant in case the supply of natural gas should fail or be interrupted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Suit by L. P. Lowe, substituted for William G. Gallagher, against the Los Angeles Suburban Gas Company and others. From an order granting the application of Caroline W. Dobbins for a writ of assistance, the Economic Gas Company appeals. Reversed.

Oscar A. Trippet and John E. Biby, both of Los Angeles, and Warren Gregory and Chickering & Gregory, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Porter & Sutton, W. N. Goodwin, H. M. Barstow, Goodwin & Morgrage, Schweitzer & Hutton, and Lynn Helm, all of Los Angeles, and W. H. Chickering, of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is a companion case to Dobbins v. Economic Gas Co., 189 Pac. 1073, this day decided. The proceedings here involved are proceedings for a writ of assistance under the foreclosure decree and sale discussed at length in that case. For the purposes of this appeal it is sufficient to say that the respondent, Mrs. Dobbins, was the purchaser of certain property sold upon the foreclosure of a mortgage; that no redemption was made, and after the time for redemption had expired Mrs. Dobbins applied for a writ of assistance against the Economic Gas Company to put her in possession of the property purchased; that the application was granted as to part of the property and denied as to part; and from the order granting the application in part the Economic Gas Company appeals.

Many of the questions discussed are the same as those presented in the companion case and there decided. There is but one point which need be considered here. The Economic Gas Company is a public utility company engaged in the business of supplying gas in the city of Los Angeles. The property foreclosed upon and sold to Mrs. Dobbins was a part of its plant. The gas supplied by the company is natural gas, and a portion of the property sold was part of the company's distributing pipe-line system. As to this the writ of assistance was denied. The remainder of the property consisted of certain real estate upon which there was a gas generating plant connected with the distributing system. Since the normal supply of the company was natural gas, this plant was not usually operated, and in fact had not been operated for a year at the time the application for a writ of assistance was heard. It had, however, not been dismantled or discarded, but was held in readiness as an auxiliary or stand-by plant in case the supply of natural gas should fail or be interrupted. As to this property the writ of assistance was granted, and it is the propriety of this action that is in question on this appeal.

[1] The purchaser, Mrs. Dobbins, has no franchise to engage in the gas business, and would be required to have such franchise in order to do so. The writ of assistance was denied as to the property forming part of the gas company's distributing system upon the ground that the company could not be dispossessed of a part of its plant necessary for service to the public in favor of one who could not in turn render that same service. The propriety of this and the general rule upon which the refusal is based are not contested by the respondent, and, in fact, could not well be. The rule is well settled. Gue v. Canal Co., 24 How. 257, 16 L. Ed. 635; Connor v. Tenn., etc., Co., 109 Fed. 931, 48 C. C. A. 730, 54 L. R. A. 687; Visalia Gas, etc., Co. v. Sims, 104 Cal. 326, 37 Pac. 1042, 43 Am. St. Rep. 105.

[2] The order granting the writ as to the real property and the generating plant is attempted to be justified only upon the ground that this portion of the gas company's plant is not necessary for the continuance of its service. This is true in the sense that the service would probably go on without immediate interruption even if the generating plant were disconnected. But the continued maintenance of it as a stand-by plant ready in case of interruption of the normal supply is a proper safeguard, and a necessary one if the public interest is to be fully protected. We have no doubt, for example, that if the company itself should desire to disconnect and dismantle the plant the Railroad Commission would have ample authority to, and would, forbid it, unless some other plant performing a similar function were substituted for it. The public has a direct and immediate interest in its continued maintenance, and while such interest is not as great as it would be if it were the usual source of supply, the difference is but one of degree. The direct and immediate public interest is there, and is substantial, and, this being the case, the possession of the plant and the right to operate it cannot be taken from the company and possession given to one who has not the right to use it for the public.

Order reversed.

v. SWASEY et al. SCHROEDER v.
SAME. (S. F. 9177, 9210.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 10, 1920.)

1. Wills Ⓒ440—Construed according to testator's intent as found in language.

A will must be given effect in accordance with testator's intention as found from the language of the will, where it is clear, and, if it is ambiguous, from the language aided by such extrinsic facts as may be admissible.

2. Wills Ⓒ448—To be given an interpretation which makes it operative.

A will must be given an interpretation which will make it operative, rather than one which will render it inoperative, and an interpretation by which it disposes of the property dealt with is to be preferred to one which creates an intestacy.

3. Conversion Ⓒ15(1)—Land, directed to be converted into money, deemed personal property from testator's death.

Where will directs that testator's realty be converted into money and directs how proceeds are to be disposed of, the property must be deemed personal property from the time of testator's death under Civ. Code, § 1338.

4. Perpetuities Ⓒ6(11)—Devise to trustees with directions to sell held not unlawfully to suspend power of alienation.

A devise to trustees, with directions to sell for purpose of converting the estate into money to be applied in carrying out further trusts created in the proceeds and with power to sell immediately, or at a future date with discretion to sell in the meantime, does not unlawfully suspend the power of alienation under Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716, 749; there being persons in being who can convey absolutely.

5. Perpetuities Ⓒ6(10) — Devise creating trust for payment of specific and residuary legacies held not to suspend power of alienation.

Devise directing trustees to sell land to create fund for payment of specific legacies of residue to specified persons held not to unlawfully suspend the power of alienation, the right to the legacies both specific and residuary vesting immediately upon death of testatrix and being subject at any time thereafter to alienation by legatees.

6. Perpetuities Ⓒ9(1)—Will creating trust in fund to be accumulated held not to suspend power of alienation.

Will providing for accumulation by trustees of certain fund by sale of testator's land, and giving certain person a specified proportion of the income during her life, after accumulation, with the direction that, "upon death of" such person either before or after accumulation, such proportion of the fund should be paid to her children then living, did not unlawfully suspend power of alienation in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716; the children's interest being vested at time of such person's death and being thereafter subject to alienation, in view of sections 694, 695, 1039, and 1044.

7. Wills Ⓒ447—Construction causing gifts to vest favored.

In a case of ambiguity or inconsistency, the law favors a construction that will cause the gifts to vest, if the opposite construction will render it void, under Civil Code, §§ 1317, 1326.

8. Perpetuities Ⓒ6(1)—Question as to separate trusts in certain fund to be considered with reference to each share separately.

Where the several trusts created by will in fund to be accumulated are separable, the question of whether the power of alienation is suspended is to be considered with reference to each share separately.

9. Perpetuities Ⓒ9(7)—Invalidity of one trust created by will held not to affect validity of another trust.

Where will directed trustees to sell property, accumulate certain fund out of proceeds, and pay specified proportion of income therefrom to certain persons with remainder to her children upon her death either before or after accumulation of fund, the validity of such trust was not affected because of an invalid suspension of power of alienation of trust providing for payment of annuity to such person pending accumulation of such fund, in which such person's children had no vested interest owing to interest therein of other annuitants.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Josephine A. Phelps, deceased. From order on petition for distribution holding trust to be void and that deceased died intestate as to residue, W. F. Chipman and another, and Eugenie H. Schroeder separately appeal. Reversed, with directions.

See, also, 179 Cal. 816, 178 Pac. 849.

W. C. Sharpstein, Emilio Lastreto, and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

John L. McNab, Byron Coleman, and Henry L. Corson, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The fifth clause of the will of the testatrix devised the residue of her property, consisting wholly of real estate and embracing nearly the entire estate, to the executors as trustees in trust for certain purposes specified therein. Upon a former appeal in the matter of this estate this court held that the devise in trust was to be performed by the executors in their capacity as trustees and not in the course of their administration of the estate as executors. Estate of Phelps, 178 Pac. 846. As a consequence, the performance of the trust could not effectually begin until after the distribution of the estate. The present appeals result from the order of the court made upon a petition for such distribution. The court below held that the trust was void and that the decedent died intestate as to the residue, and thereupon distributed the estate to her legal heirs. From this order the persons named as trustees appeal in case numbered 9177, and Eugenie H. Schroeder, a sister of decedent and a beneficiary of the trust, appeals separately upon the record presented in case numbered 9210.

The general plan of the trust is that the trustees shall sell the property devised to them and pay the proceeds to certain beneficiaries. The first sales are to be applied to create a fund of $240,000, the income of which is to be paid to beneficiaries named, during their lives, and, upon death, to other persons designated. Out of the remainder is to be paid certain sums to designated beneficiaries in the order named, amounting in all to $280,600. Any of the fund remaining after the payment of these sums was to be paid to two sisters and a nephew of the testatrix.

The respondents' claim is that the will creates an unlawful restraint of alienation, a restraint forbidden by sections 715 and 716 of the Civil Code. Section 715 forbids the suspension of the absolute power of alienation by any limitation or condition, for a period longer than the continuation of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition. Section 716 provides that, if any future interest created operates to suspend the power of alienation as provided in section 715, it is void in its creation, and that such power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute interest in possession can be conveyed. The date of the death of the testatrix is deemed to be the time of the creation of the limitation upon alienation, if any was created. Civ. Code, § 749. The testatrix died in 1916, so the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 699) to section 715 does not apply. We have stated its effect as it stood before that amendment.

[1, 2] In considering the effect of the will it is necessary to bear in mind certain well-established rules of construction. The will must be given effect in accordance with the intention of the testator, as found from the language of the will, where it is clear, and, if it is ambiguous, from the language of the will aided by such extrinsic facts as may be admissible for that purpose. A will must be given an interpretation which will make it operative, rather than one which will render it inoperative, and an interpretation by which it disposes of the property dealt with is to be preferred to one which creates an intestacy. In order to explain the questions presented, it is necessary to set forth at some length the provisions of the trust clause of the will.

The trust clause first directed that the trustees should "lease until sold as hereinafter provided all of my real estate upon such terms as to them may seem best, and until the accumulation of the fund herein-after provided." The rentals and the income from all other sources were to be used to pay annuities, monthly, as follows: To Mrs. Lord and Mrs. Schroeder, her sisters, each the sum of $300; to Edward T. McLean, a brother, and his wife, jointly, $100; to her sister, Mrs. Swasey, and her brother Alfred, each $100. These annuities were to be continued only until the $240,000 fund should be accumulated from the proceeds of sales. With regard to this accumulation the clause then provides as follows:

"I direct my executors and trustees from time to time as sales of my estate may in their judgment be profitably made, to sell sufficient estate to yield a fund of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, and pending the accumulation of said fund, I direct my said executors and trustees to invest and keep invested such sums as may be derived from such sales, and to use the income in the payment of the above annuities. As soon as a fund of two hundred and forty thousand dollars has been accumulated, the same shall be invested and kept invested, and out of the net income derived therefrom there shall be paid to said annuitants monthly during their respective lives, in lieu of the annuities above provided, portions of said income as follows:

"(1) To my sister Virginia A. Lord three-eighths thereof. (2) To my sister Eugenie H. Schroeder three-eighths thereof. (3) To my brother Edward T. McLean and to his wife Mattie McLean jointly and to the survivor of them one-twelfth thereof. (4) To my sister Amanda A. Swasey one-twelfth thereof. (5) To my brother Alfred A. McLean one-twelfth thereof.

"In the event that any of my said sisters and brothers shall not be living at the time that said fund has been accumulated, or if then living shall afterward die, I direct my executors and trustees to pay out of said fund as follows."

It then directed that upon the death of Mrs. Lord three-eighths of the fund, or $90,000, should be paid to her heirs, and that upon the death of Mrs. Schroeder a like amount should be paid to her heirs. Upon the death of the survivor of Edward T. and Mattie McLean, $20,000 was to go in equal shares to the children then living, of said persons. Upon the death of Mrs. Swasey $20,000 was to go to the children of said sister then living. Upon the death of Alfred A. McLean, $20,000 was to go as follows: Five thousand dollars to Minnie McLean, his wife, if she were living, otherwise to the children of said Alfred A. McLean and his wife, then living, and $15,000 in equal shares to said children then living.

With respect to the excess above $240,000 the clause provided:

"From time to time as sales of my estate may in the judgment of my executors and trustees be profitably made, I direct my executors and trustees to convert my estate into cash, and after devoting sufficient of the proceeds thereof to the purposes specified in paragraph A of this article, to pay in the order named to the persons hereinafter named or to their heirs, in case of their death, except where otherwise provided, the sums set opposite their respective names."

Then follows a list of the beneficiaries and the amounts of the gifts amounting to the sum of $280,600, above mentioned. With respect to the remainder the provision is as follows:

"The remainder of my estate, exclusive of that described in the sixth and seventh articles hereof, shall be divided into three equal parts. One part thereof shall be paid to my sister Virginia A. Lord, if living, or to her heirs if dead; one part thereof to my sister Eugenie H. Schroeder, if living, or to her heirs if dead, and one part thereof to my nephew W. F. Chipman, if living, or to his heirs if dead."

The final paragraph of the trust clause is as follows:

"Although it is my intention to have all of my estate, with the exceptions already stated, converted into cash, I desire that my executors and trustees shall make sales with the sole object that my two sisters and my nephew above mentioned shall receive substantial sums out of the remainder of my estate. My estate at present valuations is ample for that purpose, and I do not wish it sacrificed to satisfy the importunities of those who, while dear to me, are not the first in my affections."

The part of the fifth clause relating to the annuities and the $240,000 fund is designated therein by the letter "A." The succeeding part is designated by the letter "B."

The fifth clause of the will creates five separate and distinct trusts: (1) The trust to convert the entire estate into money. (2) The provisional trust for the payment of the temporary annuities to the brothers and sisters until such time as the fund of $240,000 shall have been accumulated. (3) The trust in the fund consisting of the first $240,000 received from sales of the property, of which the income is to be divided between the brothers and sisters during their respective lives and upon their deaths, respectively, the remainder is to be given absolutely, in the same proportions, to their respective heirs or children. (4) The trust to pay the specific legacies amounting to $280,600. (5) The trust in the ultimate residue, if any, of the proceeds, which is to go to Mrs. Lord, Mrs. Schroeder, and W. F. Chipman. We will defer the discussion of the trust for the payment of the annuities until after our consideration of the other four trusts.

[3] The direction at the beginning of part B of the fifth clause applies to the whole of the trust property and is a direction for its conversion into money and the application of the proceeds to the three main objects of the testatrix, namely, the disposition of the $240,000 fund, the payment of the specific legacies, and the payment of any residue to the residuary legatees. It includes and provides for the sales to accumulate the first fund as well as the other funds necessary to carry out the desires of the testatrix, as expressed in the succeeding provisions. In such a case the "property and all its proceeds must be deemed personal property from the time of the testator's death." Civ. Code, § 1338.

[4] A devise to trustees, with directions to sell for the purpose of converting the estate into money to be applied in carrying out further trusts created in the proceeds and with power to sell immediately, does not occasion an unlawful suspension of the power of alienation, and "this is equally true where a future date is fixed for the exercise of the power if the donees are permitted to sell in the meantime in their discretion." Chaplin on Suspension, § 287. This was said by the learned author in discussing the effect of "powers in trust" authorized by the New York law on the subject. These provisions, in part at least, were originally carried into our Civil Code as section 860 and as sections 878 to 940, and they were all repealed in 1874. But the rule above stated does not depend on statutory provisions allowing the creation of "powers in trust to convey" and the like, but is founded on the fact stated by the author in the same section that, by the very terms of such a power, "there are persons in being who can convey absolutely." The rule is well settled in New York. Stewart v. Hamilton, 37 Hun, 19; Roberts v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 236; Van Veghten v. Van Veghten, 8 Paige, Ch. 104, 122; Underwood v. Curtiss, 52 Hun, 613, 5 N. Y. Supp. 478. In this state the same rule prevails. Estate of Heberle, 155 Cal. 723, 102 Pac. 735. In Stewart v. Hamilton the trustees were given power to sell, with the proviso:

"I enjoin my executors not to sell any of the real estate under three years, unless sold to advantage; sold on time to advantage."

It was held that, since the power to sell could be exercised at any time and was entirely in the discretion of the trustees, there was no unlawful suspension of the power of alienation. A similar cautionary injunction was given in Estate of Heberle, supra, and the conclusion was the same. See, also, Hagen v. Sacrison, 19 N. D. 160, 123 N. W. 518, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 724, and note. It is therefore clear that the terms of the directions for the sale of the property are valid and that they do not transgress the sections of the Code on the subject of suspension of the power of alienation.

[5] Concerning the fourth and fifth trusts above enumerated, those relating to the specific legacies and the ultimate residue after payment thereof, little need be said. Neither the payment of the specific legacies nor of the ultimate residue is dependent upon any event except the making of sales for sums sufficient to realize the necessary amount of money. The right to the legacies, both specific and residuary, vested immediately upon the death of the testatrix and were subject to alienation by the legatees at any time thereafter. They are not different in that respect from any other legacy that is dependent upon the amount of the estate from which they are to come. The terms of the will regarding them do not suspend the power of alienation.

[6] We are also of the opinion that the provisions of part A relating to the third trust do not unlawfully suspend the power. To illustrate this, the share of Mrs. Swasey and her children in the fund may be considered alone. The testatrix died on December 5, 1916. Mrs. Swasey died on December 7, 1918. The $240,000 fund is not yet accumulated. By this part of the trust clause she was to have, during her life, one-twelfth of the income to be derived from said fund after it was accumulated. The direction as to the remainder in said one-twelfth is that if she should die prior to the accumulation, or if then living should afterwards die, then, upon her death, the trustees, "out of said fund," should pay one-twelfth thereof to her children "who are then living," meaning those of her children who should be living at her death. The twelfth was to be paid to them out of the fund to be accumulated. There is no express direction that they should have anything until after the accumulation was complete. If their interest in said shares does not vest until the fund is accumulated and in the meantime they cannot alienate it absolutely, there would then be a suspension of the power of alienation of that share for a period beyond her life, and this is forbidden by section 715. But their interest vested upon her death.

"A future interest is vested when there is a person in being who would have a right, defeasible or indefeasible, to the immediate possession of the property, upon the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent interest." Civ. Code § 694.

"A future interest is contingent, whilst the person in whom, or the event upon which, it is limited to take effect remains uncertain." Civ. Code, § 695.

The persons who were to receive the share upon her death became fixed upon that event. They consisted of her children then living. The event upon which they were to take was the accumulation of the fund. As an event, this was certain to take place, but the time of its occurrence remains uncertain. The uncertainty of the time of the occurrence of an event, however, does not make an interest contingent; consequently, their interest is not contingent under section 695, but is vested as provided in section 694.

[7] This is also indicated by the language of the gift of the remainder to the children, in connection with the context. The payment to them, it is true, is to be made "out of the fund," and it might be contended that this indicates an intent that no title to the remainder was to vest until the fund should be on hand. But the terms of the gift also declare that the payment is to be made "upon the death of my sister Amanda A. Swasey," and the provision for the payment of the income from the fund states that the respective shares thereof are to be paid to the recipients named "during their respective lives." These phrases indicate very strongly an intent that the remainder in the respective shares were to vest in the children at the death of their respective parents. In a case of ambiguity or inconsistency the law favors a construction that will cause the gifts to vest, if the opposite construction will render it void. Chaplin on Suspension, §§ 178, 223, 515; Gray on Perpetuities, § 633; Civil Code, §§ 1317, 1326. We think these phrases when taken together show that the testatrix intended the respective sets of children to take a vested interest in the remainder immediately upon the death of the parent.

The effect of this part of the clause is that these children stand in the same position as the persons who are to take the specific legacies and the ultimate residue. They do not receive the interest until sufficient property is sold to accumulate the fund but their interest therein is now a vested interest and may be alienated as in the case of any other property. Civ. Code, §§ 1039, 1044. The enjoyment thereof is, of course, postponed until the fund is accumulated; but the postponement of the time of enjoyment of an interest does not suspend the power of alienation thereof, where no other person has in the meantime any interest in the property. Gray on Perpetuities, § 120; Chaplin on Suspension, § 394. The same conditions will arise upon the death of any of the other beneficiaries of the income of this fund, should they die prior to the accumulation. If they die subsequent thereto, the persons to take become fixed at that time and the power of alienation immediately arises at the end of the period allowed by law; that is, the termination of the life of a person in being at the death of the testatrix. Taking this part of the trust clause alone without qualification from the preceding provisions concerning annuities, it is clear that there is no unlawful suspension of the power of alienation.

[8] It is to be observed that the several trusts in the $240,000 fund are separable, and the question whether the power of alienation is suspended is to be considered with reference to each share separately. Gray on Perpetuities, §§ 389, 391.

[9] The remaining question is whether or not the provisions disposing of the remainders of the $240,000 fund are affected by the preceding directions for the payment of annuities to the brothers and sisters pending the accumulation of the fund. The preceding direction is that the entire net income of the estate, from whatever source accruing, including interest received on invested proceeds prior to the complete accumulation of the fund, is to be devoted to the payment of these annuities, amounting in all to $900 a month, and that, should the income of any month be insufficient to pay them in full, the annuities to Mrs. Lord and Mrs. Schroeder should be paid in full and the balance prorated among the others, but that, if afterwards the income became more than sufficient, those who had not received the full amount were to have the deficit made up to them out of the surplus. It would seem to follow, therefore, that during the period preceding the accumulation of the fund the other annuitants have an interest in the share of Mrs. Swasey's children, which, under the rules above stated, would prevent the vesting of said children's interest upon the death of their mother. The net income from the entire estate is by these provisions, in effect, sequestered for application to the payment of annuities to the survivors. Having the effect to prevent the vesting of the interests in the remainders, it would involve the suspension of the power of alienation of that share for the period between the death of Mrs. Swasey and the final accumulation of the fund. The two trusts are to that extent inconsistent. It is a typical case for the application of the rule stated in Nellis v. Rickard, 133 Cal. 622, 66 Pac. 32, 85 Am. St. Rep. 227, to the effect that where there are "several independent trusts, some of which are legal, while others are in contravention of the statute regulating uses and trusts or the statutes against perpetuities, the estate of the trustee will be upheld to the extent necessary to enable him to execute the valid trusts, and will only be void as to the illegal or invalid trusts." It is an application of rule stated in section 1317 of the Civil Code that where the intention of the testator cannot have effect to its full extent it must have effect as far as possible. The rule is also stated as follows:

"Where there are valid and invalid clauses in a will, the question whether the valid clauses can stand depends upon whether or not the invalid ones are so interwoven with them that they cannot be eliminated without interfering with and changing the main scheme of the testator." Estate of Pichoir, 139 Cal. 685, 73 Pac. 606, quoting from Estate of Fair, 136 Cal. 81, 68 Pac. 306.

See, also, Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 747, 81 Pac. 138.

A perusal of the trust clause shows that the preliminary portion providing for the annuities to the brothers and sisters temporarily until the accumulation of the fund was but a minor part of the main scheme of the testatrix. It is temporary in character, in the nature of a family allowance. It was intended merely to provide an income for them during the period of the settlement of the trust. The principal parts of the plan were to provide the fund of $240,000, to divide the income thereof among the brothers and sisters during their respective lives, and give the remainder to their children or heirs as specified; to pay the specific legacies mentioned in the succeeding clause and to the residuary legatees the ultimate residue. The preliminary scheme is not essential to the main plan, nor so interwoven with it that the two must stand or fall together. In such a case the part of the will which conflicts with the main scheme must give way so far as may be necessary to carry out the main scheme. The result is that the interest of the children of Mrs. Swasey in the sum of $20,000 must be deemed to have vested from her death, that they will be entitled to receive interest on that sum from that time until its final payment, and that the annuities to the surviving brothers and sisters must be paid out of the remaining part of the income after providing for interest on the sum due to the children of Mrs. Swasey. Similar results will follow upon the death of any other of the brothers and sisters prior to the accumulation of the fund.

Our conclusion is that the trusts created by the will are valid and enforceable, except as above stated; that the invalid part does not destroy the devise of the residue to the trustees; and that the court below should have made distribution thereof to said trustees. The trustees will have power after such distribution to make any adjustment rendered necessary to make up to the children of Mrs. Swasey, or to the children or heirs of any other brother or sister who may die before the accumulation of the fund, the amount of interest that may accrue upon their respective vested interests in the fund. The views we have expressed will be sufficient to guide them on this point in the administration of the trust. There is no disputed question of fact involved in the case. More than four years have passed since the death of the testatrix, and further delay is not necessary. It is a proper case for this court to exercise its power to direct the action of the court below.

The order of distribution is reversed, and it is ordered by this court that upon the going down of the remittitur herein the court below shall forthwith enter an order distributing to the several specific devisees and legatees the specific property devised and bequeathed to them by the will, and distributing the entire residue to the trustees named in the will to be held by them upon the trusts in said will declared.

PEOPLE v. WOLFF. (Cr. 2284.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1920.)

1. Infants § 68—Defendant under 18 may be prosecuted under general laws for offense of murder.

Under the Juvenile Court Law (Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 1770a, § 6), providing that magistrates shall suspend proceedings against defendants under 18 years of age, and in view of sections 1, 3, and 13, the juvenile court or the superior court acting as the same may remand such a defendant to the custody of the magistrate, sections 4c, 4d, respectively, providing that if upon the hearing of a petition the court shall determine that the person is not a fit subject to be dealt with according to the provisions of the act, and that no person under 18 shall be prosecuted until the matter has been submitted to the juvenile court seeming to contemplate prosecution of defendants under 18 according to general law, and hence the fact that defendant charged with murder, being under 18, was sent to the juvenile court will not prevent subsequent prosecution under the general laws.

2. Infants § 16—Attachment by magistrate of copy of complaint, etc., to certificate defendant is under 18 directory.

Requirement of Juvenile Court Law, § 6, that the committing magistrate, on finding defendant to be under 18, shall attach to the certificate, etc., a certified copy of the original deposition or complaint filed before him is merely directory, and failure to comply is not jurisdictional.

3. Criminal law § 104(4)—Objection that copy of complaint was not attached to magistrate's certificate of defendant's age held not shown by record.

Where the record did not show that the court made any order requiring the phonographic reporter to include in the transcript of his notes the certificate of the magistrate and proceedings remanding defendant, who was under 18, to the juvenile court, and by the juvenile court back to the magistrate, the reporter would not be authorized under Penal Code, § 1246, to include such papers, and the record is insufficient to present the objection that the magistrate did not attach to the certificate a certified copy of the original deposition or complaint when defendant did not make it a part of the record by bill of exceptions or special order of court.

4. Criminal law § 103(5)—Objection that copy of complaint was not attached to magistrate's certificate of defendant's age, not properly raised, will not be considered on appeal.

Objection that the committing magistrate, who certified defendant to the juvenile court as under 18, did not attach certified copy of original complaint can be made only by attack on the information or by motion in juvenile court to suspend proceedings, and, where not so raised, will not be considered on appeal by defendant from a conviction.

5. Jury § 103(14) — Juror's opinion from newspaper reports, which will yield to evidence, does not disqualify.

Under Penal Code, § 1076, a challenge for bias under section 1073, subd. 2, on the ground that jurors had formed opinions from newspaper articles, was properly overruled, where the jurors stated that they could disregard their opinions and render a verdict solely on the evidence.

6. Jury § 131(15)—Question by district attorney as to whether a juror would follow instructions not objectionable.

Where on voir dire examination, the district attorney asked a juror whether he would follow an instruction that the killing was done in an attempt to perpetrate a felony, there would be no option but to convict of murder in the first degree, was not objectionable as failing to inform the juror that guilt must be shown beyond all reasonable doubt, the purported instruction practically following the definition contained in Penal Code, §§ 187, 189, except for the omission of reasonable doubt, and it appearing that the district attorney repeatedly assured jurors the court would instruct that they could not convict unless satisfied of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the court did so instruct at considerable length.

7. Witnesses § 286(4)—Redirect examination of witness, who saw deceased after he had been assaulted and before death, held warranted.

Where defendant hired an automobile and then struck the driver on the head, robbed him, and appropriated the car, and a witness who testified to seeing the driver on a train after injury, but before death, was cross-examined, as to whether the driver could talk and what was said, redirect examination, wherein the witness' memory as to conversations with the decedent was refreshed by transcript of his testimony at the preliminary hearing, held warranted.

8. Criminal law § 419, 420(6)—Statements by decedent while on a train after the attack incompetent as hearsay.

In prosecution for homicide, testimony as to statements made by decedent after he had been assaulted and while he was riding on a train, should be excluded, obviously being hearsay and incompetent.

9. Criminal law § 1186(4)—Erroneous admission of evidence not prejudicial, where no miscarriage of justice.

In a homicide case, the erroneous admission of hearsay testimony as to statements by deceased concerning the assault was not prejudicial, where the same facts were abundantly established by other evidence, including defendant's own confession, so, as the admission of such evidence did not result in a miscarriage of justice, it did not warrant reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

10. Criminal law ⚖️404(4)—Locks of hair found in automobile driven by murdered man properly admitted.

Where defendant engaged deceased's automobile and struck deceased on the head with a hammer, robbed him, and appropriated the car, locks of matted hair, adhering to what appeared to be parts of the human scalp, were properly admitted, where it was testified that they were found in the automobile where defendant had abandoned it, and that they were the same as the color of decedent's hair, without further testimony that they were in the same condition as when taken from the automobile.

11. Criminal law ⚖️318—No presumption of change in locks of decedent's hair between time of discovery at scene of murder and trial.

There is no presumption that locks of hair taken from an automobile in which deceased was riding at the time the fatal injuries were inflicted on his head with a hammer were changed between the time they were discovered and the trial.

12. Criminal law ⚖️404(4)—Admission of locks of decedent's hair not erroneous, as tending to arouse passion.

Where defendant engaged deceased's automobile, and then struck him on the head with a hammer, robbed him and took the car, the admission of locks of human hair with pieces of scalp found in the car cannot be deemed erroneous, on the ground that it was calculated to arouse the passion and prejudice of the jury; there being nothing to show that such articles were introduced for an improper purpose.

13. Criminal law ⚖️822(1)—Instructions construed as whole.

Instructions, and particularly a single instruction, must be construed as a whole.

14. Criminal law ⚖️822(4)—Instructions in homicide case as to duty of jury not objectionable when construed as a whole.

Instructions in a homicide case that unless the jury did their duty laws might as well be stricken from the statute books cannot be deemed erroneous as a direction that the jury would be neglectful of their duty if defendant was not convicted, in view of the many statements of the rights of defendant, which were a part of the same instruction.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Roy Wolff was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Mahon and W. W. Laidley, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan and J. R. Dorsey, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Upon a charge by information the defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the first degree, and thereupon sentence of death was imposed upon him. The appeal is from the judgment of conviction.

In support of his appeal he urges seven grounds. We will consider them in the order in which they are presented.

[1] 1. At the time the defendant was brought before the magistrate for the preliminary examination upon the charge it was suggested in his behalf that he was under the age of 18 years at the time the crime was alleged to have been committed. The magistrate examined into the matter, and determined that he was less than 16 years of age at that time. Thereupon he suspended the proceedings and ordered the constable to take the defendant before the juvenile court of the county for its consideration under the Juvenile Court Law. In the superior court, by direction of the court a petition was filed by the probation officer to bring the defendant within the terms of the probation law. Section 3. Thereupon the court took evidence relating to the character of the defendant and the nature of the crime charged against him, and made an order finding that he was under the age of 21 years, but that he was not a fit subject for further consideration under the terms of the Juvenile Court Law, and adjudged that he be remanded to the justice's court in which the charge of murder was pending for further proceedings on said charge, and that the proceedings under the probation act be dismissed. All these proceedings were taken under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law. General Laws, p. 750, Act 1770a, § 6. Thereafter the magistrate proceeded with the preliminary examination, the defendant was duly committed, and the information upon which he was tried and convicted was then filed.

The claim is now made that under the provisions of the Juvenile Court Law, after the magistrate had determined that the defendant was less than 18 years of age and the matter then came before the superior court for proceedings under that law, the superior court was without power to remand him to the magistrate for further proceedings on the criminal charge. The claim is, in effect, that a person under 18 years of age cannot be prosecuted or punished for the crime of murder, and that he can be dealt with only as a ward of the juvenile court.

We do not think this proposition is sustained by the law. Section 6 provides that when, upon a charge of crime against a person, it shall appear to the magistrate that the defendant was under 18 years of age at the time the alleged crime was committed, he shall suspend the proceedings upon the charge and inquire into the age of the defendant, and if he finds that the defendant was under 18 he shall thereupon certify to the juvenile court the fact of such finding, and that proceedings have been suspended by reason thereof, and that thereupon all proceedings against the person on the charge shall be suspended until the juvenile court shall issue its mandate directing the magistrate to proceed with the examination or trial. It then provides that in the superior court, acting as a juvenile court, a petition shall be filed to bring the defendant within the provisions of the law, and "that if said judge of the juvenile court shall after such investigation decide that the person was at the time said offense was alleged to have been committed of the age of eighteen years or more, such determination shall be conclusive and he shall immediately issue his mandate directing the court before which such charge is pending to proceed therewith, and upon receipt of such mandate said court shall proceed with the examination or trial of said charge as though no suspension thereof had taken place; except that if said judge of the juvenile court shall find that the person so charged is under the age of twenty-one years, and a fit subject for consideration under the provisions of this act, he may make such order or orders hereunder as he may deem best in relation to such person; but if such judge shall at any time conclude that such person is not a fit subject for further consideration under this act, he may sit as a committing magistrate and hold a preliminary examination if such person is charged with a felony, or he may remand such person to the court in which said person is charged with said offense for further proceedings on said charge, and upon receipt of the mandate of said juvenile court, or the judge thereof, the court before which said charge is then pending shall be vested with full authority to proceed with the examination or trial thereof." The precise claim of the defendant is that under these provisions the magistrate of the juvenile court cannot remand the defendant to the magistrate for examination or trial unless he shall find that the defendant is over 18 years of age, and that it prohibits further proceedings by the magistrate upon the original charge, where the juvenile court shall find that he was under that age. To this we do not agree. The quoted passage must be read in connection with some of the preceding provisions of the act. Section 1 declares that—

"This act shall be known as the 'juvenile court law' and shall apply to any person under the age of twenty-one years."

It then describes 14 classes of persons who shall be subject to the provisions of the act, if under the age of 21 years. Class 13 includes any person "who violates any law of this state or any ordinance of any town, city, county, or city and county of this state defining crime." Section 4c of the act provides that if, upon the hearing of a petition for proceedings under the Juvenile Court Law as provided in section 3, the court shall determine "that any person alleged to come within the provisions of subdivision 13 of section 1 of this act, is not a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the provisions of this act, said court may dismiss the petition therein, and direct that said person be prosecuted under the general law." Section 4d provides that no person under the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of a crime shall be prosecuted for the crime until the matter has first been submitted to the juvenile court as in the act provided. These provisions clearly imply that a person under the age of 18 years may nevertheless be prosecuted for a crime, notwithstanding the fact that he has invoked the application of the Juvenile Court Law to his case. The provision of section 6, above quoted, taken in connection with the other provisions, can only mean that upon the hearing of a case which had been under examination before a magistrate upon a charge of crime and has been certified to the juvenile court because of the age of the defendant, if the juvenile court shall conclude that such person "is not a fit subject for further consideration under the act," it may remand him to the magistrate for examination or trial, regardless of the question whether he is over or under 18 years of age. This being the case, the magistrate would have jurisdiction as provided in the part of section 6 which we have quoted, to proceed with the examination and upon finding sufficient cause therefor to commit him upon the charge.

[2-4] 2. In certifying the cause to the juvenile court after finding that the defendant was under 18 years of age, the magistrate, it is claimed, failed to attach to the certificate a certified copy of the original deposition or complaint filed before him. Section 6 of the Juvenile Court Act provides that he shall do this. It is contended that this omission deprived the court of jurisdiction. We do not think the requirement was intended to be jurisdictional. The clause requiring such copy to be attached is obviously merely directory in character and effect, the object being to apprise the juvenile court of the nature of the charge. Furthermore, the objection is not properly in the record before us. The defendant should have made it a part of the record, either by a bill of exceptions or by some special order of the court. Section 1246 of the Penal Code enumerates minutely the papers which shall constitute the transcript on appeal. The certificate of the magistrate and proceedings remanding the defendant to the juvenile court, and by the juvenile court back to the magistrate for further action, are not thereby required or authorized to be made a part thereof. The record does not show that the court made any order requiring the phonographic reporter to include the same in the transcript of his notes. Without such order the phonographic reporter would not be authorized to include these papers in his transcript, and he has not done so. Moreover, there was no foundation upon which the objection can be raised on appeal. This objection would not, at most, constitute a ground of objection, except upon motion in the superior court to set aside the information or in the juvenile court to arrest the proceedings there upon that ground. It does not appear that any such motion was ever made. We do not intend to say that it would, even on such motion, be ground for setting aside the information. As the case stands, the defendant has waived the objection, even if it had any merit.

[5] 3. The defendant claims prejudicial error in rulings of the court overruling his challenges for cause to two of the jurors. The challenges were made on the ground of actual bias as defined in subdivision 2 of section 1073 of the Penal Code. Section 1076 provides that under such a challenge a person shall not be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, if it appear to the court, upon his examination that he can and will, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matter. Juror Heimforth, upon his examination, testified that he had read the newspaper accounts of the crime, and had therefrom formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, which it would take evidence to remove. Upon further examination, however, he stated that his opinion was formed entirely upon what he had read in the newspapers, that he had no other knowledge or information about the matter, and that, notwithstanding that opinion, he could, and would, if sworn as a juror, lay it aside, consider the case entirely upon the evidence produced in court, and act impartially and fairly in the case. Juror Blaisdell testified that he knew nothing of the case except what he had read in the newspapers, that he had formed an opinion therefrom which the evidence might remove, but that, notwithstanding the opinion, he could, and would, act fairly and impartially upon the charge against the defendant, and be guided solely by the evidence produced in court in arriving at a verdict. He further stated that he would retain the opinion until he heard the evidence, that after it had once gotten into his mind he could not put it out until something occurred to change it, but that he could go into the trial of the case presuming the defendant innocent, and depend entirely upon the evidence introduced and the instructions of the court in finding a verdict, and would not in any way permit the matter that he had read in the newspapers to influence his decision. The court, upon this testimony, was justified in holding that the jurors were qualified. A juror who has formed a tentative opinion in that manner will usually say that it will require evidence to change the opinion. That fact is not incompatible with ability to disregard such opinion entirely in weighing the evidence and to render a verdict solely upon that evidence. This psychological fact was recognized by the Legislature, and section 1076 was enacted to avoid the necessity of sustaining challenges for actual bias in such cases. Its effect is that this state of mind does not disqualify the juror, if, notwithstanding such mental condition, he can and will act impartially and fairly in the case.

[6] 4. During the examination of the jurors the district attorney put the following question:

"Well, supposing the court should further instruct you that if you find from the evidence that the killing was done, and that it was done by the defendant in an attempt to perpetrate or in the perpetration and commission of the felonies that I have mentioned, one of which was robbery, that you would have no option in the matter, but that you should find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, would you follow that instruction? A. Yes, sir."

Questions of somewhat similar purport were put to 11 other jurors who were examined.

Defendant claims that these questions were unfair because they did not advise the jury that the guilt must be shown to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and that the many repetitions of similar questions would leave the impression with the jury that the court would instruct them that the killing was done by the defendant in the perpetration of a felony. He assigns the putting of the questions as misconduct on the part of the district attorney. A reading of the entire examination shows that there was no misconduct. The district attorney in his questions to the jurors repeatedly stated that the court would instruct them that they could not convict the defendant of the charge unless they should be satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt from the evidence produced before them. The court did so instruct them at considerable length, and they must have clearly understood the rule. The question itself was plainly conditional, and did not assert that the court would so instruct them. The principle embodied in the question, aside from the proposition that the guilt must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, is but a restatement of the definition of murder contained in the Penal Code. Pen. Code, §§ 187, 189. It is substantially a repetition of the law as laid down in People v. Milton, 145 Cal. 169, 78 Pac. 549, and People v. Witt, 170 Cal. 107, 148 Pac. 928. It was not intended as a complete definition, and we need not say that it may be so considered, but in connection with the other questions put to the jurors we do not think that it constitutes misconduct, or that it could have prejudiced the defendant, especially in view of the fact that the court very fully instructed the jury with regard to the elements of the crime of murder. The question itself merely amounted to an inquiry whether or not the juror would follow the instructions of the court.

[7-9] 5. The defendant was charged with the murder of one Elmer Greer. The evidence showed that Greer was operating an automobile for hire; that on May 26, 1919, the defendant hired Greer and his automobile for a trip, and that while on the trip the defendant stealthily hit Greer on the head three times with a hammer. Each blow made a round indentation in the skull, forcing the bone into the tissue of the interior of the skull. From these wounds Greer died on May 29, 1919. On the trial one Delbert E. Bellus, on behalf of the prosecution, testified on direct examination that on May 26, 1919, he helped Greer aboard a train running from Maricopa to Bakersfield; that Greer then had wounds on the head; that he bathed Greer's head and face several times during the journey to Bakersfield, and there left him at the station. On cross-examination the witness was asked many questions as to the details of the journey to Bakersfield and the condition of Greer. The following is a part of the cross-examination:

"Did you talk with him at that time? A. Oh, some. Q. How was he as to his speech; was he rational or not? A. At first he was so weak he couldn't say much. All he could say was, 'I got an awful beating.' Q. He was able to talk? A. Yes; he could talk. Q. And you talked to him on the way in? A. Oh, some; I was in and out all the time."

In answer to other questions he said that Greer looked better by the time he got to Bakersfield and "talked better." On redirect examination the district attorney showed the witness a transcript of his testimony at the preliminary examination, to refresh his memory of the conversations with Greer, and asked:

"Would your memory be any better than it is now what Mr. Greer said at that time?"

To this the defendant's attorney objected on the ground that it was not proper redirect examination, and that it was cross-examination of the people's own witness. The objection was overruled. Thereupon the district attorney elicited testimony to the effect that Greer said that he had been hit on the head, referring to the beating. The witness was again asked to examine his previous testimony to refresh his recollection on the subject. To this the defendant repeated the previous objection, and added the objection that the testimony was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. The objection was overruled, and thereupon the witness, after reading his previous testimony, stated that Greer had informed him that he was hit on the head with a hammer, and that his money and automobile were taken away from him. On recross-examination he further testified that Greer told him that he did not know who had hit him. No other objection was made to this testimony, and no motion was made to strike it out.

The defendant claims that this was error, and that it was very prejudicial to his case. In view of the testimony on the cross-examination, it cannot be said that it was not within the scope of a fair redirect examination. But the statement of the witness on the cross-examination as to what Greer said was not technically responsive to the question, but was a voluntary statement. This point was not embraced in the objection. The evidence was obviously hearsay and incompetent, however, and the redirect examination should not have been allowed, if the proper objection had been made. But, however this may be, the evidence was not prejudicial. The truth of the statements by Greer to the witness was fully established by other uncontradicted evidence. After his arrest the defendant made a full and voluntary confession to the chief of police at Bakersfield, in which he stated the same facts that were elicited on the redirect examination objected to. They were also clearly proven by other satisfactory evidence circumstantial in nature, but not contradicted. The defendant did not testify in his own behalf and introduced no evidence tending to disprove his guilt. The other evidence of the defendant's guilt leaves it in no reasonable doubt. It is plain from the entire case that it did not result in a miscarriage of justice, and consequently, under section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, it would not be sufficient cause for reversal.

[10-12] 6. The court admitted in evidence two locks of matted hair adhering to something which appeared to be parts of a human scalp, together with testimony that they were found in Greer's automobile at Livingston Station near Merced, where defendant had abandoned it and had boarded the train for Oakland, the morning after the homicide.

Testimony was given to the effect that this hair was of the same color as the hair of Greer. The witness Corbett testified that he found the hair in the automobile soon after the defendant abandoned it, and that he gave the hair to Officer Pyles. Pyles produced the hair, and testified that Corbett had given it to him, that he had known Greer for a number of years, and that this hair was the same color as that of Greer. The locks of hair were then offered in evidence, and admitted over the defendant's objection that "no proper foundation had been laid." It is now claimed that it was error to admit this evidence without further evidence showing that its condition was the same at the time of its admission as it was when it was taken from the automobile, and that it was introduced in order to arouse the passion and prejudice of the jury. The defendant made no attempt to show that the hair was in a different condition at the time of its introduction in evidence from its condition at the time it was found, and it is not claimed that its natural color had been changed. There is no presumption that these articles had been changed in any way for any purpose, and we find nothing in the record to indicate that the district attorney introduced the evidence for any improper purpose. They were properly admitted.

[13, 14] 7. The court gave the following instruction:

"You are here, gentlemen, for the purpose of trying the issues of fact that are presented by the allegations in the information filed by the district attorney and the defendant's plea thereto. This duty you should perform, uninfluenced by pity for the defendant, or by passion or prejudice on account of the nature of the charge against him. You are to be governed therefore solely by the evidence introduced in this trial and the law as given by the court. The law will not permit jurors to be governed by mere sentiment, conjectures, sympathy, passion, or prejudice. A verdict founded upon sentiments of pity for the accused, or upon public opinion or public feeling, or upon passion or prejudice, or upon conjectures, would be a false verdict. You will not take counsel of them in deliberating upon your verdict. The importance of your duties requires that you consider the right of the people of the state of California to have the laws properly executed, and that it is with you, citizens selected from the county, that finally rests the duty of determining the guilt or innocence of those accused of crime, and unless you do your duty, laws may as well be stricken from statute books."

The defendant argues that the last sentence of the instruction, in effect, directed the jury that they should find the defendant guilty, and if they did not do so they would have neglected their duty. As a part of the same instruction and immediately following the above extract, the court said:

"You should also ever keep in mind the importance to the accused of the result of your deliberations and be just to him, as well as to the people of the state of California. Both the public and the defendant have a right to demand, and they do so demand, and expect, that you will carefully and dispassionately weigh and consider the evidence and the law of the case and give each your conscientious judgment; and that you will reach a verdict that will be just to both sides, regardless of what the consequences may be."

The instructions, and particularly a single instruction, must be considered as a whole. We cannot perceive wherein the court in this instruction in any respect misdirected the jury as to their duty, and we do not think that it could have been understood by the jury as a direction that they would have been neglectful of their duty if the defendant was not convicted.

The defendant does not claim that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the same. We have examined it, however, and find that it clearly establishes his guilt of a cold-blooded, mercenary, deliberate, and willful murder.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 8796.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1920.)

1. Insurance §130(7)—Counter offer of general agent upon receipt of application called for acceptance or rejection.

Where an employer of labor applied to a local agent of an indemnity company for a renewal of an expiring policy of insurance, covering liability for injury to employés, stating that he wanted the insurance even though the premium might be more than $15, and local agent in the application sent to the general agent inserted the premium as $10 the amount of the premium the preceding year, and the general agent wrote employer that a $15 minimum premium was required, and that employer should advise by return mail if such premium would be satisfactory, there was no contract of insurance until the employer accepted the counter offer of the general agent; there being no meeting of minds.

2. Master and servant §417(7)—Finding of facts in compensation case conclusive.

Findings of the Industrial Accident Commission under Workmen's Compensation Act upon questions of fact are conclusive, where there is any substantial evidence to support the award.

3. Master and servant ☞405(1)—Evidence insufficient to show contract of insurance prior to accident.

Evidence of employer in a proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act as to acceptance of counter offer of the indemnity company on receiving employer's application stating a certain minimum premium held not sufficiently definite upon which to base a finding that the employer accepted the counter offer prior to the accident.

4. Insurance ☞130(7)—Acceptance of terms granted by company completes contract before local agent communicates same to principal.

If an employer of labor accepts terms granted by indemnity company, the contract of insurance is complete, although the local agent has not communicated the acceptance to the company.

5. Master and servant ☞405(1)—Finding of authority of agent to bind indemnity company by parol held not sustained by evidence.

In a compensation proceeding involving liability of an indemnity company to an employer of an injured servant, evidence held insufficient to support a finding that a local agent of the indemnity company had authority to bind the company by parol from application.

6. Master and servant ☞405(1)—Finding of custom that assured was covered from date of application not sustained by evidence.

In a proceeding under Workmen's Compensation Act, a finding that it was the custom and the practice that an employer was covered by insurance from the date of his application, where the terms of the application were not unconditionally accepted by the company, held not supported by the evidence.

7. Insurance ☞129—General agent without authority to issue policy to cover known loss.

The general rule is that whenever the parties have entered into a contract before loss occurs or the policy has been issued, unless the authority of a general agent is expressly delimited, the policy, when issued, by operation of law relates back to the application and is dated accordingly, the policy being thereafter merely evidence of the contract, but such general rule has no application where the parties were not under contract at the time of loss, and the general agent is without special authority to issue a policy to cover the loss.

Wilbur, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding by Ethel Lamb, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to obtain compensation for the death of her husband, John Lamb, opposed by M. B. Pond, the employer, and the Western Indemnity Company. There was an award of compensation, and the Indemnity Company brings certiorari. Award annulled.

E. F. Conlin, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, appearing specially and not otherwise, for respondent Ethel Lamb.

Christopher M. Bradley and A. E. Graupner, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is a writ of review issued upon the application of petitioner, the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation. The Industrial Accident Commission, on April 23, 1918, made an award in the sum of $2,596.14 against the petitioner and in favor of Ethel Lamb, for the accidental death of her husband, John Lamb, an employé of Dr. Pond, of Napa county, it having been found by the commission that petitioner was the insurance carrier of Dr. Pond at the time of the injury. It appears that Dr. Pond had been engaged in operating a small farm and fruit orchard some 10 or 12 miles from the city of Napa. John Lamb was employed on the place as a man of all work, and, although that kind of occupation does not fall within the Workmen's Compensation Act, both Dr. Pond and Lamb nevertheless elected to come under its provisions.

On October 2, 1917, Lamb took a team of horses used on the place to a blacksmith shop in the city of Napa to be shod. About noon, as he was taking the horses out of the shop, they became unmanageable and trampled upon him, inflicting injuries from which he died on October 6.

The principal contention of petitioner is that it was not the insurance carrier of Dr. Pond when the accident occurred, and in this connection petitioner makes the claim that the following findings of the commission are without support in the evidence:

"(6) That prior to the said 2d day of October, 1917, and on or about the 24th day of September, 1917, the defendant M. B. Pond had applied to Arthur H. Smith of Napa, the duly accredited and authorized agent of the defendant Western Indemnity Company, for a renewal of a then expiring policy of insurance covering his liability for injury to his employés, and had requested said agent to procure for him such policy, to take effect upon the expiration of his then existing policy, which would expire on September 25, 1917. That at that time it was the custom and the practice that an assured was covered by the insurance subsequently provided in the policy, from the date of his application. That after the application by said defendant Pond, and before the said 2d day of October, 1917, said defendant Pond was notified by said agent Smith that the premium or rate of said insurance had increased, the exact amount of such increase being at that time not known to said agent. That thereupon said defendant Pond stated his willingness and consent to pay the increased rate, and again requested that the policy be issued. That thereafter, and on or about the 10th day of October, 1917, the gen- eral agents of said Western Indemnity Company duly issued their policy of insurance dated the 25th day of September, 1917, to the said defendant Pond, insuring him against his liability for injuries to his employes, and that on the 10th day of October, 1917, said defendant duly paid to said agent Smith the full premium for said insurance, which premium was duly received and accepted by said agent. (7) That by reason of the facts as set forth in paragraph 6 hereof, the defendant Western Indemnity Company was the insurance carrier of said defendant employer at the time of said injury, and had insured said employer against liability for full compensation for said injury, and said employer is entitled to be relieved from such liability under the provisions of subdivision (e) (2) of section 30 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917."

The evidence will sufficiently appear in the discussion.

Arthur H. Smith, doing business under the name of "Arthur H. Smith & Co." in the city of Napa, was engaged in placing insurance for various companies, including the Western Indemnity Company. Upon the filing by petitioner with the state insurance commissioner of "a duplicate power of attorney" on July 1, 1917, a license was issued to Smith for the term of one year in compliance with the provisions of section 633 of the Political Code. The license gave Smith authority "to solicit applications for insurance or surety bonds or to effect insurance or surety bonds in the name of said company." This power of attorney was not introduced in evidence, but we shall assume that it corresponded with the license.

In September, 1916, Smith secured for Dr. Pond a policy of compensation insurance in "the Massachusetts Company." That policy expired on September 25, 1917. On September 24, 1917, Dr. Pond went to the office of Smith, and "verbally" requested that such policy be "renewed." There is a dispute in the testimony of Dr. Pond and Smith as to whether on this occasion Dr. Pond saw Smith personally or dealt with an employe in Smith's office. Dr. Pond testified that—

"Some time in September, I think after the 15th, I received a letter from Mr. Smith stating that my policy terminated, * * * asking me * * * if I wanted a renewal. I gave the letter to Mr. Smith when I went, and ordered a renewal of insurance. I left it as a reminder. * * * He says, 'The premium will be raised.' I was informed that the last premium would be $10 for farmers, and it would be probably $15. * * * Any discussion we had was simply his statement to me that it would be probably not less than $15, and I told him to go ahead. I wanted to be insured even if it was more. He told me right on the start it would probably be that much, 'possibly more,' is the way he put it."

Smith was asked:

"At the time you took that application from Dr. Pond, was there any question about the issuance of a policy on account of the premium—minimum premium?"

And he answered:

"You will have to ask the young lady in the office. She did that work that day. I was not in. * * *"

Smith also testified that the general agent had informed him in a letter of June 29, 1917, that the premium rate for compensation insurance would be $10 "at least temporarily," and that—

"The first notice I had that the minimum premium on farm labor policies had been raised by petitioner was when this application was referred to in this case as being $15."

Smith stated further that, as the Massachusetts Company had discontinued writing compensation insurance, on September 24 he forwarded to the general agent a written application for coverage for Dr. Pond to begin on September 25, 1917, the application being signed by Smith alone, and in item 14 thereof, opposite the printed words "the minimum premium for this policy," appearing the figures "$10.00." This application was received on September 25 in the office of the general agent, Arthur G. Nason, who conducted the agency as "Arthur G. Nason & Co." In due course Smith received an answer to the application under date of September 26 to the effect that the minimum premium on farm labor policies was $15, and stating:

"We shall hold the application pending receipt of your advices as to whether or not we may write at this rate."

On September 29 Smith wrote to Dr. Pond:

"We are in receipt of a letter from the company stating that the least they can write a compensation policy on farm labor is $15 minimum premium. Kindly advise us by return mail if this is satisfactory to you."

There is a further lack of agreement in the testimony of Dr. Pond and Smith as to what occurred after September 24. Smith testified as follows:

"Q. Did you not see him between September 24 and October 2? A. Me? No. * * * Q. Do you know whether he came to your office during that interval? A. I couldn't say. Q. Was it reported to you that he had been in there? A. No. I don't recall it if it was. * * * Q. Then he didn't answer your letter of September 29 until after the accident on October 2? A. That is right. * * * Q. Did you see him on the afternoon of October 2? A. I did. * * * In my office. * * * He said it would be all right at the $15 premium. * * * Q. When Dr. Pond did call on you on October 2 did you then know that this accident had occurred? A. I did."

Dr. Pond's testimony is less definite as to when, after September 24, he talked with Smith about the matter:

"Q. And did you return afterwards to Mr. Smith's office for your insurance policy, * * * and on what date? A. I can't say as to the first time—the date—but I went and had a talk with Mr. Smith, and he said it was all right. * * * Q. When did you go back to Mr. Smith after requesting that he have the policy renewed? Was it before or after October 2d? A. Well, my memory is this: that I had another talk with Mr. Smith after ordering a renewal, when he told me that it would be at least $15. 'Well, it might be more,' he said. 'Well,' I said, 'I will draw you a check for $15, it doesn't make any difference. If it is more, I will give you more, and if it is less you can refund it.' He said, 'It would not be less.' On October 2d I called again on Mr. Smith and again tendered money which he refused because he did not know exactly what it would be. He had written me a letter, and I think it was dated the 29th of September, that it would be $15. Whether I called between the 29th and the 2d day of October, the date of the accident, I don't remember positively. Q. But on October 2d, was it after the accident that you called at Mr. Smith's office? A. It was. * * * Q. When did you receive that letter, Doctor? A. I can't tell you exactly. I don't know. Q. But after you received that letter, you called on Mr. Smith, did you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that was after the accident had occurred? A. I think I called on Mr. Smith before. I am not positive. I called immediately on receiving the letter. * * * Q. Did you get it before or after the accident? A. I am not positive. I went immediately when I did receive it to Mr. Smith, but I can't say positively whether it was before the accident or after. Q. Then, immediately upon receiving the letter—you received it before the accident—you went to Mr. Smith? A. Yes, sir. My impression is that I did. Q. Did what? A. That I did go to Mr. Smith before the accident to tell him it was all right, verbally. My impression is that, but I wouldn't say positively. * * * Q. You are not sure before the accident or after? A. I am not sure. * * * I think so, but I am not positive. Q. You have testified very clearly that you went to Mr. Smith's office after the accident on October 2? A. Yes. Q. But it is not clear in your mind whether you had the conversation at that time with Mr. Smith about the minimum premium of $15 or not? A. No, I am not, but mind you, before that Mr. Smith had told me that would probably be $15 and probably more—before that time."

On the afternoon of October 2, after Dr. Pond had called on Smith and they were both aware of the injury to Lamb, Smith wrote the following letter to the general agent:

"In answer to your favor of the 26th of September in regard to application of Milo B. Pond, would ask that you kindly issue policy at the $15.00 minimum."

No mention of the accident was made in this letter. On October 3 Smith wrote again to the general agent:

"We herewith inclose you report of accident to John Lamb, employed by Dr. M. B. Pond. Kindly give this your attention."

Before the receipt of this letter, and in response to that of October 2, the office of the general agent issued a policy at the $15 rate and dated it October 3. This was received by Smith on October 4. On October 5 he sent the following letter to the general agent:

"We herewith return you policy No. CC-14425, Milo B. Pond, as you have made an error in dating same. Under date of September 24, 1917, we sent you application asking you to issue the policy, and under date of September 26th you wrote us advising us of the increase in the minimum charge and also stating that you would hold the application pending receipt of our advices. Kindly issue this policy from date of application."

No written reply was made to this letter, but Smith testified that the date of the policy was changed from October 3 to September 25, while he was in the office of the general agent on October 8 or 9. From the testimony that follows it would appear that the actual date of this meeting and the alteration of the policy was October 9. A report of the results of the post mortem examination was forwarded from Smith's office to the general agent on the last-mentioned date. On October 10 Dr. Pond paid the $15 premium to Smith, who issued a receipt therefor and delivered the policy to him.

Charles M. Wilson, manager of Nason's office, and head of the indemnity insurance department thereof, testified that Smith himself called at the office in San Francisco about October 9, and claimed that Dr. Pond's policy had been incorrectly dated; that on this last-mentioned occasion the witness examined the records of the office, and found that Russell B. Adams, an "underwriter and clerk" in the office, had changed the date of the original application to October 3; that, "as a matter of custom" he, without consulting the general agent or any of his staff, then changed the date of the policy to conform to the time of the receipt of the application—September 25—and delivered the policy with the altered date to Smith. Wilson then knew that "Dr. Pond had an accident to one of his employes."

Nason himself testified that he did not learn of the accident until "after October 3."

* * * The first that came to my attention was that I was informed that the claim adjuster was called upon by Mr. Wilson to go to Napa to attend the coroner's inquest.

* * * That was the first that I knew.

* * * Q. As a matter of fact, you are not familiar with the details of your office? A. Absolutely not. Q. You left it to your manager, did you not? A. Yes; unless some trouble arose over a matter I wouldn't interfere at all."

The following testimony was given by Russell B. Adams:

"Q. State whether or not on behalf of Arthur G. Nason & Co. you accepted said application * * * from * * * Dr. Milo B. Pond. A. The application was not accepted. Q. Please state what action you took upon the said application. * * * A. On receipt of the application I noted the premium specified was not up to our charge. A letter was written by me to Smith advising of this, and saying the application would be held pending his advices. Q. In acknowledging the said letter from * * * Smith * * * state whether or not it was your intention as representative of * * * Nason * * * to hold * * * Dr. Pond covered under a policy. A. It was not my intention to cover the risk. Q. Please state what your intentions were as to the said application. A. To hold it until advised by our agent as to whether the insurance was desired at the higher rate. Q. Was it at any time subsequently to the receipt of the application your intention to bind or consider said application of any force or effect, or as constituting any insurance covering Dr. Pond? A. No. * * * No instructions were ever given me to bind this risk or to write a policy. Q. In issuing a binder for such policy * * * what has been your custom while employed by Nason? A. A record of risks bound was kept by Nason. The name, date covered, and nature of covering was always kept. Q. Please state fully what course you would have taken had you intended * * * to hold Dr. Pond covered under a policy. * * * A. A binder would have been issued and recorded as above; in any case there would have been a record of any covering granted."

The respondents in their reply to petitioner's supplemental brief take a different position with regard to the evidence as to when Dr. Pond expressed his willingness to accept the $15 rate from that stated in their first brief. It is insisted in their last position that—

"At the time of the application for a renewal Dr. Pond was told by Mr. Smith that the premium would be raised, and that it would be probably $15 as a minimum. Dr. Pond thereupon informed Mr. Smith that the amount of the premium was immaterial—that he wanted a policy. * * * Respondents contend that this made a complete meeting of minds on the only issue—the premium."

From this it is argued that the letter of September 29 "was superfluous, and should not in any way be considered in this cause, for the reason that Smith had already been told by Dr. Pond that he wanted the policy regardless of the amount of the premium." (Italics ours.) In their first brief respondents state that—

"On September 24, 1917, Pond applied to Smith at Napa for a policy. * * * *There may or may not have been some discussion between Smith and Pond * * * concerning the premium * * * at the time the application was made. It is immaterial.* * * * The offer of Dr. Pond when it reached the office of the general agent * * * was refused. * * * The petitioner made a new offer to extend coverage to Dr. Pond * * * at an increased price. * * * This offer of petitioner is contained in the letter to Smith * * * under date of September 26 * * * and in the letter from Smith to Dr. Pond under date of September 29. The offer thus made by petitioner was never at any time withdrawn. Indisputably it was accepted by Dr. Pond. * * * What happened in the interim is of no consequence." (Italics ours.)

We do not agree with respondents, as will appear from our discussion, that the letter of September 29 was "superfluous," or that "it is immaterial" what discussion was had on September 24. One reason for setting forth at length the variant positions of respondents is that our interpretation of the findings on this point may appear more clearly. The use of the relative terms "before" and "after" in the sentence relating to the notification to Dr. Pond of the increased rate precludes the idea that the commission meant to find that there was a meeting of minds on September 24. As already shown, Smith's testimony was that he personally had only one interview with Dr. Pond about the rate—after the accident on October 2. We shall assume, for the purposes of this discussion, that the commission found that Smith did discuss the rate with Dr. Pond on September 24. Dr. Pond is less definite as to the number of times he canvassed the premium rate with Smith, but we think his testimony indicates that he meant to convey the impression that he saw Smith three times: (1) on September 24; (2) on a later date before Smith had received the letter of September 26; and (3) after Dr. Pond had received the letter of September 29—but as to this he would not say definitely whether it was before or after the accident. Indeed, Dr. Pond did not testify definitely to any date except October 2, when he called at Smith's office after Lamb was injured. There is further disagreement in the testimony in that Smith stated that he did not know of the increased rate until he received the letter of September 26, while Dr. Pond claims that the higher premium was discussed when he ordered the "renewal."

[1] We have said that the finding cannot be interpreted to mean that the contract was concluded on September 24, nor do we think it can be ascertained therefrom when, according to the commission, Dr. Pond consented to the rate. And, unless the conjunctive "thereupon" connotes an interval between the notification and the consent, it cannot be determined whether the commission found that the rate was agreed upon before or after the injury. Do the findings refer to the second occasion mentioned in Dr. Pond's testimony? The plausible theory is that they do. The word "thereupon" could properly have reference only to an occasion where there was at once a proposal and an acceptance. The term would not describe either of the other occasions. Considered in connection with the statement that he "again" requested that the policy be issued,

"thereupon" indicates that he accepted the rate immediately, and "again" connects up with the original request for a "renewal." And, as further supporting this theory, is the circumstance that, according to the same finding, Smith did not then know what the amount of the premium would be. We think it clear that the finding does not refer either to the first or to the third occasion mentioned in the testimony of Dr. Pond. The word "thereupon" could not allude to the interval—however brief it may have been—between the receipt by Dr. Pond of the letter of September 29 and the interview which followed in Smith's office. Moreover, it is shown by the letter of September 29 that when Smith sent it he did know "the exact amount of such increase." It is also to be noted that in the sentence we are discussing the phrase found in the preceding sentence—"and before the 2d day of October"—is significantly missing. In our opinion it was important for the commission to find whether Dr. Pond accepted the rate on the first, the second, or the third of these occasions, for if it was upon the first or second occasion we should be obliged to declare that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Upon the receipt of the application, whatever the scope or extent of Smith's authority may have been—and we shall consider this later—the matter of the rate was taken out of his hands by the letter from the general agent of September 26, which constituted a counter offer. So that, up to the time Dr. Pond accepted the counter offer, there was no meeting of minds on one of the elements of the contract. This would be true even if the testimony of Dr. Pond was accepted by the commission that he stated on the first occasion he wanted the insurance, though the premium might be more than $15, or when he was in Smith's office on the second occasion, for upon the counter offer he was called upon either to accept it or to reject it definitely. We must conclude, therefore, that the commission based its findings on the first or second occasion, or both, and not upon the period following the receipt by Dr. Pond of the letter of September 29, although if the findings did relate to the last occasion we are not to be understood to say that the evidence would be sufficient. We are fortified in this conclusion by the testimony of Dr. Pond himself. He admits that he went to Smith's office after the injury. He does not say that he called at any other time on October 2, or that he was in the office more than once after he got the letter. Nor is his testimony definite as to whether he received the letter before or after the accident. We are not losing sight of his testimony that he reported to Smith "immediately" on receipt of the letter; that he thought he received it and saw Smith before Lamb was hurt; that on the second occasion he offered and Smith refused his check; that his purpose in going to Smith's office on October 2 was again to tender the premium and receive the policy; and that "I did go to Mr. Smith before the accident to tell him it was all right verbally." But, in any event, in our opinion the evidence would not support a finding that Dr. Pond accepted the rate at any time prior to the afternoon of October 2.

[2, 3] It is well settled that the findings of the commission upon questions of fact are conclusive where there is any substantial evidence to support the award. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721; Mass. B. & I. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 176 Cal. 488, 168 Pac. 1050. Upon the question of fact we have been discussing, however, taking into account all the pertinent evidence bearing on the point, the apparently consistent and convincing testimony of Smith—supported as it is by the correspondence and the sequence and import of events concerning which there is no dispute, the uncertain testimony of Dr. Pond in most particulars—especially in respect to the time when he acted upon the letter of September 29, and the lack of clearness and definiteness in the findings on the conflict in the evidence—if it can be said that the evidence is really involved in conflict as to the time of his acceptance, we are constrained to declare that, even if the findings are to be interpreted as meaning that Dr. Pond had accepted the counter offer prior to the accident, they are, nevertheless, without support in the evidence. We are not prepared to say, however, that if Dr. Pond had, with some regard for certainty and precision, fixed his acceptance as of a time prior to the casualty we would set aside the finding. We do not think that his testimony can be said to contradict that of his own witness, Smith, on the point that it was sufficiently definite to raise a conflict, or, if there was a conflict, that the findings in any true sense resolved it.

[4] Having reached the conclusion that a contract was not concluded prior to the injury, we shall now dispose of petitioner's objection to the finding that Smith was the agent of the company in the transaction. It is claimed in the brief of petitioner that—

"Smith had not been given, and did not have, and never attempted to exercise any power or authority over the policies of the company, except to receive and deliver the same, * * * and at no time did he have or claim that he had the right to fix the rate or to execute, issue, sign, countersign, or modify a policy issued by this company. * * *"

Smith testified that he was the agent of petitioner, and not of Dr. Pond. If this be true it might be held that if Dr. Pond had, prior to the accident, notified Smith of his acceptance of the counter offer the contract would thereupon have been completed, notwithstanding that Smith did not communicate such acceptance to his principal before the loss occurred. "If the applicant accepts the terms granted by the company the contract is considered complete, without waiting for the local agent to communicate the acceptance to the company." Cooley, Briefs on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 424. See, also, Taylor v. Merchants', etc., Co., 50 U. S. (9 How.) 390, 13 L. Ed. 187; Carter v. Bankers' L. I. Co., 83 Neb. 810, 120 N. W. 455; Joyce on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 230. But on this question it must be kept in view, as tending to show that in the mind of at least one of the parties the contract was not complete, that Smith waited until he heard from Dr. Pond concerning the counter offer before ordering the policy, and that when he did hear from him he promptly notified the general agent.

[5] It is to be noted, however, that the commission did not in its findings determine the character and scope of Smith's authority as agent for petitioner, and this renders it necessary next to consider whether he could bind petitioner by a parol contract of insurance. Smith testified that "binders" were used in San Francisco, but not in Napa; that he issued none in this instance, but that he had been "advised by Mr. Nason and Mr. Wilson * * * that before the policy is issued the applicant is covered * * * from the date of the application." Smith's own position—erroneously assumed, as we shall see—was that coverage was effected from the date of the application, notwithstanding the contract was not completed before the loss. Wilson, when he was asked whether Smith was "authorized to bind the company from the date of the application, * * *" answered, "I don't know." Nason's position was stated as follows:

"Q. Is it your custom during that interim [between the original application and the final acceptance or rejection thereof] to consider the man or the assured covered? A. Not unless a binder is given."

Dr. Pond testified:

"Q. But on October 2d, was it after the accident you called again at Mr. Smith's office? A. It was. Q. And did Mr. Smith at that time tell you that the policy had been applied for or had been issued? A. He told me it had not only been applied for, but I was perfectly secured. * * * Q. Did he tell you positively that he had made application to the insurance company for you to have a policy issued in your favor? A. Showed me a copy of the application. Read it to me to show that I was secured. * * * Q. Doctor, did Mr. Smith tell you you were wholly covered? A. Yes. Q. And you never considered that you did not have any insurance? A. I never questioned it for a moment."

From this testimony it would appear that Smith did not give assurances of coverage to Dr. Pond until after the accident. This is in accord with the former's testimony, for, as already shown, he said he saw Dr. Pond only once—on the afternoon of October 2. Smith also testified that he had not been in the habit of issuing policies for petitioner, and that the invariable custom was to send the applications to the general agency, where the policies were issued and forwarded to him for delivery. We shall assume that Smith was, for certain purposes at least, petitioner's agent; but neither in the testimony we have just quoted, nor elsewhere in the record, is there a particle of evidence to indicate that he had authority to bind petitioner by parol. Hence, even if the commission had meant so to convey by its finding that Smith was "the duly accredited and authorized agent of * * * Western Indemnity Company," and if Smith had given assurances of coverage to Dr. Pond before the injury—and not afterwards—as the fact seems to be, still such a finding would be without support in the evidence.

[6] We turn now to the question whether the finding "that it was the custom and the practice that an assured was covered by the insurance, subsequently provided in the policy, from the date of his application," may be sustained. We cannot determine from the record whether the commission intended to find that such "custom and practice" was followed as well when the contract of insurance was not concluded before a loss as when it was. If the former, from the conclusion we have already reached as to when the contract was completed, we must hold that the finding is not supported by the evidence. In addition to Smith's testimony that he was advised by the general agent and Wilson that an applicant was covered from the date of his application, he stated that in all the policies he had received from the company the date corresponded with that of the application, but he admitted that he had never, except in this instance, sent in an application to petitioner whose terms were not acceptable. Wilson's testimony corroborates that of Smith on the point that the policies sent to him had always borne the date of the application, so as to provide coverage from the beginning, but he does not state that such custom and practice were observed where the terms of an application were not unconditionally accepted by the company. The testimony of Nason and Adams, which we have quoted, tends to show positively that this custom and practice did not prevail in such circumstances. It seems to us that this finding is without support in the evidence.

It only remains to consider whether, where the loss has occurred before the parties had come to an understanding upon the terms of the contract, the general agent has authority to issue a policy so as to cover the uncovered loss. The cause was argued before this court and submitted for decision. The submission was subsequently vacated, and the cause set for further argument upon the questions:

"(1) As to the authority of the general agent of a foreign insurance company after a loss not amounting to a total loss has occurred to the knowledge of the agent, to deliver a policy of insurance antedated so as to cover the loss, there being at the time no binding agreement for the insurance between the insured and the company; and (2) as to the authority in the particular case of Wilson, the employé of the general agent, to make such delivery on behalf of the general agent, assuming that the general agent had himself such authority."

After the above order of resubmission the respondent commission filed a supplemental brief in which, among other points, it is urged that "the actions of the employés of Nason Company were the actions of Nason Company," and in support of the contention the following authorities are cited: International Trust Co. v. Insurance Co., 71 Fed. 81, 17 C. C. A. 608; Mound City Ins. Co. v. Huth, 49 Ala. 529; Electric Ins. Co. v. Fahrenkrug, 68 Ill. 463; Continental Ins. Co. v. Ruckman, 127 Ill. 364, 20 N. E. 77, 11 Am. St. Rep. 121; Mayer v. Ins. Co., 38 Iowa, 304, 18 Am. Rep. 34; Bodine v. Ins. Co., 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566. But we do not deem it necessary to discuss this point, and we shall, therefore, proceed on the assumption that the acts of Wilson and Adams stand as the acts of the general agent just as if Smith had dealt directly with him.

The policy was introduced in evidence, and contained the following provisions:

"K. No assignment or change of interest and no change, waiver, or extension of any of the terms or conditions of this policy shall be valid, unless indorsed hereon and signed by an officer of the company, nor shall notice to any agent or any other person be held to effect a waiver or change in any part of the policy. * * * M. The term of this policy shall be twelve months from October 3, 1917, beginning and ending at twelve o'clock noon, standard time, at the assured's business address stated herein."

It is contended by petitioner that as Nason, according to his own testimony, was not an officer of the company, the alteration of the date of the policy was not binding on petitioner, the policy did not cover liability prior to October 3, and therefore petitioner was not the insurance carrier of Dr. Pond at the time of the accident. But, as the decisive question here is whether the general agent had authority to issue a policy covering a known loss, rather than whether he was authorized to alter a policy properly issued in the first place, we are not called upon to discuss the provision in clause K.

[7] The general rule covering this question is thus stated in Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, vol. 1, at page 354:

"It may * * * be regarded as elementary that an agent has no authority to insure goods which he knows to have already been destroyed by fire."

And this rule finds support in the following cases: Mead v. Phenix Ins. Co., 158 Mass. 124 [32 N. E. 945]; Clark v. Ins. Co., 89 Me. 26 [35 Atl. 1008, 35 L. R. A. 276]; Stebbins v. Ins. Co., 60 N. H. 65. And in Waterloo Lumber Co. v. Ins. Co., 158 Iowa, 563, 138 N. W. 504, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 539, the court said:

"It has frequently been held that an agent has no authority to insure property already destroyed. * * *"

See, also, Bentley v. Columbia Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 421; 28 Cent. Dig. p. 703; 11 Dec. Dig. Ins. § 127. The principle laid down in these authorities is equally applicable to compensation insurance.

Whether or not the insurer, under all the circumstances, could have issued a policy which covered the loss—either total or partial—the authorities we have cited sustain the proposition that, unless there is a subsisting contract of insurance when the loss occurs, a general agent, in the absence of express authority, has no power to issue a policy. We think it has been made clear that in this case there was no contract in force at the time of the injury. One was written on the day following the loss, but was never "issued" until it was delivered to Smith on October 9. Before that time the date of the application had been changed from September 25 to October 3, and the policy from October 3 to September 25.

The following cases are cited in the brief filed by the respondent commission in support of the proposition that a general agent has authority to issue a policy covering a known loss and binding on his principal: New York Ins. Co. v. Russell, 77 Fed. 103, 23 C. C. A. 43; Insurance Co. v. Colt, 87 U. S. (20 Wall.) 560, 567, 22 L. Ed. 423; Eames v. Home Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. Ed. 298; Schultz v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (C. C.) 77 Fed. 374, 392; Kennebec v. Insurance Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 204; Warner v. Insurance Co., 14 Wis. 345; Komula v. Gen. Assurance Co., 165 Wis. 520, 162 N. W. 919. These authorities are distinguishable from the case here in that in each of them, prior to the loss, the insured had signified his acceptance of the terms offered by the insurance company, and thus a contract of insurance had been concluded. No authority has been cited, and we are aware of none, holding that a general agent, unless specially authorized, may issue a policy for a known loss, where the terms of the contract of insurance had not already been settled upon.

The general rule is that whenever the parties have entered into a contract before the loss occurs or the policy has been issued, unless the authority of the general agent is expressly delimited, the policy, when issued, by operation of law relates back to the application, and is dated accordingly—the policy being thereafter merely evidence of the contract; but this general rule has no application where the parties were not under contract at the time of the injury, and the general agent is without special authority to issue a policy to cover the loss.

Since it appears, then, that no contract of insurance was concluded prior to the accident, that Smith had no authority to bind petitioner by a parol contract of insurance, that the "custom and the practice" found by the commission to have been followed did not extend to a case where, at the time of the loss, the parties had not agreed upon the terms of the contract, and that the general agent was, in such circumstances without authority to issue a policy it follows that the findings cannot be sustained.

The award is annulled.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; OLNEY, J.; LENNON, J.

WILBUR, J. I dissent. The evidence shows that the Workmen's Compensation Law did not apply to Dr. Pond until, at the solicitation of the agent Smith, he elected to be bound by its terms. The effect of his election was to charge him with responsibility for the injury to his employees under the terms of that law, even if he was wholly without fault, as in this case. Because of such election Dr. Pond evidently intended to keep covered by insurance. Accordingly he notified Smith, petitioner's agent, that he desired an indemnity policy, dating from the expiration of his existing insurance, and that he was willing to pay whatever premium was charged by the company. The petitioner offered its insurance policies for sale to the public generally at a fixed and uniform rate. The terms and provisions of the policy being thus fixed, the question of insurance turned upon the willingness of the prospective policy holder to pay the premium demanded therefor by the company. At the time Dr. Pond applied to Smith for the policy he stated that he was willing to pay the premium, whatever it might be. Instead of communicating this fact to the general agent, Smith inserted in the written application the amount of the premium as $10. This resulted in the complications detailed in the main opinion. The evidence discloses that the company was willing to write the policy, and that Pond was willing to pay the amount of the insurance, and this willingness had been communicated by the one to the other. The whole difficulty arose from the failure of Smith to state in the written application for insurance the fact that Dr. Pond was willing to pay the increased premium. This was not the fault of Dr. Pond. The policy applied for was one dated September 25, 1917, and the policy finally issued and paid for was so dated. Wilson, to all intents and purposes, was the general agent of the company. He conducted the entire business of the general agent, in the name of the general agent, without consultation with him. Upon the insistence of Smith that Dr. Pond was entitled to a policy dated September 25, 1917, in accordance with the custom of the office he issued such a policy so dated, after knowledge of the accident, which policy covered the liability here sought to be enforced. In view of the delay caused by the failure of its agent Smith to communicate to the general agent the facts, namely, the willingness of Dr. Pond to pay the premium asked, which would have resulted in the prompt issuance of the policy, it would seem that common honesty demanded of the defendant that it accept the responsibility due to the delay of its own agent in communicating a correct statement of the actual terms of the application. The finding of the ultimate fact by the commission was that the written policy which by its terms covered the accident was binding by reason of a previous oral negotiation between the parties. I think the evidence is sufficient to justify this finding. Under somewhat similar facts, in Eames v. Home Ins. Co., 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. Ed. 298, it was held under the circumstances there stated that the acceptance of the rate by the insured in a communication to the local agent was sufficient to bind the company where the rate had been previously fixed by the general agent, and that, although no policy was ever issued, the insurance company was bound. The only difference in the two cases in principle is that in the case at bar the information that the applicant was willing to pay the premium demanded was communicated to the local agent before the premium was fixed by the general agent, and in Eames v. Home Ins. Co. it was communicated afterward. In neither case did the information that the applicant was willing to pay the premium demanded reach the general agent in time for the issuance of the policy before the loss, while in Eames v. Home Ins. Co. the policy was never issued, and in the case at bar it was issued with full knowledge of the fact. I think that Dr. Pond had signified his acceptance of the terms offered by the insurance company and thus a contract of insurance had been concluded.

YOUNG et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Sac. 2501.)(Supreme Court of California, March 9, 1920.
On Rehearing, April 7, 1920.)1. Railroads ⚡348(9)—Evidence held to show contributory negligence of motorcyclist crossing track.

In an action for the death of a motorcycle driver struck after passing standing cars obstructing his view of a track on which a car was being pushed by an engine, evidence held to justify a finding of contributory negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen.

2. Railroads ⚡328(1)—Motorcyclist held contributorily negligent as matter of law.

A motorcycle rider who failed to stop and look, though his view was obstructed by standing cars, and attempted to cross, heedless of warning bells and whistle, and gesticulations and cries of bystanders and warning shouted by brakeman a few feet away, held contributorily negligent as a matter of law.

3. Trial ⚡193(3)—Instruction as to burden of proving contributory negligence held erroneous as indicating court's opinion as to evidence.

In a negligence action, where plaintiff in opening case put before the jury all the elements that went to disclose contributory negligence so that defendant's evidence did not materially add thereto in establishment of contributory negligence, and where plaintiff's evidence showed contributory negligence as a matter of law, an instruction that contributory negligence is not to be inferred from plaintiff's testimony, and is to be affirmatively shown by defendant, would have been error, in that it would have led jury to believe that in court's opinion such evidence was insufficient to establish contributory negligence.

4. Railroads ⚡351(17) — Instruction as to duty of traveler to look after passing obstruction to view held error.

In action for death of motorcyclist struck at railroad crossing after having passed standing box cars extending into street and obstructing his view of other track, where after passing the standing cars he had an unobstructed view of other track for nearly three miles, instruction that, if box cars excluded view of track "when about to go upon such track, the traveler is excused from looking" held error, in leading jury to think that deceased had been under no obligation to look after passing standing cars, whereas he was required to look if by looking after passing standing cars he could have seen car approach on other track.

5. Railroads ⚡328(10) — Motorcyclist approaching obstructed crossing required to stop, look, and listen.

A motorcyclist, approaching a crossing with standing cars obstructing his view of cars approaching on another track while bell is ringing and whistle blowing, is negligent in attempting to cross without looking, listening, and, if necessary, stopping; his obligation to so do being increased by knowledge that a train is approaching.

6. Railroads ⚡351(17)—Instruction as to duty to look after passing obstruction created by defendant held error.

In action for death of motorcyclist struck by cars on main track of crossing after having passed standing cars on passing track obstructing his view of main track, instruction that failure to stop, look, and listen is not negligence where railroad has created conditions causing ordinarily prudent person to refrain from exercising such precautions held error, where motorcyclist, after passing standing car, had three-mile view of main track; he being under obligations to look and listen notwithstanding obstruction.

7. Negligence ⚡83—Contributory negligence no bar to recovery under last clear chance doctrine.

Contributory negligence does not preclude recovery under the last clear chance doctrine, which is founded upon the theory that the injured person was guilty of negligence.

8. Trial ⚡252(9)—Instruction on last clear chance doctrine held improper as without support in evidence.

In action for death of motorcyclist at crossing, instruction on last clear chance doctrine, authorizing recovery for plaintiffs on railroad's failure to stop train if circumstances were such as to have led an ordinarily prudent person, situated as the trainmen, to believe that motorcyclist was in the act of crossing the track, and through fear, excitement, or loss of self-control could not stop, held improper, where there was no evidence that driver was acting under fear or excitement, or had lost self-control until accident was unavoidable.

9. Railroads ⚡338—Last clear chance doctrine defined.

Under the last clear chance doctrine, the traveler's peril, which calls upon the trainmen to act, must be an actual one from which he cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care; and, until he has reached the point from which he cannot escape by the exercise of such care, the doctrine does not apply.

10. Trial ⚡219—Instruction requiring "proper warning," without specifying any standard, improper.

In an action for death at crossing, instruction that railroad is required to give "proper warning," without defining any standard as to what constituted proper warning, held improper.

11. Trial ⚡251(8)—Instruction as to negligence not pleaded improper.

In an action for death at crossing, instruction that railroad was required to have some one stationed at the crossing to give proper warning held improper, where complaint did not allege railroad's failure to have brakeman at crossing as the basis of the claim of negligence.

12. Evidence — 588—Credibility of witness for jury.

The jury can disbelieve the testimony of any witness.

13. Appeal and error — 1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where evidence was conflicting, verdict supported by substantial evidence will not be disturbed, as the jury is the exclusive judge of the facts.

14. Appeal and error — 1170(9)—Erroneous instructions held prejudicial.

In action for death at crossing, erroneous instructions as to contributory negligence and the last clear chance doctrine, held ground for reversal on appeal from judgment for plaintiff, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of insufficiency of evidence to prove defendants liable under last clear chance doctrine, and verdict against train employes against whom last clear chance doctrine was not available, as well as against those who would have been liable thereunder, indicating that the verdict was not rendered under such doctrine.

Olney and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

On Rehearing.

15. Negligence — 122(2)—Contributory negligence must be proved by defendants unless shown by plaintiff's evidence.

Unless it may be inferred from the evidence offered by the plaintiff, contributory negligence is a matter of defense, to be proved affirmatively by the defendant.

16. Death — 103(3) — Where deceased was contributorily negligent as matter of law case is not for jury.

In action for death, where deceased was clearly guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, the question of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Roy J. Young, as special administrator of the estate of Jacob Bluhm, deceased, and another against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, Hudson Grant, of Woodland, and A. L. Clark, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Clark, Black & Clark, of Berkeley, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought by the father and mother of Fred C. Bluhm to recover damages for the death of their son. The father has died, and the special administrator of his estate has been substituted.

Fred C. Bluhm, while riding a motorcycle along Main street in the city of Woodland across the railway track of the defendant company, was struck by a caboose, which was being pushed by an engine, and killed. Joined with the defendant company were G. E. Waite, conductor; W. H. Jones, engineer, and G. C. Conley and B. C. Neibling, brakemen, of the train. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered against all of the defendants. As a part of the plaintiffs' case a diagram of the scene of the accident was introduced in evidence. From this it appears that crossing Main street at and near the place of the accident were two tracks of the railway company, one the main line track and another a passing track. In approaching the point of collision the deceased first crossed the passing track and then the main track. At the time of the accident the train involved in the accident was being broken up and a part thereof was standing on the passing track. The engine and caboose were on the main track. The complaint alleges that the defendants were negligent in allowing a portion of the train to stand upon the passing track in such manner that a portion thereof projected into and partially crossed Main street, "so that the northerly end of said train of cars extended from the south side of said Main street into the said Main street a distance of about 15 feet," thereby obscuring the view of a person traveling westerly on Main street and preventing such person from observing the approach of cars "being propelled in front of an engine, in the event an engine shoving cars was being run on said main line track in a northerly direction towards such railroad crossing, and would be misled and deceived into believing that no cars were being propelled by or shoved by said engine." That immediately prior to the collision the engine of the defendant company was pushing a caboose northward along the track, the engine being fronted north and the caboose in front thereof; that the deceased had no knowledge or notice of the fact that the defendants were engaged in running an engine propelling or shoving a caboose in front of it in a northerly direction along said main line track, and that by reason of the location of said portions of said train of cars on said passing track he was misled and deceived into believing that he could go safely over said crossing. Immediately before the trial began plaintiffs amended their complaint to add a count charging negligence under the last clear chance doctrine, in which they alleged the same situation with reference to the cars and tracks. It was alleged:

"That as he passed the northerly end of said portion of said train of cars so placed and allowed so to remain on said passing track, he for the first time discovered that the defendants were engaged in running an engine propelling and shoving a caboose in front of it in a northerly direction along said main line track, towards the point where he was about to pass over said main line track, and that he then for the first time discovered the peril in which he would be by reason of proceeding across said main line track; that Fred C. Bluhm so discovered said engine and caboose immediately upon his passing the said northerly end of said cars so placed and allowed to remain on said passing track, but that at the time of becoming aware of the approach of said engine and caboose it was then impossible for him to avoid continuing westerly over said main line track, and that he did continue westerly to the said main line track upon his said motorcycle; * * * that the individual defendants herein who were engaged in the management of said engine and caboose * * * knew that the said Fred C. Bluhm was about to go upon said main line track * * * and could not avoid so doing; that they then became aware of the peril in which he was situated, and that if he went upon the said main line track he would be killed or suffer great bodily injury, if the engine or caboose were not stopped or the speed thereof slackened immediately; that the defendants herein negligently and carelessly, after they so became aware of the said danger * * * failed to stop said engine and caboose, or to slacken the speed thereof immediately," and as the result thereof deceased was killed.

The distance between the passing track and the main track at the point of collision was between 13 and 14 feet.

[1, 2] Plaintiffs in their main case called as witnesses the engineer and brakeman riding on the right-hand side of the engine and caboose, respectively, at the time of the accident, a witness who was following immediately behind the deceased and saw the collision, and other witnesses, concerning the various details regarding the circumstances of the accident. These witnesses testified, among other things, that the deceased stopped for a moment's conversation at a point about 150 feet east of the main line of the defendant railway company; that at the time he stopped and conversed with one of the witnesses a stationary electric bell at the crossing was ringing continuously because of the fact that the engine and caboose were on the track south of the crossing at a point sufficiently near to cause the automatic electric crossing bell to ring; that during all of this time the automatic bell on the engine was ringing; that the engine stopped at points 500 feet south of the crossing and 200 feet south of the crossing, and that on starting forward each time two blasts of the whistle were blown; that the engine and caboose were approaching the crossing at a speed of from four to eight miles an hour, and that the deceased upon starting his machine to the point of crossing moved slowly to the point of the accident at a speed of from four to six miles an hour; that the view of the main line track upon which the caboose and engine were approaching was obscured by a line of cars on the passing track which projected into the street to a point variously estimated at 8 or 10 feet north of the south curb line of the street to a point within 8 or 10 feet of the Northern Electric track which ran along Main street in an easterly and westerly direction a few feet north of the center line of said Main street; that, although the view of the main track was thus obscured, a witness 50 feet in the rear of the deceased saw the smoke from the approaching locomotive, and shouted twice to the deceased, warning him of his danger, telling him that he would be killed if he did not look out; that in addition to this warning two men standing near the stationary electric bell on the easterly side of the main line track in Main street, and within a few feet of the deceased, waved frantically, and shouted at the deceased to warn him of his danger; that a witness, Conley, a brakeman, riding on the right-hand rear step of the caboose, as soon as he saw the deceased approaching, yelled at him, and waved for him to stop, and immediately gave the emergency signal to the engineer; that at that time the deceased was upon the passing track, which was about 13 feet from the main line track upon which the caboose was approaching; that the engineer was constantly observing the track and the brakeman on the rear of the caboose for the purpose of safeguarding those approaching on the highway; that he saw the frantic gestures of a man near the stationary electric bell, apparently trying to stop some one approaching on the highway, and that immediately, and without waiting for such person to become visible, he applied the emergency brakes; that he saw the signal of the brakeman for the emergency brakes, but had already applied the brakes; that the deceased moved forward along Main street toward the point of collision without looking to the right or the left or in any way indicating that he saw or had knowledge of the approaching train; that when he was upon the track in front of the caboose, apparently in sudden fright, he leaped from his motorcycle in front of the caboose, the motorcycle passed on and cleared the caboose, falling clear of the track, but deceased fell and was run over by the trucks on the left side of the caboose. From this evidence it is justly inferable that the deceased, without the slightest effort to stop or look or listen, approached the crossing, although knowing that the track was there, utterly heedless of the warning bells and whistle and the gesticulations of the bystanders, and the cries of those who sought to warn him, and the warning shouted at him by the brakeman, who must have been only a few feet from him. From this evidence it is not only apparent that the jury would have been justified in finding the deceased guilty of contributory negligence, but that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The court, however, instructed the jury as follows:

"Contributory negligence is such an act or omission on the part of the decedent, amounting to want of ordinary care, as, concurring and co-operating with the negligence of the defendants, was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. Nor is it to be inferred from the evidence offered by the plaintiffs; such negligence is a matter of defense to be proved affirmatively by the defendants; and hence the burden of proof of contributory negligence is on the defendants."

[3, 4] It is difficult to appraise the effect upon the jury of the above instruction, concerning contributory negligence. The plaintiffs in opening their case put before the jury all the elements that went to disclose that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and while the defendants did introduce some evidence in addition to that offered by the plaintiffs, it may be said in general that such evidence did not add materially to the situation as disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence so far as contributory negligence is concerned. The jury might well have believed from this instruction that in the opinion of the court either the plaintiff's evidence did not show contributory negligence, or that they must wholly disregard this chain of circumstances in determining whether or not there was contributory negligence. Of course, there are other instructions upon the question of negligence and contributory negligence and upon the doctrine of the last clear chance. But before considering them it should be observed that the verdict returned by the jury was against all the defendants. The defendants not only included the brakeman and engineer, who saw the deceased approaching the track, but also the conductor and another brakeman who did not observe and did not see the deceased at any time before he was run over and killed. If the jury based its verdict upon the last clear chance doctrine, it could not justly have found a verdict against those employes who knew nothing of the peril of the deceased. It would therefore appear that the jury's verdict was upon the theory that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence. The jury were further instructed:

"If you believe from the evidence that the defendants at the crossing where the accident is alleged to have occurred suffered to remain on their tracks box cars so as to exclude to a traveler a view of its track when about to go upon such track, the traveler is excused from looking, and the failure to look cannot be imputed to him as negligence, although it throws upon him additional care in listening and to take such other precautions for his safety as may be reasonably necessary."

Now, with this instruction it should be observed that it is unquestioned that during a part of the time when the deceased was approaching the main line track his view was obscured so that he could not see the approaching engine and caboose. It is also true that as he approached the main line track his view of that track to the south constantly increased. The extent of that view depended upon his location with reference to the end of the standing box car. If, however, we assume that he crossed the passing track as near to the standing car as he could, he had an opportunity the moment that he passed the corner of this car to look down the track toward the approaching engine and caboose, with an unrestricted view for nearly three miles. The phrase used in the instruction, "when about to go upon such track," in view of the conceded location of the tracks and the opportunity to observe, after passing the standing car, might well have been construed by the jury as altogether excusing the deceased from looking, while the law required the deceased to look if after passing the obstruction he could by looking have seen the approaching train, and the court elsewhere so instructed the jury as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that, when the deceased passed the north end of the box car going toward the main line track upon which he was killed, there was a space between the passing track and the main line track, from which he could, under the evidence in the case, in safety have seen the approaching engine and caboose it was his duty to look and listen from this point of safety, and if he failed to do so, but passed on to his death, he was guilty of contributory negligence."

As was said by the District Court of Appeal in its first decision herein:

"There can be no possible doubt under the evidence that there was such a space as is therein indicated. The virtual effect of the instruction was therefore that if the jury believed Bluhm failed to look for the train, he was guilty of contributory negligence."

Again, the jury were instructed as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence that the deceased, Fred Bluhm, while approaching the crossing to a point that was reasonably suitable and proper for ascertaining whether cars were approaching, and while he was yet in a position of safety there was an engine moving upon the main line, but under the facts in the case he then had reasonable grounds for believing the engine was not approaching, or, if approaching, it was not near to the crossing, and was not showing the caboose near to the crossing, then it is a question for you to determine whether he was negligent in passing the crossing track without stopping."

[5] This instruction simply means, under the facts in the case, that if the deceased saw the smoke of the approaching engine and believed that the smoke was at the front end of the approaching train instead of in the middle, as it appears in fact it was, the jury was to determine whether it was negligence for him to continue without stopping to make further observation. There is no justification for this instruction. If, in addition to the warning given by the track itself, by the ringing of the bell and the blowing of the whistle, he actually saw a train approaching, it was negligence for him to proceed and attempt to cross in front of the approaching train, even if he believed that the smoke was in the front of it. He was bound to look and listen, and, if necessary, to stop, upon approaching the track without knowing that a train was approaching, and that obligation was increased rather than diminished by his knowledge that in fact a train was approaching.

[6] The jury was further instructed:

"You are instructed that the rule which requires a person on a highway to stop, look, and listen for an approaching train, where the view of the track is obstructed, is not an unvarying one applicable to every set of circumstances. Contributory negligence cannot be imputed to one on account of his failure to stop, look, and listen for a train, or a portion of a train approaching the crossing, if, by the acts of those managing the train, or parts of the train at the crossing, appearances are produced which would cause an ordinarily prudent person to refrain from exercising the precaution to stop, look, and listen."

This could only mean, under the circumstances, that the deceased was not required to stop, look, and listen if in the opinion of the jury the appearance of the box car upon the passing track was sufficient in their judgment to excuse him from the burden of the rule. This is not the law. The deceased was under the obligation to look and listen, and if by reason of the obstruction caused by the box car he could not see or hear without stopping in a place of safety so to do, it was his duty to do so.

We have so far discussed the case from the standpoint of the plaintiff's testimony for the purpose of determining whether or not the instruction to the effect that contributory negligence could not be inferred from the plaintiff's testimony prejudiced the appellants. It is apparent from what has been said that the above-quoted instructions upon the subject of contributory negligence were erroneous and require a reversal of the case.

[7] The respondents contend, however, that the defendants were liable on the last clear chance doctrine. It is true that under this doctrine the contributory negligence of the deceased would cease to be a factor as soon as the situation demanded the application of the rule, which is founded upon the theory that the injured person is guilty of negligence. For the purpose of this appeal it is sufficient to say that it is impossible to determine whether the jury awarded the verdict on the theory that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence, or upon the theory that the last clear chance doctrine applied, but that the fact that some of the defendants against whom the verdict was found were not liable, in any event, under that doctrine, would indicate that the former was the basis of the jury's verdict. Notwithstanding the necessity of a new trial, we deem it unnecessary to critically examine the instruction of the court on the last clear chance doctrine, for the reason that the doctrine is well settled, and that instructions applicable to the facts of this case may readily be given. The instruction is criticized by the appellants "because it permitted the jury to find the defendants' negligence under the rule, if on the facts the trainmen could have seen Bluhm in time to save him, whereas the law is that they must have actually seen him or known he was there, and have been guilty of an independent and a new negligence thereafter." It is doubtful whether the instruction is susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the appellants. Without quoting the entire instruction, it provides:

"That if * * * those in charge of the engine and caboose discovered the plaintiff's presence on the highway * * * and the circumstances were such as to lead an ordinarily prudent person situated as those were in charge of the engine and caboose to believe that the deceased was in the act of crossing the track in front of the caboose, and through fear, excitement, or loss of self-control could not stop and would come in collision with the caboose, if it proceeded, and that those in charge of the engine and caboose, after seeing and realizing such a situation of the deceased, failed to stop the engine and caboose, although they could by the exercise of ordinary care have stopped the same, * * * then in that event the jury will find for the plaintiffs, notwithstanding they believe that the deceased was originally wanting in ordinary care in failing to ascertain that the engine and caboose were coming, and in attempting to cross the main line track."

[8, 9] This instruction is misleading for the reason that there is no evidence to justify the conclusion that the deceased was acting under fear or excitement or had lost self-control until the moment that he leaped from his motorcycle or was knocked therefrom, at which time the accident was unavoidable. The only evidence observable by the train employes was that the deceased was proceeding heedlessly forward. The last clear chance doctrine was not applicable until he arrived at such a point as to be in peril, and this was the point where he could no longer escape injury by exercising ordinary care. Until he reached that point the train employes had a right to rely upon his continuing obligation to observe the approach of the train. The evidence does not clearly indicate this point, for the reason that it does not show within what distance the motorcycle, under the circumstances, could have been stopped. It is important that this should be made clear to the jury for the reason that, in one sense, every person approaching a crossing at a speed which would bring him in collision with a moving train at the crossing is in danger and certain to be injured unless he accelerates his speed, slows down or stops, or the engineer does so. Under the last clear chance doctrine the peril which calls upon the train employes to act must be an actual one from which the imperiled party cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care. Until the deceased reached the point from which he could not escape injury by the exercise of ordinary care, either by stopping or accelerating his pace, the doctrine of the last clear chance does not apply. The rule is well stated in the following quotation from French v. Grand Trunk Ry., 76 Vt. 441, 58 Atl. 722:

"It is true that, when a traveler has reached a point where he cannot help himself—cannot extricate himself, and vigilance on his part will not avert the injury, his negligence in reaching that position becomes the condition, and not the proximate cause, of the injury, and will not preclude a recovery; but it is equally true, that, if a traveler, when he reaches the point of collision, is in a situation to help himself, and, by a vigilant use of his eyes, ears and physical strength to extricate himself and avoid injury, his negligence at that point will prevent a recovery, notwithstanding the fact that the trainmen could have stopped the train in season to have avoided injuring him. In such a case, the negligence of the plaintiff is concurrent with the negligence of the defendant, and the negligence of each is operative at the time of the accident. When negligence is concurrent and operative at the time of the collision and contributes to it, there can be no recovery."

We have recently had before us in Basham v. Southern Pacific Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 Pac. 359, the doctrine of the last clear chance as applied to a crossing case, where the injured party was approaching the track at right angles. It was there said:

"The 'last clear chance' doctrine can have no possible application, unless there was evidence tending to show that the fireman neglected to take steps which due care would have required, when he saw the team and wagon in a position which would have indicated to a reasonable man that Coffey was already in danger, or was immediately about to enter the danger zone."

[10, 11] The court gave the following instruction:

"The jury is instructed that if under the circumstances existing at a crossing proper warning of the danger of the approach of trains cannot be given unless some one is stationed thereat to give warnings, it is the duty of a railroad company making use of the crossing to have some one stationed at the crossing to give such warnings, or to approach such crossing with the engine under such control that it can be stopped in time to avoid injury."

Aside from the proposition that this instruction submitted to the jury, without any standard for the determination of the same, the question of what constituted "proper warning" of the danger of the approaching train, the instruction was objectionable because the complaint did not allege the failure to have a flagman at the crossing as a basis of the claim of negligence. The instruction should not have been given.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the other instructions complained of by appellants, nor to set out other portions of the evidence, for the reason that the rules applying to accidents at railway crossings are so well settled that on a new trial the court should have no difficulty in correctly instructing the jury. We do not wish to be considered as either approving or disapproving of the instructions that are not herein mentioned.

[12, 13] We have not overlooked the fact that the jury is the exclusive judge of the facts, and can disbelieve the testimony of any witness, and that, if substantial evidence supports the verdict, where the evidence is conflicting, the verdict of the jury must stand. Our discussion of the evidence is for the purpose of making manifest the prejudicial character of the erroneous instructions given by the court.

As to the objection that the complaint does not state that the deceased was an adult son, the evidence clearly shows that fact, and the complaint can be amended in the lower court. We, therefore, deem it unnecessary to give further consideration to that question.

[14] In view of the suggestion that under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution the judgment might be affirmed on the theory that an examination of the entire record leads to the conclusion that the errors complained of have not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, we deem it proper to state that we are entirely satisfied from such examination that this court cannot say that there has been no miscarriage of justice. For instance, defendant Conley testified that as soon as he saw the deceased he gave the emergency signal. Defendant Jones, the engineer, testified that he applied the emergency brakes before he received the signal or saw the deceased. Defendant Neibling testified that he saw nothing of the accident until the motorcycle appeared on the far side of the train, and that the emergency brake had been applied before that time. Defendant Waite, the conductor, testified that he was not on the engine or caboose at the time of the accident.

If this testimony is true no verdict should have been rendered against any of these defendants on the last clear chance doctrine, or on the theory that they were guilty of negligence; nor should a verdict have been rendered against the defendant company. The question of whether or not this evidence was true, and, where there was contradictory circumstantial evidence, which should be accepted by the jury, was entirely a matter for the trial court and jury; nor is it a matter for consideration that another jury upon a new trial might, upon such conflicting evidence and proper instructions, render a verdict based on the last clear chance doctrine favorable to the plaintiffs. Furthermore, the fact that a verdict was returned against defendants Waite and Neibling, who neither saw the peril of the deceased nor had anything to do with the instrumentalities by which the train was or could be stopped, is a clear indication that the present verdict was not rendered upon the last clear chance doctrine. If it be conceded that there is sufficient evidence upon which the jury might have based a verdict against some of the defendants on that doctrine, it is equally apparent that as to others such a verdict could not properly be rendered. It cannot therefore be said from the record that this doctrine was the basis of the jury's verdict against all the defendants, and, if not, it cannot be said by this court to be the basis of their verdict against any one of the defendants. Such a conclusion would be in direct conflict with the verdict of the jury, which includes all, and hence implies a sort of negligence in which all participated, and therefore, a sort to which contributory negligence is a complete defense.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; SHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in what is said in the main opinion on the question of contributory negligence, and the instructions given the jury thereon. I am not in entire accord with all that is said in the opinion in regard to the last clear chance doctrine, and believe that the instruction on that question was substantially correct and not rendered prejudicially misleading by the use of the words "through fear, excitement or loss of self-control." I am further of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict based on the last clear chance doctrine. To my mind, however, it cannot fairly be held that the evidence was such as to require a verdict for plaintiff on that ground, or, in other words, that the evidence was such that defendants are liable under said doctrine as matter of law. This being so, a reversal cannot be avoided, for it is impossible to know upon what theory the verdict was rendered, or that the jury ever concluded that the facts existed which would have warranted a verdict under the last clear chance doctrine.

OLNEY, J. (dissenting). I dissent on the ground that, while the statement in the first instruction discussed in the main opinion, "Nor is it [contributory negligence] to be inferred from the evidence offered by the plaintiff," is erroneous, so palpably so as to make it probable that it was given wholly by inadvertence, and while, in fact, the decedent was plainly guilty of contributory negligence and the jury should have been so instructed, yet the facts of the case are such as to show unmistakably that the verdict was a just one under the last clear chance rule, and to make it evident that the jury, if there is any presumption that they were reasoning beings and acted as such, reached their verdict because of the liability of the defendants under that rule without being affected by the issue of contributory negligence which was erroneously submitted to them. More than this, I do not see how it is possible upon the facts of this case to say truly that the errors relied upon to justify the reversal, of which those concerning the issue of contributory negligence are alone substantial, "resulted in a miscarriage of justice" as required by section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution. The verdict certainly cannot be said to be an unjust one. If the facts be not such as to require a verdict for the plaintiff as a matter of law, and in my judgment they at least closely approach so doing, at least they amply justify such a verdict and destroy the possibility of its being properly deemed "a miscarriage of justice."

The salient facts are practically without dispute. The decedent, Bluhm, was coming along the street on his motorcycle approaching the crossing in an utterly heedless and therefore perilous fashion. Under these circumstances no recovery could be had for his death unless three things appeared, viz: (1) That the train crew observed and realized his peril; (2) that the train crew did not act with the promptness which such a situation reasonably demanded of them; and (3) that if they had so acted, the accident would have been avoided. On the other hand, if these things did appear, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The evidence both for the plaintiff and the defendants shows unmistakably that they did in fact exist.

First, as to the train crew observing and realizing the decedent's peril. The decedent was killed by being struck by a caboose which was being pushed by a locomotive. As the caboose was being so backed, one of the brakemen, the defendant Conley, was stationed on the steps of the forward platform of the caboose, that is, the platform that was forward as the caboose was then being moved, to direct and control the movement of the train to look out for any danger. Before the decedent came in sight, and before the train reached the street, both Conley and the engineer, the defendant Jones, observed a bystander on the sidewalk, who, in Conley's language, was "making all kinds of demonstration. It seemed as though he was motioning to a fellow going across the track, you know—stopping him that way, and then he grabbed his hat and motioned and waved it." By the actions of this bystander Conley and the engineer must both have realized the possibility of an impending danger, and must have been mentally prepared for the peril which immediately after developed within their observation when Bluhm came into view. So forewarned, their natural and almost inevitable mental reaction when Bluhm did come into view was to realize this peril. That there was, in fact, such realization appears from Conley's testimony, which is that when he first saw Bluhm he "hollered" and waved at him and gave the emergency stop signal to the engineer. From these actions of Conley's there is but one possible conclusion, and that is that he observed and realized that Bluhm was in peril.

Second, as to the train crew not acting with the promptness which Bluhm's observed and realized peril reasonably demanded of them. It needs no argument to establish the proposition that it was the duty of the train crew upon observing and realizing Bluhm's peril promptly to stop the train. The testimony, however, leaves no doubt that they did not do so. The engineer Jones testified for the defendant that the train could be stopped in 40 feet. It is well-nigh incredible that a freight engine with only a light caboose attached, traveling a little faster than a fast walk, and moving on a slight up grade such as existed at the place of accident, could not be stopped in much less than 40 feet. But however this may be, there can be no disputing the fact that the train was stopped only after it had proceeded 75 or 80 feet from the point where it first struck Bluhm. This distance, of course, is less than the distance through which the train moved after Bluhm's peril was observed by the train crew, since by all the testimony this was observed before Bluhm was struck. The following facts are those which conclusively show the movement of the train through 75 or 80 feet after striking Bluhm. When Bluhm was struck he was 8 or 10 feet south of the tracks of an electric road which runs along the street on which he was riding and crosses the steam railroad tracks. The train was moving north, and, when it was finally stopped, the gangway between the engine and its tender was immediately over the electric tracks. The engine was moving forward so that the whole length of the engine as far as the gangway had crossed the electric tracks. It necessarily follows from these facts that after striking Bluhm the train moved through the distance from the point of contact to the electric tracks, some 8 or 10 feet, plus the length of the caboose, which it was testified by the defendants' witnesses was something over 30 feet, plus the length of the engine without the tender, which was testified by the defendants' witnesses to be about 40 feet. The sum of these distances is 78 or 80 feet, or almost twice that within which, according to the testimony of the engineer, the train could have been stopped. I can see but one reasonable conclusion from these facts, and that is that the train was not in fact stopped with the promptness which the situation of observed peril reasonably demanded.

Third, as to the fact that if the train had been stopped with reasonable promptness the accident would have been avoided. This is shown conclusively by the fact that a very slight checking of the speed of the train would have avoided the accident. Bluhm was struck by the far side of the platform; that is, he was almost across the track and out of danger. In fact, if he had remained on his motorcycle he probably would not have been struck at all, for the motorcycle was not hit, but went on completely across and was there picked up uninjured. Just as the caboose was almost upon Bluhm he was observed to throw up his hands and fall off his wheel, and it was due to his falling off, probably caused by fright at his observing the caboose so close upon him, that he was struck.

The foregoing facts appear so plainly in the evidence and the conclusion to which they lead is so plain that, as I have said, it seems evident that it was because of these facts, and not because of any erroneous view as to the decedent's contributory negligence, that the jury returned the verdict which they did. That verdict cannot be said to be a miscarriage of justice, and the errors dwelt upon in the main opinion seem to me to come fairly within the remedial amendment mentioned of our Constitution.

What I have said does not apply to the members of the train crew other than the brakeman, Conley, and the engineer. The other members of the crew were not shown to have had any connection with the failure to stop the train promptly on Bluhm's peril being observed, and the judgment as to them is properly reversed.

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [15, 16] In a petition for rehearing it is stated that the learned trial judge insists that no such instruction on contributory negligence as the one first discussed in the opinion was ever given; that instead of the words "nor is it to be inferred" the instruction actually given commenced with the words "unless it may be inferred." So changed, the instruction would be a correct statement of the law. The settled record on appeal is, in the light of this statement, incorrect, but even if the record in this behalf could now be corrected to show the truth, it would make no difference in the result. The gist of the opinion in this matter is that the question of contributory negligence should not have been submitted to the jury, the deceased being clearly guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. There were several instructions on the question of contributory negligence, and that question was submitted to the jury.

The application for a rehearing is denied.

CITIZENS' SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. BENNETT et al. (L. A. 5281.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1920.)

1. Partition $\Leftrightarrow$ 116(2)—Effect of partition decree changing boundaries of mortgaged lands stated.

Where decree in partition suit, brought to determine boundaries of lots and blocks in subdivision of city, decreed mortgagors to be owners of the lots mortgaged but located such lots so that buildings constructed on such lots as originally platted by mortgagors with money borrowed from mortgagee were not located thereon, the effect of the decree was to substitute the land within boundaries fixed by such decree as mortgage security, so that mortgage foreclosure purchaser acquired no right in the houses.

2. Mortgages $\Leftrightarrow$ 309(1)—Foreclosure and sale as to only part of property covered held to have released part omitted.

Where holder of mortgage covering certain land and also certain houses not a part of such land obtains a decree foreclosing on the land alone and buys it in for the full amount due, the omission of the houses from foreclosure and sale releases them from the mortgage.

3. Mortgages $\Leftrightarrow$ 538 — Reopening foreclosure decree only remedy where part of property omitted from decree by mistake.

Where mortgage covering certain realty and certain houses not a part of such realty is foreclosed by decree omitting by mistake foreclosure as to the houses, mortgagee purchaser at foreclosure sale, if entitled to relief, could secure such relief only by having the decree reopened or set aside in suitable proceedings.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by the Citizens' Savings Bank of San Diego against Carrie E. Bennett and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Herbert N. Ellis and C. B. Ellis, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Albert J. Lee and William G. Mirow, both of San Diego, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff declaring it to be the owner of two certain dwelling houses, enjoining the defendants from affixing the houses to two certain lots onto which they had just been moved when the action was brought, and giving the plaintiff possession of them. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. The real parties in interest are the plaintiff and the defendant Carrie E. Bennett.

The findings show that Mrs. Bennett and her husband were formerly the owners of certain unimproved lots designated by number in a block in an outside subdivision of the city of San Diego. While such owner, Mrs. Bennett and her husband mortgaged the property to the plaintiff to secure a loan of $2,000 made by the plaintiff to the Bennetts upon the understanding that the money would be used in building dwellings upon the property. The subdivision had been platted and the lines of its lots and blocks staked on the ground, and at the time of the giving of the mortgage the president of the plaintiff and the Bennetts went to the subdivision and definitely located the lots of the Bennetts as so platted and staked. Upon these lots the Bennetts then built four houses, two of which are those whose ownership is now in question.

Subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, what is termed a "partition" suit was brought to determine the boundaries of the lots and blocks in the subdivision. All the owners of lots in the subdivision were made parties, and the plaintiff here and the Bennetts were among the parties plaintiff. In the partition suit a survey was made of the subdivision with the consent of the parties whereby the boundary lines of the various lots were located differently from the boundaries previously platted and staked and according to which the Bennetts had purchased and then mortgaged to the plaintiff. On July 12, 1915, a decree, agreeable to all the parties, was entered in the partition suit, whereby the boundaries of the various lots were fixed in accordance with the survey made in the suit. By this decree the Bennetts were declared to be the owners of the lots mortgaged subject to the plaintiff's mortgage, but the lots so owned and mortgaged were defined and bounded according to the partition survey and not as originally platted and staked. The result was that two of the houses built by the Bennetts, the two in question here, were not on the property of which they were declared by the decree to be the owner. It is this circumstance which gives rise to the present litigation.

While the partition suit was pending, the plaintiff here brought suit to foreclose its mortgage, and in June, 1915, obtained a decree of foreclosure, under which the mortgaged property was sold and purchased by the plaintiff three days before the entry of the decree in the partition suit. The foreclosure sale was simply of the lots mortgaged designated by number. The lots were bid in by the plaintiff for the full amount found to be due by the foreclosure decree.

Some time subsequently, Mrs. Bennett proceeded to move the two houses in question from the lots on which they were built to two other lots owned by her and in which the plaintiff had no interest and was about to affix the houses to the latter lots when stayed by the commencement of the present action.

It is at once apparent that, if the plaintiff be entitled to recover, it must be upon the theory that the houses in question were subject to the mortgage lien. It is also apparent that, if such lien existed, it was because of one or the other of two alternatives. One is that the property actually owned and mortgaged by the Bennetts was the lots as originally platted and staked and actually located by the parties to the mortgage upon the ground, in which case the houses were built upon the mortgaged land and became a part of the realty and as such were subject to the lien of the mortgage. This is probably the true view of the situation. The other alternative is that by mistake the houses were built on the wrong property, and that because of this mistake and because of the intention and understanding that the houses would be built on the mortgaged lots and thereby become subject to the mortgage lien, the lien of the mortgage would, as between the parties, be extended to include the houses although they were not actually a part of the mortgaged realty. Assuming that there was a lien in plaintiff's favor on one or the other of these theories, what is the effect of the partition and foreclosure decrees upon the rights of the parties?

[1] Assuming that the property mortgaged was the lots as originally platted, staked, and located on the ground, it is apparent that the effect of the partition decree was to substitute other lots as the mortgage security. The effect of the decree was exactly the same as if the parties by proper releases and conveyances had made the substitution. There can be no question but that in such a case the mortgagee must look to the substituted property as his security, and of such substituted property the houses here were not a part. It may be that the parties did not realize the effect of the decree and that it was made under a mistake, so that it could have been reopened or set aside upon a proper showing and its effect in substituting other property for that actually mortgaged corrected. But such relief against the effect of the partition decree was not sought, there is no finding that the parties were not aware of and did not intend the very thing which the partition decree accomplished, that is, that substitution of lots according to the new survey for the lots as originally platted, staked, and located, and full effect must be given to the decree. Giving it effect means, as we have said, that the realty of which the houses were a part, assuming that such realty was subject to the mortgage, has been removed from under the mortgage and other property substituted for it, and the plaintiff has no right in the houses.

[2] On the other hand, assuming that the second alternative stated is the correct view of the original rights of the parties, then the situation was that the plaintiff owned a mortgage, the lien of which covered certain realty and also covered certain houses which were not a part of such realty; the lien of the mortgage extending to the houses nevertheless because of the mistake in their location. In this situation the plaintiff brought suit to foreclose, obtained a decree foreclosing on the mortgaged realty alone, and bought it in for the full amount due. It is at once apparent that by the omission of the houses from foreclosure and sale they were released from the mortgage. There is no difference whatever between such a case and one wherein different pieces of realty are subject to mortgage, and a foreclosure is had which omits one of the pieces. The rule is well established and hardly admits of question that in such a case the omitted parcel is released or, perhaps more accurately, is discharged of the mortgage. Mascarel v. Raffour, 51 Cal. 242; Mitchell v. Canal Co., 75 Cal. 464, 479, 17 Pac. 246; Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 348, 22 Pac. 200; Stockton, etc., Co. v. Harrold, 127 Cal. 612, 60 Pac. 165.

[3] Here again, if the omission of the houses from the foreclosure was by mistake and by mistake under such circumstances as to entitle the plaintiff to relief, such relief could be had only by reopening or setting aside the foreclosure decree by suitable proceedings. This has not been done, there is no showing here upon which it could be done, and the foreclosure decree must be given its full effect. That effect was to release or discharge the houses from the mortgaged lien, if the fact be that they were not a part of the mortgaged realty. It follows that, upon either alternative upon which the plaintiff could have a lien upon the houses, such lien, and with it every right of the plaintiff in the houses has been lost.

Judgment reversed, with directions to enter judgment for the defendants upon the findings.

In re MURPHY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 5608.)(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 10, 1920.)1. Taxation ☞878(2)—Remainder held subject to inheritance tax; "vested remainder."

Where testator reserving life estate in income from certain property had transferred the remainder to his wife and children subject to his right to dispose of the property by power of appointment to be exercised in his will, the remainders were "vested," though defeasible under Civ. Code, §§ 694, 781, and were subject to inheritance tax under Laws 1911, p. 713, § 1, subd. 3, upon his death leaving will directing that the terms of such agreement be carried out, since the power was not exercised by such will, though will contained general devise, such general devise having reference to other property, under Civ. Code, § 1330, and since remaindermen's title, dated from time of such agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Vested Remainder.]

2. Taxation ☞861 — Liability to inheritance tax determined by law at time of vesting of interest.

It is the vesting in interest which constitutes the succession, and the question of liability to inheritance tax must be determined by the law in force at such time.

3. Taxation ☞878(1)—Transfer prior to death held without consideration, subjecting it to inheritance tax.

Where beneficiary of trust fund payable to beneficiary's children in case of his death before certain date transferred the property reserving a life estate in the income and the right to otherwise dispose of the property by testamentary appointment in case he died after such date, there was no consideration for the transfer, subjecting it to inheritance tax.

4. Taxation ☞867(1)—Transfer to be subject to inheritance tax must transfer property within state.

In order that transfer of property of non-resident be subject to inheritance tax, the property must be within the state.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Albert M. Murphy, deceased. From an order fixing amount of inheritance tax, the State Controller appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Rehearing denied; OLNEY, J., dissenting. SLOANE, J., not voting.

Robert A. Waring, of Sacramento, and John W. Carrigan and Edwin H. Pennock, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Milliken & Tuller, of Los Angeles, and A. L. Rowland, of Pasadena, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice Kerrigan of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District while acting as justice pro tempore in this court in place of Mr. Justice Melvin. It is adopted as the opinion of this court:

This appeal involves the question of the amount due as inheritance tax in the above-entitled matter.

Deceased died testate October 19, 1915, a resident of Los Angeles county, and his personal estate was appraised at over a million dollars, and an inheritance tax amounting to the sum of $24,462.67 was paid thereon. No attack is made upon the order impressing this property with a tax or upon the sum found to be due. The value of that estate was exclusive of an interest which the deceased owned in what is known as the Murphy Family Trusts, and the question presented by this appeal is whether or not that interest is subject to the payment of a transfer tax. Deceased acquired this interest from the estate of his father, Simon Murphy, who died February 1, 1905, leaving a will by the terms of which the bulk of his estate was given to his children and other descendants, impressed, however, with certain trusts. The prescribed term of these various trusts was for the period of 10 years, i. e., until February 1, 1915, or upon the earlier decease of the survivor of the two sons named therein. The trustees were directed upon the termination of these trusts to divide the estate into five equal shares among certain of his children, of whom Albert, the deceased, was one. The interest which the deceased took in his father's estate was to go to his issue in the event that he predeceased them during the life of the trust, and upon failure of issue this interest was to be divided among his brothers and sisters. On December 17, 1912, at which time decedent was not a resident of California, the various members of the Murphy family voluntarily agreed to extend the term of the trust created by their ancestor for a period of some 20 years from its termination. In pursuance of this plan all the persons having any interests, including the deceased and his ten children, joined in conveying all such interests upon trusts, which were described and declared as the Murphy Family Trusts. Deceased, in conveying his interest upon these trusts, retained a life estate in the income, with a power of appointment by will over the remainder if he died after February 1, 1915. He further provided that in the event of his death prior to February 1, 1915, this interest should go in equal shares to his ten children, and that if he died after February 1, 1915, without exercising the reserved power of appointment, then and in that event his wife, if surviving, should share with the ten children equally.

The Murphy Family Trusts conveyance is voluminous, and a full review of its recitals and provisions would extend this opinion to an undue length and answer no useful purpose. Respondents claim that the conveyance by the ten children constitutes a valuable and adequate consideration and one sufficient to prevent the succession tax from attaching.

By his will made on February 16, 1915, which was within eight months of his death, decedent disposed of his entire estate; but respecting the agreement of December 17, 1912, which the respondents properly call a trust conveyance, he made the following special provision:

"It is my will and I hereby direct that the terms, condition and purpose of the trust agreement entered into by me with other heirs and devisees of my late father Simon J. Murphy, on the 17th day of December, 1912, and known as the Murphy Family Trusts, as far as the same shall not be inconsistent with the provisions of this my will or render nugatory any of the provisions thereof, shall be carried out."

The trust of 1905 expired on February 1, 1915, and if the deceased had not made the trust conveyance of 1912 he would have been the owner at the time of his death of his original share in the properties of the trust of 1905. On December 17, 1912, however, he conveyed his share of the trust of 1905, upon trusts whereby he reserved a life estate, transferred the remainders to his widow and his ten children, subject, however, to his power to dispose of this property by power of appointment to be exercised in his will. We have already quoted the provision in his will dealing with the matter, and therefore have before us the facts upon which the decision must turn.

(1) Is the transfer of December 17, 1912, in its nature a taxable transfer?

(2) If so, was there an adequate and valuable consideration therefor which would avoid the tax?

(3) As Albert Murphy was a nonresident of California on December 17, 1912, is the transfer taxable only in so far as it was limited to California assets?

We take these questions up in the order stated.

[1] Albert Murphy was alive on February 2, 1915. On that day, therefore, he would have been the absolute and indefeasible owner of his share of his father's estate if he had not made the transfer of December 17, 1912. In that transfer he reserved the income of the property for his life and transferred the estate in remainder to his wife and children subject to his right to dispose of the property by power of appointment to be exercised in his will. The remainders thus created were vested although defeasible. Civ. Code, §§ 694, 781; Estate of Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95, 81 Pac. 315; Gray v. Union Trust

Co., 171 Cal. 637, 154 Pac. 306. Ordinarily, the transfer of a remainder subject to a life estate reserved by the grantor is a taxable transfer (Estate of Felton, 176 Cal. 663, 169 Pac. 392), and therefore the transfer of December 17, 1912, is taxable under the law of 1911, § 1, subd. 3 (Stats. 1911, p. 713), which provides:

"When the transfer is of property made by a resident, or by a nonresident when such nonresident's property is within this state, by deed, grant, bargain, sale, assignment or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration in contemplation of the death of the grantor, vendor, assignor or donor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment at or after such death * * * unless the reserved power of appointment changes the case.

The remaindermen, consisting of the widow and children, who are respondents on this appeal, argue that the reserved power of appointment contained in the transfer of December 17, 1912, and the provisions of the will of Albert M. Murphy which became effective at his death October 19, 1915, do change the case. The respondents argue that they do not take the property as remaindermen under the transfer of December 17, 1912, but claim that their title comes from a power of appointment exercised under the will. They also claim that the exercise of a power of appointment was not taxable when Albert M. Murphy died in 1915, and hence they take the property free from any transfer or inheritance tax. It appears that the exercise of powers of appointment was taxable from 1905 to 1913, and has been from 1917 to the present time, but was not taxable from 1913 to 1917.

Respondents contend that decedent's will contains a general devise, and that this amounted to an exercise of the power of appointment reserved in the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912 (section 1330, Civ. Code), and argue that by the power of appointment thus exercised the shares in the property covered by the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912, were distributed differently than in said trust conveyance.

We think not. The property conveyed December 17, 1912, is controlled by the special clause of the will, which we have already quoted, and not by the general devise. As already stated, the decedent owned at his death property worth $1,000,000 exclusive of the property covered by the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912. We think the true interpretation of his will is that the dispositions therein made deal with the $1,000,000, and that item 3 of the will confirming the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912, was intended to approve of all of the dispositions therein provided for. The language employed in terms confirmed the trust deed. It is not necessary for us finally to determine whether this confirmatory clause amounted to the exercise of the power of appointment or is to be treated as a failure to exercise the power. In either event, the result is the same. If it is to be treated as the exercise of the power of appointment, it is controlled by the views expressed in Matter of Lansing, cited below; and, if it is to be treated as a failure to exercise the power of appointment, then the vested defeasible remainders created December 17, 1912, became indefeasible by the decedent's failure to exercise the power of appointment.

Matter of Lansing, 182 N. Y. 238, 74 N. E. 882, involved property in which a mother had a life estate with remainder to her daughter, subject to the right of the mother to dispose of the property by the exercise of a power of appointment in her will. At her death the mother left a will in which she exercised the power of appointment by devising the property to her daughter. The court said that—

"The execution of the power left the title where it was before, and the result is the same as if there had been no power to exercise."

Speaking of the effect of the exercise of the power upon the title which the daughter had during the mother's life, the court said:

"While the situation was subject to change under the power of appointment, no change was made. Although the power was exercised in form, her title was perfect without it and she derived no benefit from it. The power was to 'dispose of the remainder,' and the remainder was not disposed of but continued where it was. The attempt to execute the power was not effective, because it did nothing. The exercise of a power which leaves everything as it was before is a mere form, with no substance."

Matter of Lansing has been approved and followed in similar cases. Matter of Haggerty, 128 App. Div. 479, 112 N. Y. Supp. 1017, affirmed 194 N. Y. 550, 87 N. E. 1120; Matter of Hoffman, 161 App. Div. 836, 146 N. Y. Supp. 898, affirmed 212 N. Y. 604, 106 N. E. 1034; Matter of Chapman, 61 Misc. Rep. 593, 115 N. Y. Supp. 981, 133 App. Div. 337, 117 N. Y. Supp. 679, 138 App. Div. 923, 123 N. Y. Supp. 1110, affirmed 196 N. Y. 561, 90 N. E. 1157, 199 N. Y. 562, 93 N. E. 1118.

[2] We therefore hold that the title of the remaindermen dates from December 17, 1912, and that the case is controlled by the statute of 1911, for it is settled law that—

"It is the vesting in interest which constitutes the succession, and the question of liability to such a tax must be determined by the law in force at that time." Hunt v. Wicht, 174 Cal. 205, 162 Pac. 639, L. R. A. 1917C, 961; Estate of Gurnsey, 177 Cal. 211, 170 Pac. 402; Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126, 175 Pac. 641; In re Brix's Estate, 186 Pac. 135.

In reaching the foregoing conclusions we have not stopped to consider what or to what extent powers may be validly exercised in this state, for, if the power of appointment reserved in the deed had been invalid, then the remaindermen would have taken indefeasible instead of defeasible vested remainders. Estate of Dunphy, 147 Cal. 95, 81 Pac. 315.

We therefore hold that the tax attaches unless the transfer was made upon an adequate and valuable consideration, to which we now address ourselves.

[3] On December 17, 1912, the only interest which the ten children had in their father's share in his father's estate arose from the possibility that he might die before the trust terminated and in that event the ten children would take the share. The trust was certainly to terminate on February 1, 1915, and might terminate earlier. The ten children had nothing to surrender but this possibility of ownership, but they did not even surrender that possibility, for the transfer of December 17, 1912, provided that if Albert M. Murphy died before February 1, 1915, the property should go to the ten children. Hence they gave nothing in the transfer of December 17, 1912. Considering that Albert M. Murphy lived till October 19, 1915, he gave the remainders created in the transfer of December 17, 1912, to his wife and children without any valuable consideration at all.

Counsel for respondents argue, however, that if the father had died before the termination of the trust of 1905 the effect of the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912, upon the children would have been that the property which they were entitled to after the termination of the trust of 1905 would be found to be burdened with another trust, the trust of 1912, to endure. Out of this contingent possibility, which never happened, counsel for respondents seek to work out a valuable and adequate consideration for the vested remainders which were conveyed to the remaindermen by the decedent in the trust conveyance of December 17, 1912. This alleged consideration is very unsubstantial, and we cannot regard it as adequate, and might upon analysis find it to be merely nominal.

[4] We come now to the third question.

Albert M. Murphy was a nonresident of California December 17, 1912, so the transfer is taxable only in so far as he conveyed California assets. The record indicates with sufficient clearness that California assets were included amongst those conveyed by the deceased in trust on December 17, 1912, and the order from which this appeal is taken is not being defended on the ground that no California assets were transferred at that time.

The order appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to impose the tax provided for in the act of 1911 upon the California assets which were included amongst the properties transferred in trust by the decedent December 17, 1912.

One of the ten children died after December 17, 1912, and before the death of his father, Albert M. Murphy, October 19, 1915; but whether the remaindermen taking as a class were reduced to ten, or whether the heirs at law or devisees of the will of this deceased son of Albert M. Murphy are to pay the tax, is a matter to be adjusted in the court below.

Order reversed.

SEARCY v. KAY, County Clerk. (Civ. 2178.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 5, 1920.)

1. Venue ⇐79—On order changing place of trial, clerk is required to transmit pleadings and papers despite appeal or subsequent motion.

Where in wife's divorce action she secured order changing place of trial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 399, the clerk was required to transmit the pleadings and papers to the clerk of the court to which the action was transferred, though defendant husband had appealed from the order changing place of trial, and though plaintiff wife had subsequently moved for additional alimony and counsel fees in the original court.

2. Mandamus ⇐44—Writ will issue to compel clerk to transfer papers as required.

Mandamus will issue at the instance of a wife suing for divorce to compel the clerk to transfer the pleadings and papers in the action to the clerk of the court to which it has been transferred on plaintiff's motion, his statutory duty under Code Civ. Proc. § 399.

Application for writ of mandate by Mary Louise Searcy against Fred M. Kay, County Clerk and ex officio Clerk of the Superior Court of the County of Humboldt, to require the transmission of papers. Writ granted.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for petitioner.

Henry L. Ford, of Eureka, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an application for a writ of mandate directing the defendant, as said clerk, to transmit to the clerk of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco the files in an action for divorce commenced by plaintiff against one C. L. Searcy, the material events of which occurred in the following order:

(1) September 19, 1919, action commenced in the superior court of said city and county.

(2) October 10, 1919, place of trial changed to the superior court of the county of Humboldt on motion of the defendant.

(3) After answer and on January 9, 1920, the place of trial was changed back to the superior court of said city and county in order to promote the convenience of witnesses.

(4) On the same day the defendant perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court from the order changing the place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco.

(5) On February 11, 1920, on due notice and affidavit, said superior court of the county of Humboldt made its order allowing to plaintiff certain sums by way of alimony and counsel fees.

(6) On March 16, 1920, this proceeding was commenced.

(7) Subsequent to the commencement of this proceeding the plaintiff procured the issue of process to compel the defendant, Searcy, to comply with said order for the payment of alimony and counsel fees.

The defendant, Kay, refuses to transmit the papers in conformity with said order changing the place of trial. The petition herein contains an allegation that he bases his refusal upon the ground that the appeal from the order changing the place of trial stays all proceedings upon such order. However, in his answer, he expressly disclaims this as a reason. That the appeal does not stay proceedings is placed beyond all question by the language of the Code itself. Section 949, Code Civ. Proc.

The defendant pleads in his answer that it became necessary to retain the papers in order to make out and certify the usual copies to be used on appeal. But if this point ever had any force it has long since ceased to constitute a justification. This proceeding was not commenced until more than two months after the appeal was taken.

Secondly. The clerk insists that the inauguration of the subsequent proceedings with reference to alimony and counsel fees makes it necessary that he retain the papers for use in the determination thereof.

It becomes unnecessary in this proceeding to inquire whether the lower court has jurisdiction to entertain a motion for alimony and counsel fees pending an appeal from an order changing the place of trial, because this application must be decided adversely to the defendant for other reasons. Section 399 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires a clerk, when an order is made transferring the cause to another court, to transmit the pleadings and papers therein to the clerk of the court to which the action is transferred. Commenting upon this section, the court in Chase v. Superior Court, 154 Cal. 789, 99 Pac. 355, says:

"The question in the case is as to when the action was transferred, or, in other words, was the transfer in fact completed by the order made by the court? The Code provides that the court to which the action is transferred 'has and exercises over the same the like jurisdiction as if it had been originally commenced therein.' We are of the opinion that the action was transferred to Santa Clara county when the order was finally made and entered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. There must be a moment of time when the court transferring the case loses jurisdiction, and the court to which it is transferred acquires jurisdiction. When the court to which the action is transferred acquires jurisdiction, the court which made the order transferring it has no power to make any further order in the premises."

[1] Proceedings upon the order changing the place of trial are not stayed by the appeal. The duty devolved upon the clerk, at once upon the entry of the order, to transmit the papers to the clerk of the superior court to which the action was transferred.

The act of the defendant in appealing from the order changing the venue could not operate to deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of the order of change. No more does the act of the plaintiff in moving for additional alimony and counsel fees. Conceding that the superior court of Humboldt county retained any power or authority in the premises after the entry of its order changing the place of trial, still there can be no question that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco acquired jurisdiction at once by means of the order of transfer, and its clerk became the only person lawfully entitled to the custody of the papers. If the plaintiff had requested the clerk to retain the papers in his office, she would not be permitted to come into court and insist upon a writ against him.

On the contrary, however, she does not ask him to retain them, but she insists that her lawful right to proceed under the order of transfer be conserved by the transfer of the papers to the proper court.

[2] Let a peremptory writ issue requiring the clerk to transmit the papers to the clerk of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

PIONEER FRUIT CO. v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Civ. 3297).

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 8, 1920.)

1. Limitation of actions §27 — Action for breach of contract of shipment not action on oral contract; "bill of lading"; "written contract."

In view of Civ. Code, § 2126, defining a "bill of lading" as an instrument in writing signed by the carrier or its agent, describing the freight so as to identify it, stating the name of the consignor, the terms of the contract for carriage, and agreeing to deliver the freight to a specified person at a specified place, a bill of lading is a written contract, and an action for breach of a contract of shipment in failing to ice the shipment and in permitting an unreasonable delay was not covered by the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1) as to oral contracts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bill of Lading; First Series, Written Contract.]

2. Appeal and error §673(2)—Court cannot know terms of bill of lading when not before it.

The court cannot know on appeal that there was any provision in the bill of lading sued on as to the time within which a claim for damages must be presented, where the parties have not furnished any copy of the bill of lading.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by the Pioneer Fruit Company against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred R. Levee and James E. Kelby, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of $2,576.25, damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff in connection with the shipment of a carload of cherries from San Jose, Cal., to Boston, Mass., during the month of June, 1913, and which were consigned by the plaintiff to a corporation known as California Fruit Distributors through the defendant as shipper, upon a bill of lading issued in compliance with the Interstate Commerce Act. The plaintiff's claim was based upon two alleged breaches of the contract of shipment, in that, first, the defendant allowed the car in which these cherries were transported to be insufficiently iced; second, that the defendant permitted an unreasonable delay to occur in the shipment of the cherries, as a result of both of which alleged breaches of the terms of shipment the cherries arrived in Boston in a damaged condition, to the plaintiff's detriment in the sum for which suit was brought. The defendant denied specifically the averments of the complaint as to any breach of its duty as a carrier in the premises, and also pleaded that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred under the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, and was also barred under the provisions of section 3 of the bill of lading, requiring claims for damages for loss or injury to goods shipped to be made in writing to the carrier at the point of delivery or of origin within four months after the delivery of the property, which claim the defendant avers was not so presented. Upon the trial of the issues thus framed the trial court made its findings in favor of the plaintiff, except as to the amount of its said damages, which it fixed at $574. The defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The main point urged by the appellant relates to the bar of the statute of limitations under the section of the Code above quoted. It is argued by it that this is not an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing, and hence that the action must have been commenced within two years after the liability arose, and that, not having been so commenced, it is barred under said section of the Code. In order to support this proposition the appellant argues that the bill of lading issued by the defendant to the plaintiff upon the receipt of these goods for shipment was not the contract between the parties, but was only a receipt for the goods orally consigned to the defendant for shipment, and that, such consignment being oral, the action must, under said section of the Code, have been commenced within two years.

We are unable to adopt this view of the appellant as to the place and function of a bill of lading in a shipping consignment. Section 2126 of the Civil Code defines a bill of lading as "an instrument in writing, signed by a carrier or his agent, describing the freight so as to identify it, stating the name of the consignor, the terms of the contract for carriage, and agreeing" to deliver the freight to "a specified person at a specified place." In the American & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 521, the status and function of a bill of lading in relation to a shipment of goods are thus defined:

"Although the primary object and purpose of a bill of lading is to express the terms of a contract between the shipper and the carrier, it partakes of the two-fold character of a receipt and a contract; that is, it is a receipt as to the quantity and description of the goods shipped, and a contract as to the transportation and delivery of the goods to the consignee or other person therein designated and upon the terms therein specified."

In the case of Seaboard Airline Ry. v. Luke, 19 Ga. App. 100, 90 S. E. 1041, it was held in relation to an interstate shipment that the bill of lading was the contract between the parties to the shipment, citing Ga., Fla. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., 241 U. S. 190, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948; while in the cases of Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Williamson & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 187 S. W. 354, and N. Y. C. R. R. Co. v. Mutual Orange Distributors, 251 Fed. 230, 163 C. C. A. 386, it was held that the bill of lading constituted the contract for carriage between the parties, for actions for the breach of the terms of which the period of limitations was that provided for the breach of contracts in writing. We find nothing in the authorities cited by the appellant which militates seriously against these views, and hence are entirely satisfied that this action was commenced in time.

[2] As to the second point urged by the appellant, to the effect that the plaintiff did not present a proper claim for damages against the defendant within the time required by the terms of the bill of lading, we find that the record does not bear out this contention, since it sufficiently appears that written notice of the claim was given by the agent of the consignee to the general freight agent of the delivering carrier at the time of the arrival of the shipment at its destination. Besides, the parties to this appeal have not furnished us with any copy of the bill of lading involved in this case, and hence we cannot know that there is any such provision in it as to the time within which the shipper's claim for damages for the breach of its terms must be presented.

No other points being urged upon this appeal, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Municipal corporations §187—Policeman retired on pension has vested right to pension during disability.

Under San Francisco Charter, c. 10, art. 8, § 3, relative to police pensions, a police officer placed on the retired list and regularly granted a pension on proof of disabilities had a vested right to retain his place on the retired list and to have his pension continued until his disabilities should have ceased.

2. Mandamus §107—Lies to compel retention of policeman on retired list on pension.

A police officer retired on a pension under San Francisco Charter, c. 10, art. 8, § 3, because of disabilities, is entitled to a writ of mandate to compel the board of police commissioners acting as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners to maintain him in his position as a retired patrolman and to continue to pay his pension.

3. Municipal corporations §187 — Police board's determination that disabilities had ended and dismissal of policeman for failure to report held void.

As the San Francisco Charter confers on the board of police commissioners no power to finally determine any question of fact in connection with a pension, its attempted action, in its capacity as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, in declaring that a retired policeman's disabilities had ceased, without any proof or showing on the subject and contrary to the practically undisputed fact, was beyond its charter powers, and its acts in so declaring and in ordering him to report for duty and in dismissing him for insubordination in refusing to report were void.

4. Mandamus ☞3(12)—Lies to compel reinstatement and payment of police pension though certiorari would also lie.

Where the San Francisco board of police commissioners acting ex officio as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners found contrary to the fact that a retired policeman's disabilities had ceased and ordered him to report for duty and dismissed him for insubordination in refusing to report, the policeman was entitled to a writ of mandate to compel his reinstatement, and payment of his pension, though he might have applied for a writ of review to test the jurisdiction of the board to make such orders.

5. Mandamus ☞14(1)—Presentation of claim for police pension to auditor and treasurer not condition precedent.

As under San Francisco Charter, c. 10, art. 8, § 9, claims against the police pension fund must be passed on by the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, a policeman without a warrant from that board could not apply to the auditor or treasurer for payment of his claim, and presentation of the claim to them under chapter 4, art. 3, § 1, was not a condition precedent to his application for a writ of mandate to compel such board to pay the pension.

Proceeding by James F. Sheehan for a writ of mandate directed to the Board of Police Commissioners and others. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in a proceeding wherein he sought and obtained a writ of mandate requiring the defendants, as the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, to restore said plaintiff to the position of a police officer of and in the police department of the said municipality, and also to restore the plaintiff to the pension roll of the police and pension fund of said department, and to pay to said plaintiff his accrued pensions as a retired police officer, amounting to the sum of $4,600.

The facts of the case are embraced in the findings of the court which may be summarized as follows: The plaintiff was appointed a police officer of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco on September 20, 1895, and continued in active service as such police officer until August 1, 1899, when he was injured in the performance of his duty by being thrown from a horse which he was breaking to the saddle under the orders of his superior officer, and which said horse fell upon him, causing severe injuries to his head and side, resulting in a total deafness in his right ear and injuries to his brain, producing recurring epileptic convulsions. Thereafter the plaintiff presented to the said board of police commissioners his verified petition, accompanied by suitable certificates and recommendations, requesting his retirement upon a pension on account of his disabilities, which his examining physician certified to be permanent. The said board on October 6, 1903, made its order granting said petition to the effect that the plaintiff should be retired from further service in the police department until his disabilities should cease, and that he be paid from the police relief and pension fund of said police department a yearly pension of $600, being one-half the amount of salary attached to his rank as a patrolman in said department at the time of his said injuries. On January 11, 1904, the said board of police commissioners, who are also ex officio the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, caused a subpoena to be issued and served upon the plaintiff requiring him to appear before them on the afternoon of said day, and show cause why he should not be restored to active duty on the ground that his said disabilities had ceased. The plaintiff appeared at the time appointed in response to said subpoena, whereupon he was informed by said board that it had been reported to it that the plaintiff had been for some time prior thereto in the employ of the United Railroads of San Francisco in a professional capacity, viz., that of an attorney at law. The plaintiff admitted that since his retirement from active duty as a police officer he had become an attorney at law and was employed as such by the United Railroads, but stated that his disabilities for service as a police officer had not ceased, and that he was still unable to perform the duties of a patrolman in the department; and he then applied for a hearing before said board upon a day set when he could produce witnesses and prove his continuing disability for such service. The board of police commissioners refused this application and, thereupon, sitting as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, ordered the plaintiff to report on January 12, 1904, to Dr. O. W. Jones, the police surgeon, for the purpose of physical examination, and to further report to said board at their regular meeting to be held in the evening of the last-named day. The plaintiff endeavored to comply with this direction as to his examination by the police surgeon, but the latter refused to set a date for said examination earlier than January 15, 1904, at which time the plaintiff was to appear to be examined by him. On the evening of January 12, 1904, the plaintiff appeared before said board, sitting as police relief and pension fund commissioners, according to their direction, and informed them of his inability to procure said examination by the police surgeon before January 15, 1904, and requested a postponement of his matter until that time. This request was refused and an immediate hearing ordered to be proceeded with, to which the plaintiff objected upon the ground of the shortness of the time, the absence of his attorney to represent him, and of his witnesses, and requested a continuance until he could procure the attendance of these. This request the board also denied, and thereupon proceeded, without any further hearing or trial or investigation, and without any examination of the facts of the case, to pass a resolution purporting to restore the plaintiff to active duty in the police department of the city and county of San Francisco as a patrolman, and to order the plaintiff to report to the chief of police on the following day for assignment to active duty as such. Plaintiff did not report to the chief of police in accordance with said order, and thereupon charges of insubordination were presented by the chief of police to said board of police commissioners for the plaintiff's said failure to report for active duty. These charges were set for hearing by and before the board of police commissioners for January 26, 1904, and came on for hearing on the evening of said day, whereupon plaintiff appeared and objected to said proceedings upon the ground of want of jurisdiction in the said board to make their said order restoring him to active duty, and hence of a want of jurisdiction in them to try him upon the charge of insubordination for any disobedience of said former order. The board of police commissioners overruled his said objection, and at once proceeded to find the plaintiff guilty of insubordination and to dismiss him from the department. The plaintiff thereafter demanded of said board that they vacate and set aside their said several resolutions, and also repeatedly demanded his restoration to the pension roll as a retired police officer and the payment of his accruing pension as such. All of these demands were refused, whereupon the plaintiff instituted this proceeding in mandamus to compel his restoration and reinstatement as a retired police officer, and also to compel the payment of his accrued and accruing pensions as such. He also instituted a proceeding in the nature of a writ of review to have annulled the aforesaid orders of the board of police commissioners for want of jurisdiction in the board to make the same. Upon the hearing of the plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate in this case, it was affirmatively made to appear that the plaintiff's disabilities which had led to his original retirement from active service in the department had not ceased but still existed, and that by reason thereof the said plaintiff continued to be unable to perform active duty as a patrolman in said department. It was also conceded at the trial that there was at all times in the police relief and pension fund sufficient money to have paid the plaintiff's pension if he should be found entitled to the same.

Upon the foregoing facts as found by the trial court it rendered its judgment in the plaintiff's favor, directing a writ to issue as prayed for, and from such judgment the defendants have prosecuted this appeal.

The charter of the city and county of San Francisco provides in section 3, c. 10, art. 8, thereof, that—

"Any member of the department who shall become physically disabled by reason of any bodily injury received in the performance of his duty upon filing with the commissioners a verified petition setting forth the facts constituting such disability and the cause thereof, accompanied by a certificate signed by the chief of police, the captain of the company to which he belongs, and by two regularly certified physicians of the city and county recommending his retirement upon a pension on account of such disability, may be retired from the department, upon an annual pension equal to one-half the amount of salary attached to the rank which he may have held three years prior to the date of such retirement, to be paid to him during his life and to cease at his death. In case his disability shall cease, his pension shall cease, and he shall be restored to the service, in the rank he occupied, at the time of his retirement."

[1, 2] In the case of Kavanagh v. Board of Police Pension Fund Commissioners, 134 Cal. 50, 66 Pac. 36, it was held that a person entitled to a pension from the police pension fund of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco had a vested right to such pension which could not be taken away by subsequent changes in the charter. It is true that this ruling was made in the construction of a former statute creating a police pension fund in said municipality (Stats. 1889, p. 56); but the Supreme Court, in the case of French v. Cook, 173 Cal. 126, 160 Pac. 411, points out that the provisions of the present charter of the said city and county are so far similar to those of the earlier statute as to justify the application of said former case to the charter in its present form. The plaintiff herein having been regularly granted his pension upon proof of his disabilities had, therefore, a vested right to retain his place upon the retired list and to have his pension continued until his disabilities should have ceased. This being so, the plaintiff, so long as his disabilities continued, would have been entitled to a writ of mandate to compel the board of police commissioners, acting as a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, to maintain him in said position as a retired patrolman and to continue to pay his pension. French v. Cook, supra. In the case last above cited the Supreme Court points out that there is no provision in the present charter of San Francisco confiding to the board of police commissioners, acting in any of its capacities, the power to finally determine any question of fact in connection with such a pension.

"The board is apparently in the same position," says the court, "with relation to such a matter as is any officer required by law to do a prescribed act in a certain contingency, where no special method is provided by law for the ascertainment of the facts. Under such circumstances it may often be true that there is uncertainty or dispute as to the facts, but in such a case the only resort of the officer is such investigation as he may be able to himself make for the purpose of determining his own course of action. His determination as to the facts, however, is not effectual for any other purpose. If not satisfied as to the evidence of the essential facts he may refuse to act until required to do so by the judgment of some tribunal invested with the power to finally determine such controversy, but before such tribunal any conclusion to which he may have come on the facts has no legal force whatever. The sole question there is whether the facts are in reality such as to require the performance of the act, and this altogether regardless of the officer's conclusion as to the facts. The party having a vested right in the performance of the act, if the facts are as claimed by him, has also the right to have his claim as to the facts judicially determined. The functions of the board in such a matter as this are really ministerial only, and come under the same principle as would apply in the case of a county or city auditor, in so far as any finality to its conclusions are concerned. * * * As we read the charter it gives no judicial function whatever to the board in such a matter as this, confers upon it no authority to hear and determine a controversy in a judicial sense. It is not a board or tribunal by law vested with authority to decide a question, and herein lies the distinction between this case and the cases cited in which it was substantially held that the statute was to be construed as submitting the question to the decision of the board or officer. To hold in accord with defendants' claim in this connection would be, as we read the charter, to hold that any officer authorized and required by law to do a prescribed act upon a prescribed contingency, where no method is specially provided for the ascertainment of the facts, is invested with the power to judicially determine the facts, and that his conclusion is a judicial determination as to the facts. Such has never been declared to be the law."

[3, 4] Giving to this language of the Supreme Court full force and effect in its application to the facts of this case, we are constrained to hold that the attempted action of the board of police commissioners, acting in the capacity ex officio of a board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, in declaring that the plaintiff's disabilities had ceased without any proof or showing upon the subject, and in the face of the practically undisputed fact, as shown by the trial of this case, that the plaintiff's disabilities had not ceased, was entirely beyond their charter powers, and hence that their attempted acts in so declaring and in seeking to compel the plaintiff to report for duty as a patrolman, and in ordering his dismissal from the department for alleged insubordination in refusing to obey its order to so report for duty, were each and all void. Being so, the plaintiff had a right to a writ of mandate to compel said board to reinstate him in his position as a retired police officer and to compel the payment of his pension. That he may have had also the right to apply for a writ of review to test in that form of limited inquiry the jurisdiction of the board to make its said several orders cannot be held to have deprived him of his larger and more fully effective remedy by way of a writ of mandate. We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court was correct in holding upon the practically undisputed facts before it that the plaintiff was entitled to such a writ.

[5] As to the appellants' contention that the plaintiff, conceding his right to his writ restoring him to his place upon the retired list, is not entitled to that portion of the relief granted as gives him the right to recover his accrued pension for the reason that he was not shown to have complied with section 1, c. 4, art. 3, of the Charter, requiring the presentation of all claims upon the treasury of said municipality to the auditor and treasurer thereof within a limited period after the demand became due and payable, we are of the opinion that this contention has no merit. We are cited to the case of Geimann v. Board of Police Commissioners, 158 Cal. 748, 112 Pac. 553, as supporting the appellants' contention in this regard. But we think a clear distinction exists between that case and the case at bar, since, as pointed out in that case, the plaintiff therein was urging a salary claim as a police officer which did not require approval by the board of police commissioners before presentation to the auditor in accordance with the requirements of the section of the charter above referred to; while in the instant case the charter (section 9, c. 10, art. 8) specifically requires that claims against the pension fund shall be passed on by the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners, who shall issue warrants to the persons entitled thereto. It is clear that, until the person entitled to such pension had received from that body his warrant, he could not have applied to the auditor or treasurer of the municipality for payment of his claim. The undisputed proofs in this case show that the plaintiff made repeated demands upon the said board for the issuance of his pension warrant, which demands were refused. He could not do more under the charter, and hence was entitled to a writ of mandate compelling the action of said board in this respect also.

Judgment affirmed.

KELLEY v. GOLDSCHMIDT et al.
(Civ. 2081.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 8, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1920.)

1. Guaranty — An independent contract.

A guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person, and a person may become the guarantor even without the knowledge or consent of the principal, under Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2788. It is therefore an independent contract, and an action on a guaranty is one with which the principal debtor has nothing to do.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Guaranty.]

2. Guaranty — 75—Creditor may resort either to guarantor or security furnished by principal.

Where a debt secured by a mortgage or trust deed is guaranteed, the creditor may resort either to the security or the contract of guaranty; a guarantor not having the right given a surety by Civ. Code, § 2850, to compel the holder of security to apply the same to the payment of the debt.

3. Mortgages — 118 — Subsequently given mortgage must express intent to secure performance of contract of guaranty.

To justify a court in holding that the purpose of a mortgage or trust deed given subsequently to the execution of a contract of guaranty was to secure the performance of the contract of guaranty, such intent must be expressed clearly and unequivocally in the mortgage or trust deed.

4. Mortgages — 118 — Subsequently given trust deed held not intended to secure performance of contract of guaranty.

A trust deed given by principal debtor subsequent to the execution of a contract of guaranty "to secure the payment to H. of the debts evidenced by two notes," etc., held not to show an intent to secure the performance of the contract of guaranty as well as payment of the note, although the declaration of trust set out not only the notes, but also the contracts of guaranty; the latter being indorsed on the back of the notes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by H. B. Kelley against Max Goldschmidt and another, individually and as copartners doing business under the fictitious firm name and style of Goldschmidt Bros. From an order denying their motion to discharge an attachment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest C. Griffith, Loewenthal, Loeb & Walker, and Loewenthal, Collins & Loewenthal, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Benjamin E. Page and Arthur C. Hurt, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. The appeal in this action is prosecuted by defendants H. H. Goldschmidt and Goldschmidt Bros. from an order made by the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, on August 7, 1917, denying a motion made by said defendants to discharge an attachment theretofore levied upon certain personal property belonging to them.

The complaint was filed on the 20th day of June, 1917, against the above-named defendants and one Milton Kauffman, but on the 16th day of July, 1917, plaintiff caused the action to be dismissed as against said defendant Kauffman. From that time on the action was against the guarantors alone, and consequently, upon the contract of guaranty only, and thus the action stood when the notice of the motion to discharge the attachment was given on August 1, 1917.

The complaint was in two counts, in the first of which it was alleged that, on or about the 17th day of August, 1915, at the city of Los Angeles, defendant Kauffman, for a valuable consideration, executed and delivered to Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation (hereinafter called the bank), his promissory note in writing for the sum of $19,000, payable on demand; that thereafter, for a valuable consideration, said bank assigned and transferred the said note to plaintiff; that the sum of $5,000 was paid upon said note; and that at the date of the commencement of the action there was due thereon the sum of $14,000.

In the second count of the complaint it was alleged that, contemporaneously with the making of said promissory note and as a part of the same transaction, the defendants Goldschmidt delivered to said bank their written contract of guaranty, indorsed upon the back of said note, by which they guaranteed "the payment of the within note or any renewal or extension thereof, and all expenses of collection thereof," and also agreed to pay reasonable attorney's fees in case suit was brought to enforce the guaranty. The assignment of said guaranty to plaintiff was alleged, as well as demand upon defendants, on the 17th day of November, 1916, that said note be paid, and $1,400 was asserted to be a reasonable fee to be paid plaintiff's attorneys.

On June 22, 1917, plaintiff filed an affidavit for attachment, in which he stated:

"That defendants in the said action are indebted to him in the sum of $14,585.27 * * * upon an express contract, for the direct payment of money, to wit, upon a promissory note and contract of guaranty, and that such contract was made and is payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real estate or personal property, or any pledge of personal property. * * *"

Accompanying said affidavit was a "Statement to Clerk," directing that an attachment be levied upon certain real property in the county of Orange, describing it. On the 25th of June, 1917, another "Statement to Clerk" was delivered to the county clerk, directing the attachment of the wholesale liquor establishment of Goldschmidt Bros. in Los Angeles; "also run a personal property garnishment directed to the Title Insurance & Trust Company."

The return of the sheriff showed that he levied said writ of attachment on "all moneys, goods, credits, debts due or owing, or any other personal property belonging to the defendants, or either of them, in the possession of or under the control of Title Insurance & Trust Company," and that he also attached the "stock of liquors, store fixtures and all other personal property located" in the city of Los Angeles in the possession of defendants Goldschmidt Bros.

On August 1, 1917, the defendants Goldschmidt served and filed a notice of motion to discharge attachment, supported by the affidavit of Herman H. Goldschmidt, one of the defendants, in which it was stated that, after the signing by Goldschmidt Bros. of said contract of guaranty, Valencia Groves Company, a corporation, to secure the repayment of the indebtedness arising out of said promissory note and said contract of guaranty, conveyed to said bank certain real property described in a declaration of trust, and that said bank accepted said declaration of trust. "Affiant states that said real property is still subject to the lien aforesaid, and the statement made by plaintiff in his affidavit for attachment that payment of the alleged contract on which suit was brought has not been secured, is erroneous."

Attached to said affidavit was a copy of said declaration of trust, in which said bank certified and declared that it had received and accepted from the Valencia Groves Company, the trustor, deeds conveying to said trustee certain real property in the county of Los Angeles (describing two parcels of land, the first of which was subject to a mortgage of $90,000 and the second to a mortgage of $85,000), in trust for the following purposes: First, to secure the payment to the bank "of the debts evidenced by two notes, for $19,000 and $2,000, respectively," said note for $19,000 being the one herein sued upon. The contract of guaranty signed by Goldschmidt Bros. on the back of said note is also reproduced. The note for $2,000 bore date January 28, 1916, and was signed by Milton Kauffman and Isaac Kauffman, and contained a guaranty signed by Max Goldschmidt. Second, after the payment in full of the debts evidenced by said notes, to secure the payment of a certain note of the Valencia Groves Company to David S. Unruh for the sum of $2,155.12.

The single question presented hinges on the real meaning and scope of the trust deed. The appellants contend that the declaration of trust was intended to secure payment, not only of the promissory notes referred to in said declaration (one executed by Milton Kauffman and the other by Milton and Isaac Kauffman), but also the performance of the conditions of each of the guaranties indorsed on said notes, the one by Goldschmidt Bros. by Max Goldschmidt, and the other by Max Goldschmidt. The position of the appellants is that the provision in the declaration of trust, to wit, "To secure the payment to Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank * * * of the debts [italics ours] evidenced by two notes," etc., can reasonably be given no other construction than that it means and was intended to mean that the security afforded by the said declaration was to include and cover, not only the promissory notes, but the performance of the contracts of guaranty. With this view of the provision referred to we are unable to agree.

[1] A guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person (Civ. Code, § 2787), and a person may become a guarantor even without the knowledge or consent of the principal (Civ. Code, § 2788). A guaranty is therefore an independent contract—that is, entirely independent of any contract of debt the payment of which is thus assured, and it follows that an action on a guaranty such as the one involved herein is upon an independent contract of the guarantor with which the principal debtor has nothing to do. "The liability of the guarantor depends entirely upon the terms of his contract of guaranty, and 'there is no privity, or mutuality, or joint liability between the principal debtor and his guarantor.'" Cooke v. Mesmer, 164 Cal. 332, 340, 128 Pac. 917, 920. See, also, Adams v. Wallace, 119 Cal. 67, 51 Pac. 14; Kinsel v. Ballou, 151 Cal. 762, 91 Pac. 620.

[2] A mortgage or a trust deed given to secure the performance of an obligation to pay money and a guaranty given for the same purpose are each intended, of course, to subserve the same purpose, and where both are given to secure one single obligation of that character, the one operates merely as additional security to the other. But the creditor may resort either to the one or the other to enforce the payment of the money to secure the payment of which both were given. In case of a contract of surety executed to secure the performance of the obligation which is also secured by a mortgage or other collateral security the law is different. In the latter case, the holder of the mortgage or other security would be compelled to apply to the payment of the debt the property of the debtor which had been mortgaged to secure the debt. Civ. Code, § 2850; Adams v. Wallace, supra. Such, however, is not the case as to a guarantor, as we have shown.

[3, 4] In view of the character and effect of a contract of guaranty, as above indicated—that is, that it creates an obligation wholly independent of that of the debt which it is given to secure—there would have to be to that effect a clear and unequivocal intent expressed in a mortgage or a trust deed given to secure the payment of a large sum of money, where there has also been given a guaranty for the payment of the same debt, to justify a court in holding that the purpose of the mortgage or trust deed, given subsequently to the execution of the contract of guaranty, was to secure payment, not only of the promissory note evidencing such debt, but also to secure the performance of the contract of guaranty. This is true because the guaranty is itself security for the payment of the same debt. It is hardly supposable that in such case property would be hypothecated to secure a security already in existence to secure the debt to secure the payment of which such property is hypothecated. No such intent is clearly and unequivocally expressed in the instrument involved herein. The word "debts" we think it is clear, from a fair and reasonable construction of the declaration of trust, means, and was intended to mean, the debts created by the notes themselves, and was not intended to refer to and include the obligations created by the guarantors by their contracts of guaranty. It is true the declaration of trust sets out therein, not only the notes, but also the contracts of guaranty, but the latter contracts were indorsed on the back of the notes, and it was not only proper, but necessary, as a matter of description—that is, for the purpose of describing the notes to secure the payment of which the trust deed was given—to insert in the declaration of trust the contracts of guaranty.

Our conclusion is that the motion to dissolve the attachment was properly denied, and the order denying said motion is accordingly affirmed.

EDWARDS v. GUARANTY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 3192.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

Gifts — 32(1) — No gift where drawer gave check to payee, but payee did not cash it before drawer's death.

There was no valid gift where the donor's check, given to the payee as a gift, and presented to the drawee bank prior to drawer's death, was not accepted or paid before such death, although payment was rejected without any malicious or wrongful intent, for a reason later shown to be incorrect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by W. S. Edwards against the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, as executor. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Vincent B. Vaughan and Lewis Cruickshank, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. A. Knight, of Long Beach, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff against defendant as executor of the estate of Benjamin Lezer Liveson, deceased, on a "rejected claim," evidenced by a check given to plaintiff by the deceased on February 28, 1916, in the sum of $4,000, and intended as a gift to plaintiff.

From the record it appears that on March 2, 1916, the plaintiff deposited the check in question with the National Bank of Long Beach for collection; that on March 3, 1916, the check was presented to the bank on which it was drawn, and in which it is conceded the deceased had on deposit a sum approximating $9,000, and by said bank payment thereof refused, the check being returned marked "signature incorrect"; and that on March 4, 1916, Liveson, the drawer, died.

The case was tried to the court without a jury, and findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for. The appeal is from the judgment so entered, on the judgment roll alone. There is just one point, and that one of law, in this case. The question with which we are here confronted is: Can a check, given to the payee as a gift, and presented to the drawee prior to the death of the drawer, and not accepted or paid, but payment of which was rejected for any or no reason, constitute a valid gift inter vivos or a gift causa mortis?

So far as material here, the court found as follows: That the deceased executed and delivered the said check as already stated; that at the time of the execution thereof deceased had a sum in excess of $8,000 in the drawee bank, known as a "term account"; that the bank book evidencing such account, in the possession of deceased at and prior to the time of his death, showed "that the bank reserved the right to require on term deposits six months notice of intention to withdraw"; that said bank refused to pay said check, giving as the sole and only reason for such refusal the fact that the signature of said Liveson on said check was "incorrect"; that said bank waived the provisions requiring six months' notice of intention to withdraw from the funds of the said Benjamin Lezer Liveson, and waived the presentation of the pass-book; that the refusal to pay said check was not caused by any malicious intent of the defendant; and that said signature on said check was not incorrect.

As already intimated, the proposition which confronts us on this appeal is whether, under the record here, the intended gift to plaintiff had become complete before the drawer's death, or whether it was merely inchoate. If the transactions between them constituted a completed gift, the money represented by the check—it being conceded here that the drawer had sufficient funds to his credit in the bank to meet the check—belonged to the plaintiff, and, under the facts found, and under this assumed state of facts, it became and was the legal duty of the bank, with respect to the drawer of the check, at least, to honor the same when so presented, although even if, for our present purpose, it be conceded that there was no liability on the part of the bank to the holder of the check. On the other hand, if the gift had not been perfected, but was incomplete at the time of the drawer's death, the money in the bank belonged to the estate of decedent, and descended to his heirs. Under this latter assumption the plaintiff cannot recover.

Counsel for respondent in his brief says:

"We do not know of any case in the United States, and we have looked carefully, where the point involved in the case at bar has been decided."

We, too, have looked, and have, we think, found much law in opposition to the position taken by respondent here. In the case of Provident, etc., v. Sisters, etc., 87 N. J. Eq. 424, 100 Atl. 894, the Court of Chancery of New Jersey had before it a case in its material aspects very similar to the case at bar. Mrs. Bowdoin, an old lady, 86 years of age, had died in the hospital. The day before her death she gave a check to the defendant in that case for $3,000. On the same day the check was given it was presented at the bank upon which it was drawn, and payment was refused, not absolutely, but until investigation could be made. The old lady died the next day, and before any further efforts to collect the check were made. The court in that case—which is a well-considered case, and very illuminating and instructive—among other things said:

"It is well settled that a gift cannot be effected by the delivery of a check upon an ordinary bank of deposit when the drawer's account is good for the amount. The reason is that until the check is cashed the drawer may stop payment. In such a case the donative purpose may be absolute when the check is given, and ten minutes, or ten hours, or ten days later, at any time before the check has been cashed, such donative purpose may be wholly changed and abrogated. The fundamental principle of the law of gifts is that the gift, to be effective, must place the thing donated beyond the control of the donor. Where a check on a bank of deposit is given for value, it often operates as an equitable assignment, but such is not the case where a check is given to the payee as a pure donation. * * * It cannot be questioned in this case that, if Mrs. Bowdoin had given a check on an ordinary bank of deposit, no gift would have been effected until the check had been cashed. Nor does it make any difference what may delay or prevent the check from being cashed."

We are in full accord with this reasoning and the conclusion reached. See notes L. R. A. 1918C, 340; Foxworthy v. Adams (Ky.) 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 308; Estate of Taylor (Pa.) 18 L. R. A. 855. Until the money was actually paid over or transferred from Liveson's account to that of the plaintiff by the drawee bank, the gift, whether it be regarded as inter

vivos or causa mortis, would be revocable, and after the death of Liveson the whole transaction would have stood legally as an incomplete gift, entirely unenforceable at law or in equity. Provident, etc., v. Sisters, etc., supra. "To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, the purpose of the donor to make the gift must be clearly and satisfactorily established, and the gift must be complete by actual, constructive or symbolical delivery, without power of revocation." 20 Cyc. 1193. In order to accomplish this, "there must be a parting by the donor with all present and future legal power and dominion over the property." 20 Cyc. 1196; Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 654, 50 Pac. 757; Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; Simmons v. Savings Society, 31 Ohio, 457, 27 Am. Rep. 521. That the law of this state is as stated in the Provident Case, supra, will be seen by a perusal of that and the other cases cited therein, citing and quoting from the California cases at length.

As the result, therefore, of our own independent search, we are confident that "the great weight of authority supports the proposition that one cannot make his own check * * * the subject of a gift, so that, in the absence of payment, it can be enforced against the donor or his representatives." Foxworthy v. Adams, supra, 136 Ky. 403, 124 S. W. 381, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 308 and note thereunder.

It may be conceded that the record here discloses sufficient facts so that we may infer that it was really the intention of the deceased to make a gift of the money on deposit in the bank, to the extent of $4,000 to plaintiff. Still, as was said in the case of Noble v. Garden, 146 Cal. 225, 79 Pac. 883, 2 Ann. Cas. 1001, "however much we may desire to carry out the intentions of deceased, we cannot do so in this case, because the effect would be to hold valid an oral testamentary disposition of her property," which, under the authorities, as we have seen, cannot legally be done.

Judgment reversed.

MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO.
v. LOS ANGELES R. CORPORATION.
(L. A. 5324.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 17, 1920.)

- 1. Master and servant ⇨410—Charge allowing subrogated compensation insurer to recover damages to sons of deceased employé held erroneous as not supported by pleading and evidence.

In an action by an insurance company, which became subrogated to the rights of the widow and heirs to recover against a stranger for the death of an employé by paying compensation to her, where the only damage pleaded and supported by the evidence was the damage to the widow, an instruction, authorizing recovery of damage to the two sons of deceased as well as to the widow, was erroneous.

- 2. Master and servant ⇨389—Insurer paying compensation to employé's widow held subrogated to rights of sons also.

Where a deceased employé left a widow and two sons, but only the widow claimed compensation and received payment from the insurer, the insurer nevertheless was subrogated to the right to recover damages to the sons as well as to the widow.

- 3. Master and servant ⇨410—Admission by counsel held not to justify charge authorizing subrogated insurance carrier to recover damages not pleaded.

An admission by defendant's counsel that the right of the widow and heirs to recover for the death of deceased vested in the insurer who paid the compensation does not warrant a charge authorizing the insurer to recover damages to the sons of deceased, where it pleaded and proved only damage to the widow.

- 4. Appeal and error ⇨302(2)—Right to complain of error in record not lost by failure to assert in motion for new trial.

The right to complain of an error which appears by the record is not lost by failure to call specific attention to it in motion for a new trial.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company against the Los Angeles Railroad Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake and Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in an action for damages sustained by the death of one, Ogan, through the alleged negligence of the defendant. At the time of his death Ogan was employed by a corporation known as Bowles Bros. Company, and in the course of his employment was driving a wagon westerly on Pico street in Los Angeles. The defendant operates a two-track electric street railroad on the street, the tracks occupying the middle of the street. Ogan was on the northerly or right-hand side of the street as he was going, and off the tracks. On approaching the intersection of South Union street he turned to the left or south across the tracks as if to turn into South Union street. He was driving slowly, and apparently turned without any signal of his intention and without looking back. His wagon was struck by one of the defendant's cars coming up behind him; he was thrown from the wagon and sustained injuries from which he died. He left a widow and two adult sons. His widow made claim against his employer under the Industrial Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279), and the claim was allowed, and was paid by the plaintiff as the insurance carrier for the employer. The plaintiff then brought the present action as subrogated by the Industrial Compensation Act to any right of action against the defendant for Ogan's death.

There seems to be little doubt but that Ogan was guilty of contributory negligence in turning as he did across the defendant's tracks without signal and without looking back. Counsel for the plaintiff do not contend to the contrary. The case was tried for the plaintiff in the lower court chiefly upon the theory that after Ogan had turned and had placed himself in a position of peril, his peril was observed and realized by the motorman of the approaching car in time for him, acting with reasonable promptness under the circumstances, to stop the car and avoid the accident, and he did not do so. It is upon this theory alone that it is sought here to justify the verdict for the plaintiff. If the evidence be sufficient to sustain the verdict upon this ground it is at best but little more than sufficient for that purpose. It is not a case of which it can be said that a verdict for the plaintiff is certainly a just one or that a new trial would reasonably result in another such verdict. In other words it is not a case where it can be said with any certainty that substantial justice has been done and that the result should therefore not be disturbed because of errors which may have occurred in reaching it. There was one substantial error which did occur and which under these circumstances requires a reversal and new trial.

The plaintiff's complaint alleged the fact of Ogan's death through the negligence of the defendant; that he left a widow and two sons of whom the widow was dependent on him for support; that the plaintiff by reason of its payment of the claim of the widow against Ogan's employer had been subrogated to any right of action for his death, and then, as the only allegation of damages suffered, alleged that by reason of Ogan's death, his widow had been damaged in the sum of $10,000. There was no allegation of damage to the sons nor of facts from which such damage might be inferred. The complaint, also, in alleging the right in the plaintiff by way of subrogation to maintain the action alleged it to be to maintain an action for all damages suffered by the widow without mention of any damages to the sons. At the trial no evidence was introduced of any relation between Ogan and his adult sons who were not living with him, which showed any pecuniary damage on their part.

[1] In this condition of the pleadings and the evidence the jury were charged that the action was one prosecuted by the plaintiff to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the widow and sons of Ogan; that the right of the widow and heirs to recover for his death had vested in the plaintiff; that if the jury found for the plaintiff the measure of the recovery which should be allowed was the amount of damages suffered by the heirs; that the jury in fixing damages might consider the relation of the widow and children to their deceased husband and father; and that the fact that the widow and children had been and would be deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of the defendant might be considered in arriving at the pecuniary value of the life of Ogan to his widow and children.

In other words, while the complaint alleged and the evidence showed only damage to the widow, the case was unequivocally submitted to the jury as one wherein their verdict, if they found for the plaintiff, should be for the amount of damages suffered by the adult sons, as well as by the widow. The error in so instructing the jury is manifest.

[2] In this connection it may be well to note a claim made by the defendant. It is that since only the widow made claim against Ogan's employer and was alone paid by the plaintiff, the plaintiff's right by way of subrogation was limited to a recovery of the damages suffered by her alone. This is not correct. The making of a lawful claim for compensation under the Industrial Compensation Act works a subrogation of any right of action to recover for his death, whether the person making the claim be the exclusive beneficiary for whom such action would lie or not. Western States, etc., Co. v. Bayside Lumber Co., 187 Pac. 735. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to maintain an action for any damages suffered by the sons, as well as by the widow. But the point is that it did not bring such an action. The action it brought was only for damages suffered by the widow. The jury, nevertheless, were instructed that the action was one for damages suffered by the sons, as well as by the widow, and that if they found for the plaintiff they should determine the amount of the verdict accordingly.

[3] The only answer made by plaintiff's counsel to the defendant's claim of error in the respect under discussion is: First, that it appears that the trial court in charging the jury stated, "It is admitted by counsel that for the purpose of this litigation the right of the widow and heirs to recover for the death of the deceased husband and father have vested by operation of law in the plaintiff corporation"; and, second, that attention was not called to the point in argument on motion for a new trial when, in fairness, it should have been. It is argued that, in view of the statement in the charge as to admission by counsel, it must be presumed that such admission was made, even though there be, as there is, nothing in the record showing such admission. We need not decide whether such statement in a charge to the jury proves itself, so to speak, without anything in the record to substantiate it, for, assuming that an admission was made as stated, it was plainly no more than an admission of the subrogation worked by law. It was not an admission that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for damages suffered by the sons, as well as by the widow. The language quoted itself shows that it was not this question, but the matter of subrogation which was in the mind of the court as that which was admitted, and a reading of the balance of the instruction confirms this view.

[4] As to the second contention of plaintiff's counsel, that attention was not called to the point in the argument on motion for a new trial when, in fairness, it should have been, suffice it to say, both that this fact does not appear from the record, but only from counsel's statement, and also that it cannot be said that the right to complain of an error appearing on the record is lost by a failure to call specific attention to it in presenting a motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed.

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Cr. 2290.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1920.)

1. Criminal law — 252(1)—Complaint essential to jurisdiction of police court.

It is essential to the jurisdiction of a police court to put a person on trial for public offense that there should be on file a complaint charging such person with the commission of such offense.

2. Habeas corpus — 85(1) — Parol evidence held not to show lack of complaint in police court.

On habeas corpus to procure discharge after conviction in police court, parol evidence introduced held not sufficient to show that no complaint was filed against petitioner in the police court, though there was no record of any complaint.

3. Habeas corpus — 85(1)—Evidence held to show trial.

Evidence that a police officer had testified against petitioner for habeas corpus at the proceedings in police court held to show that there was a trial in such court, notwithstanding petitioner's testimony showing such summary proceedings as would not amount to trial.

4. Habeas corpus — 85(1)—Burden is on prisoner to show lack of trial.

Where petitioner for habeas corpus seeks discharge because there was no trial in the police court before his conviction, the burden is on him to show such lack of trial; errors or insufficiency of the evidence at the trial not being reviewable on habeas corpus proceedings.

5. Criminal law — 251—Constitutional rights of accused must be preserved in police courts.

The constitutional rights of one accused of a crime should be preserved even more strictly in a police court than in higher courts, because of the summary nature of its proceedings, since accused in those courts generally have no counsel to protect their rights.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by Earl Williams for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco to secure discharge from custody after conviction of vagrancy. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

See, also, 186 Pac. 610.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Isadore Golden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in habeas corpus.

The prisoner was confined in the county jail of the city and county of San Francisco under a commitment from the police court showing his conviction therein of vagrancy, and a judgment based thereon of 30 days' imprisonment. The writ of habeas corpus was issued by us upon a petition alleging that no complaint was ever filed against petitioner in said court, that no trial was had and no evidence introduced in said court in support of any charge against him, and that he was denied all opportunity to obtain witnesses to disprove any claim that he was guilty of vagrancy.

[1, 2] It goes without saying that it is essential to the jurisdiction of a police court to put a person upon trial for a public offense that there should be on file therein a complaint charging such person with the commission of such offense. Prisoner's case in this behalf rests solely upon the fact that no complaint charging him with a public offense can be found, or, indeed, that any such complaint has been seen, so far as the evidence shows, at any time since the day on which he was convicted. It appears that it is the practice in the police court to there hold the complaint until the case is disposed of, and then to deliver the same to a department of the county clerk's office where it remains as a part of the files of the office. Apparently no record whatever is kept of the fact of the filing of a complaint, which usually is sworn to before the police judge and delivered by him to the clerk of the court, a deputy county clerk, who thereupon endorses the same as filed. If perchance the complaint is subsequently abstracted or lost, no record of there having been any complaint whatever remains. In a matter involving the personal liberty of individuals, the practice is, to say the least, not to be commended. However, as against the failure to show the complaint itself, or any record thereof or record of the fact of the filing thereof, there is parol evidence tending to show that a complaint was in fact filed in the prisoner's case. The prisoner was arrested without a warrant and booked at the city prison for vagrancy. A daily docket sheet of the arrested persons assigned to a department of the police court is made up and delivered to the deputy clerk of that department, and on this sheet, which apparently constitutes the record of the court for the day, but which is made up and delivered to the clerk entirely regardless of whether any complaint has been filed in any of the cases enumerated thereon, the clerk notes the disposition of each case. The case of the prisoner was shown upon such a sheet, this record showing conviction and judgment. The deputy clerk testified positively that in all cases in which no complaint is ever filed, which sometimes happens when the arrested person is dismissed without trial, a note to that effect is made, and that the fact that no note was here made as to the absence of a complaint shows positively that there was a complaint on file. He further testified that he would not have delivered a commitment in this case unless there had been a complaint filed prior to the delivery of the commitment. The police judge testified substantially that he had no independent personal recollection of this particular case. He further testified substantially that in accord with the practice obtaining in his court a complaint would have been duly sworn to and filed before the trial. The arresting officer testified positively that in this particular case he swore to a complaint before the police judge in open court on the morning of the trial, leaving the same with the judge, and the clerk of the court testified that he saw such a complaint. In addition there is, of course, a presumption that official duty has been duly performed. In view of all the circumstances we do not feel warranted in holding that no complaint was filed in this case.

[3, 4] As to the alleged want of trial, failure to introduce any evidence, and denial of opportunity to procure witnesses on his own behalf, the evidence is conflicting. The prisoner who had been out on bail testified substantially that all there was to his so-called trial was that his name was called and the judge asked him substantially if he had anything to say and he told him that he was working for the "News" (a daily newspaper), that the judge then said that would do and it would be 30 days; and that he then asked the judge to give him time to obtain witnesses who would testify that he was working, and the judge told him that if he said another word he would make it 60 days. He is corroborated to some extent by certain witnesses. Of course, whatever a proceeding of this kind might be styled it would not be the "trial" to which every accused party is entitled, and it could not be tolerated by any respectable court. On this matter, however, the burden of proof was necessarily on the prisoner. Unquestionably the arresting officer went upon the witness stand, and it sufficiently appears that he gave the judge some information about the case. He testified here that he was duly sworn before giving his testimony. We cannot in this habeas corpus proceeding enter into an inquiry as to the sufficiency of his testimony to support a finding of guilt. That was a matter available to the prisoner on an appeal to the superior court. The police judge testified before us and denied each and all of the claims of the prisoner in regard to the proceedings on the trial. The testimony in this regard is not such as to satisfy us that there was in fact no trial.

[5] It was suggested on the argument that somewhat summary methods of disposing of business in the police court are essential to a dispatch of the great number of cases coming on daily therein. This may be conceded, and it might be admitted also that in all courts it should be the aim to dispose of business as quickly as is consistent with the proper and careful administration of justice. But however summary the methods adopted in any court there are certain rights guaranteed by our Constitution to one charged with any crime, entirely regardless of his station in life. These rights are as sacred and inviolable in the police court as in the highest court of the land, and must necessarily be observed therein. Indeed, when we consider the greater opportunity for the disregard of those rights in the police court of a large city dealing in large part as it does with cases of individuals who by reason of their lack of means, friends, and lack of knowledge, are almost entirely dependent upon the court for impartial investigation and disposition of their cases, a greater measure of care on the part of the judge of such a court to see that every right of the defendant is carefully guarded is essential than in a higher court where the defendant is represented by counsel who can ordinarily be relied upon to protect his rights.

It was because the prisoner alleged facts tending to show a disregard of some of those rights and a denial of due process of law that we issued the writ. But the showing before us is not sufficient to convince us that the proceedings in the police court were actually as alleged, and without a convincing showing we are not justified in avoiding what purports to be the result of a regular judicial determination.

The writ is discharged and the prisoner remanded.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and SHAW, LENNON, OLNEY, and WILBUR, JJ., concur.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. Did the police court acquire jurisdiction by the filing of a complaint against the petitioner? If none was filed, the proceeding was wholly void, and concededly the petitioner should be discharged. It is admitted that no complaint could be found at the time of the hearing. Parol evidence was, however, introduced to the effect that prior to the case being called a complaint had been filed. Police Officer William J. Harrington, who arrested the petitioner, testified that a complaint was drawn in the office of the bond and warrant clerk; that he swore to it before the judge in open court; and that he left it on the judge's desk. The judge's testimony on this point was that he had no independent recollection of a complaint, and the official who, it is claimed, framed the pleading, was not produced as a witness. The clerk of the court testified that he had seen a complaint during the proceedings, although in another part of his examination he stated: "I don't remember of no complaint except what is on the calendar sheet." I have reached the conclusion that the clerk was not speaking from recollection, but based his testimony on the custom followed in the police court. This witness called attention to the absence from the loose "docket sheet" of the notation, "no complaint filed," which he said was customarily stamped opposite the title and number of the cause, as they appeared on such sheet, whenever a complaint had not been filed. But, however that may be, the fact remains that no entry of a complaint appeared on the "docket sheet"—which represented the only "minutes" kept by the clerk. Officer Harrington further testified that he saw a complaint in the superior court during the hearing of a similar writ, but that he did not "know what the custom is, whether to bring the original or a copy." He was finally asked whether, so far as he knew, the last time he saw the complaint was not when he swore to it and placed it on the judge's desk, and he answered: "Yes, sir." Attached to the return of the chief of police in the superior court is a printed form of complaint purporting to charge the petitioner with the commission of each of the eleven acts denounced as independent crimes in section 647 of the Penal Code. The names of the petitioner, the complaining witness, and the judge of the police court, and the date it is alleged the specified offenses were committed, are filled in in type-writing. This paper is not certified by the county clerk, the ex officio clerk of the police court, and the custodian of its records. The return does, however, contain this language:

"* * * A copy of which complaint is hereto annexed and the original thereof produced and exhibited to this court."

But no one, who, having knowledge whether an original complaint or a copy thereof was actually "produced and exhibited" in the superior court, was called to testify, nor was any attempt otherwise made to confirm or negative Officer Harrington's testimony in that regard. It may be mentioned in passing that the cases of nine other men were before the court at that time, and that no complaint was produced in any of them.

The prevailing opinion relies in part on the presumption that "official duty has been duly performed." This is a disputable presumption which, unless overcome by other evidence, must prevail. Subdivision 15, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc. But has this rule of presumption any application where the jurisdiction of a court of inferior or limited jurisdiction is called in question? In this respect a distinction is to be drawn between the acquiring of jurisdiction and the proper exercise thereof. The rule of evidence where the jurisdiction of inferior courts is questioned is thus stated in 15 Corpus Juris, at page 832:

"The mere exercise of jurisdiction by courts of inferior, limited, or special jurisdiction, does not raise a presumption of the existence of the requisite jurisdictional facts, for nothing is presumed to be within the jurisdiction of such courts."

It is also said in the same volume, at page 842:

"There being no presumption in favor of the jurisdiction of a court of inferior, limited, or special jurisdiction, it is usually considered necessary, in order to sustain the proceedings of such a court, that the record should affirmatively show that the court had jurisdiction."

Among the cases cited in support of the above text is Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, wherein the petitioner was discharged on habeas corpus on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. It was said in that case at page 214:

"The police court of the city and county of San Francisco is an 'inferior court' of limited jurisdiction, whose powers are conferred, and whose duties and mode of procedure are prescribed, by statute, and to which the rule applies that the evidence of its proceedings must affirmatively show jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and over the subject-matter."

The same rule would, of course, apply where there is no complaint at all. The respondent sets up in his return a "commitment"—which purports to be a "copy," although it is not certified—but, as the issuance of a commitment is an act in the exercise of jurisdiction, and jurisdiction must be affirmatively shown in the case of a court of inferior or limited jurisdiction, it must affirmatively appear that jurisdiction was conferred by the filing of a complaint. Section 1426, Pen. Code. In my opinion, where the jurisdiction of such a court, particularly where life or liberty is involved, is in issue, and especially where it is sought to establish that jurisdiction by parol, the proof must be of the clearest and most convincing character. The law requires, justice demands, and the courts should see to it that the individual is not put to trial unless it plainly appears that the court has jurisdiction to act. In the determination of this question it is not enough that the evidence may tend to show that a complaint was filed or that it may be involved in conflict. We must carefully weigh the evidence and give to it the force to which it is entitled. Speaking as one of the triers of the fact, I am convinced from the evidence, upon whichever side the burden of proof may rest, that the petitioner was sentenced by a court which had never acquired jurisdiction by the filing of a complaint.

I am also convinced from the evidence that the proceedings in the police court did not, either in form or substance, constitute a trial, "according to prescribed forms, and in accordance with the general rules for the protection of individual rights." Kalloch v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 229, 240. In reaching this conclusion I have not failed to observe the distinction between the absence of a trial which would involve a violation of constitutional guaranties, and the erroneous exercise of jurisdiction in the course of a trial the remedy for which would be by appeal. Nor have I considered whether the prisoner was guilty of any or all of the eleven acts specified in the printed form of complaint already alluded to.

The police court of the city and county of San Francisco is the creation of the municipal charter thereof, but also has jurisdiction in crimes prescribed by the state. The Legislature, in title XI of the Penal Code, has provided a special form of procedure in criminal offenses in justices' and police courts: "Police courts" include "police judges' courts." Section 1461. Jurisdiction is acquired by the filing of a complaint. Section 1426. The minutes of the action and proceedings must be kept in a docket. Section 1428. In arraigning the accused, and in the receiving and recording of the plea, the same procedure is required as in the case of an indictment. Section 1429. If a jury is not waived, the charge must be tried by jury, otherwise by the court. Sections 1430 and 1435. Either party may, upon good cause shown, have a reasonable postponement. Section 1433. After a plea or verdict of guilty the court must appoint a time for rendering judgment, which must be not more than two days or less than six hours after the plea or verdict, unless the defendant waive the postponement. Section 1449. "At any time before judgment, defendant may move for a new trial." Section 1450. The judgment must be entered in the minutes of the court. Section 1453. A certified copy of the judgment must be delivered to the sheriff. Section 1455.

The petitioner should have been tried, therefore, under the above procedure, and yet there was a palpable disregard of practically every one of the foregoing provisions. I shall find it necessary, in order adequately to describe the proceedings, to state what was done in the cases of the nine other men—which were before the court and were disposed of at the same time—for the reason that, if it could be said there was an attempt to conduct a hearing, there was at most a single hearing. What happened was this: The petitioner had been released on $25 cash bail and was in the body of the courtroom when the proceedings began. The other nine men were brought from the dock and lined up before the judge. Officer Harrington was sitting in a chair "right alongside" the judge's desk. To my mind the weight of the evidence is against the testimony of Officer Harrington that he was sworn as a witness.

The judge did not remember and the clerk was not questioned as to whether Officer Harrington or any one else was sworn. Charles T. Kelley, who was present, testified that Officer Harrington was not sworn, and Wells Fadden, one of the nine men, stated: "When I come up I don't know whether he was sworn." It was not testified that any other witness was sworn in any of the ten cases. We shall hereafter have occasion to refer to the "docket sheet," wherein petitioner is designated as a witness. At any rate, while the nine men were standing in the presence of the judge, and while the petitioner was making his way to take his place in line—his name being the last called, the judge asked Officer Harrington: "What about these men?" The substance of the reply was that they were vagrants and had been "hanging around Third and Market." The judge thereupon proceeded to ask each man successively: "What have you to say for yourself?" Wells Fadden answered that he was employed by the Santa Fé, but it does not appear that any of the others made a reply to the judge's questions, and it is not claimed that any further inquiry was made into the question of their guilt or innocence. Eight of the men were given "24 hours to leave town," and Wells Fadden was convicted. As already noted, petitioner's case was the last called, and there is some conflict in the testimony as to what was done. Charles T. Kelley testified that the petitioner did not take his place with the others until after eight of the cases had been disposed of; that he did not hear Officer Harrington "say anything after the first review of the men that was brought up"; that Officer Harrington gave no testimony after the petitioner had taken his place at the bar; that no other testimony was taken in any of the ten cases; and that in answer to the judge's question:

"What have you to say for yourself?" "The petitioner said he was working. * * * Then the judge gave him 30 days, and petitioner said to him, 'I am working on the Daily News,' and the judge said, 'If you say anything more, I will make it 60 days,' and the incident was closed."

The petitioner gave this version:

"The judge asked me what I was doing when I was arrested. I told him I was on my way to work, and he said, 'That's enough, 30 days.' I said, 'If you will give me till to-morrow morning, I can get witnesses here to prove that I am working,' and the judge said, 'If you say anything more, I will give you 60 days. Sit down there.' * * * Not to my knowledge, Harrington didn't say anything while I was up. * * * I can't say positively, but I didn't hear him. * * * The charge was not explained to me."

When Wells Fadden was asked: "What happened in the case of Earl Williams?" he answered:

"They called his name. He come up, and the officer testified. * * * He said he was a vagrant and had been hanging around Third and Market. That is all I heard. Q. What happened? A. 'I find you guilty. County jail, 30 days.' * * * Williams asked the judge if he could put the case over until he could consult with his employer, and the judge says, 'If you say anything more, I will give you 60 days,' and he sat down."

This is Officer Harrington's testimony:

"Q. Were you sworn as a witness? A. Yes, sir. * * * I said to the judge that I had arrested this man previously on six different occasions; that I had a complaint from my captain about him begging on Third street, and that he was a dope user, and I had arrested him several times with fiends in the Southern district, and it seems that before this time I had no special complaint about him, but this time I had a complaint by a business man on Third street."

The judge's testimony was as follows:

"So far as the facts of the case and the trial are concerned, I do not remember them. * * * Q. Do you recall whether or not you administered an oath to Mr. Harrington before he testified in the case? A. As far as that as an independent fact I do not recall, except that I administer an oath when a witness goes on the stand. Q. Do you recall Officer Harrington testifying in that case? A. I do. I recall very distinctly, but as to all his testimony, I don't remember. Q. Do you recall anything as to his testimony about this man Williams? A. * * * I will have to say no, I don't. * * * Q. The statement made yesterday of what happened was this in substance: That ten cases of vagrancy were called, and the case of Earl Williams was the last on the list; that nine of these men were in the dock while Earl Williams was in the audience, having been released on bail; that as nine of the ten cases were called nine men came out of the dock and were lined up in front and Earl Williams was making his way out of the audience up to join them; that you went through the list of these men and discharged all but one, who was sent back into the dock convicted; that no testimony whatever was asked for in connection with Earl Williams as he got before you, and you asked him what he had to say for himself, and he replied in substance that he was employed on the Daily News, and you said, according to the testimony here: 'That is enough to hear from you, 30 days. Now let's see what the News can do for you?' And he said, 'Judge,' something to the effect that might he have an opportunity to show that he was employed on the News, and you said to him that if he said anything more it would be 60 days, and that practically all this took place in the courtroom as far as this particular case was concerned. * * * A. I say that is absolutely not true, because I have never convicted men on such evidence. It is not my custom down there, and I have never convicted men on any such testimony."

If it is to be insisted that what took place in the police court constituted a trial according to the law of the land, then, in my opinion, it may justly be said that there is very little left of our boasted constitutional guarantees that one accused of crime shall have a full and fair hearing before being deprived of life or liberty. I do not think that any one of the constitutional requirements of a trial was observed in this case. The petitioner was not asked whether he had counsel, if he desired the aid of counsel, or if he was ready to proceed to trial. No complaint was produced, there was no arraignment, no taking of a plea—unless the inquiry of the judge as to what petitioner had to say for himself can be said to call for a plea, and, except for what appears in the "docket sheet," no "minutes" of proceedings on arraignment were entered. Petitioner was not asked if he waived a trial by jury—one of his fundamental rights—and it is not pretended that it can be ascertained from the records of the police court whether he was proceeded against—if proceeded against at all—alone or in conjunction with the other men. If the former, he was entitled to a separate trial, and it does not appear whether a separate trial was demanded. He was not asked if he was ready to proceed to judgment, and no time was appointed therefor. He was not arraigned for judgment, and no inquiry was made whether he had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced upon him. On a charge of vagrancy evidence as to employment is always admissible, and yet petitioner's request for a postponement, in order—as he claimed—to produce his employer as a witness, was denied. Whatever the judge said to the petitioner in this connection—and undoubtedly he made some remark after sentence was pronounced—I am satisfied that in no true sense was the petitioner given a "trial."

If it be proper to hold in this connection that the testimony on behalf of the respondent may be aided by a presumption of regularity based on the record of the police court, nevertheless the only evidence of a record is the "minutes" in the "docket sheet," which is a printed, unbound page with certain captions, opposite which appear the following entries:

"Offense: Vagrancy.

"Released or in custody: $25.00 bail.

"Plea: Not guilty.

"Arresting officers: Harrington and posse.

"Proceedings: Guilty.

"Witnesses: Defendant and Harrington.

"Judgment: 30 days."

Clearly this record cannot be said to contain any "minutes" of the required statutory steps which I have enumerated, and it cannot be determined therefrom what did take place during the proceedings. The loose "docket sheet" may have some merit as a work-saving device, but it could have no other virtue.

If petitioner were relying here on any one of the indicated departures from the prescribed mode of trial, it might be held that the police court merely erred in the exercise of jurisdiction, and that relief must be sought by appeal. But, in my opinion, even if the police court had acquired jurisdiction by the filing of a complaint, the failure to observe so many essentials of a trial would cause the jurisdiction to lapse and leave the police court without jurisdiction to render a judgment.

It might be assumed from the proceedings that in the case of a "drug addict" or "vagrant" it is not necessary to observe the constitutional requirements of a trial. There is no such discrimination in the law. Indeed, the greater the demoralization of the accused, the more need there is, it would seem, to conserve his rights. I do not think these proceedings should be given our sanction or be accepted as a sufficient compliance with constitutional mandates. It is not enough to moralize on the showing that has been made before us; the proceedings should be condemned as a perversion of law.

I am strongly of the opinion that the petitioner should be discharged on the grounds, first, that no complaint had been filed, and, second, that there was no trial before judgment.

183 Cal. 29

In re MORO'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9125.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 21, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 17, 1920.)

1. Wills §123(3) — Substantial compliance with statutory requirements as to execution essential.

A substantial compliance with the requirements of Civ. Code, § 1276, for the execution of a will, including the requirement that the witnesses must sign at the end of the will, is essential to the validity of any will other than an olographic or noncupative will.

2. Wills §121—Attestation on separate sheet after blank space does not invalidate.

The fact that the attestation clause was on a separate sheet from the concluding provisions of the will and the signature of testator, though there was a sufficient blank space on that sheet, does not invalidate the will, where the sheets were fastened together in proper order so that the attestation clause was upon the sheet immediately following that containing the end of the will.

3. Wills §121—Attestation clause must follow testator's signature so as to occur at "end of the will."

Civ. Code, § 1276, subd. 4, requiring the attestation clause to be at the end of the will, requires that it shall follow the last clause of the will and the testator's signature in such manner that it is apparent from an inspection of the will, without reference to any other evidence, that it was the purpose to attest the will at the end thereof.

Lennon, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Giovanni Moro, also known as John Moro, deceased. Appeal from an order admitting a purported will to probate. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied in bank; Lamar, J., dissenting.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Early, of Petaluma (Fred S. Howell, of Petaluma, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal from an order admitting a purported will to probate as the will of deceased, and denying the petition of appellant for letters of administration. The sole contention of appellant is that the purported will was not executed in the manner required by law.

The only alleged defect in the matter of execution is that the signatures of the two attesting witnesses are not "at the end of the will" as required by subdivision 4, § 1276, Civil Code. The purported will was typewritten on three separate sheets of paper approximately 8½ inches wide by 13 inches long, which, with a cover sheet, indorsed as the will of deceased, were fastened by eyelets at the top. The typewriting commences a little over 2 inches from the top of the first sheet, consumes the entire page, continues on the second sheet, commencing a little over 2 inches from the top, and ends a little over 3½ inches from the top of the second sheet, with, "In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 25th day of June, 1917." The signature of the deceased was placed immediately after this on a line left for that purpose. There are no other signatures on the page, there being a blank space of about 8½ inches to the bottom thereof. On the third sheet or page the typewritten attestation clause commences about 2 inches from the top, occupying about 3 inches, and the signatures of the attesting witnesses are written directly beneath the attestation clause, on lines provided for that purpose, with their respective places of residence stated in typewriting. The third sheet is not numbered at the bottom, the others being numbered at the bottom respectively "1" and "2." The evidence at the hearing was such that there is no pretense that the instrument was not executed and attested in the precise form and order of sheets in which it was filed for probate. The attestation clause and signatures of witnesses follow the signature of the testator, which was properly appended immediately after the last sentence of the will. Looking at the instrument as a whole, it has every appearance of careful preparation and genuineness, and of being in exactly the condition in which it was at the time the various signatures were appended.

The whole claim of appellant is that because of the blank space between the signature of the testator and the commencement of the attestation clause, and the fact that such attestation clause and the signatures of the witnesses are on the succeeding sheet or page instead of on the sheet or page on which appears the testator's signature, the two witnesses did not sign "at the end of the will."

[1] It must be conceded, of course, that substantial compliance with the requirements of section 1276, Civil Code, is essential to the validity of any will other than an olographic or noncupative will. That section requires in subdivision 1 that "It must be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, or some person in his presence and by his direction must subscribe his name thereto," and in subdivision 4 that "there must be two attesting witnesses, each of whom must sign the same as a witness, at the end of the will, at the testator's request and in his presence." Whether there has been substantial compliance with this requirement as to the place of signature of the witnesses is a question that necessarily must be determined solely upon an inspection of the paper itself, assuming, as we must, in view of the circumstances, that the document when signed by the witnesses was in the same condition as when filed for probate. If the signatures are not in fact "at the end of the will" within the meaning of subdivision 4 of section 1276, Civil Code, that is an end of the matter, and it must be held that the will was not executed in the manner prescribed by law.

[2] We think, in view of the appearance of the document itself, that in the determination of this question the mere fact that the attestation clause and signatures of witnesses are on the sheet or page following that on which the testator appended his signature is altogether immaterial. As said in the Matter of Field, 204 N. Y. 448, 454, 97 N. E. 881, 883 (39 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1060, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 842):

"There is no statute forbidding the use of separate sheets or directing how they shall be joined together."

The instrument filed, consisting of the three sheets fastened together as already described, must be regarded as a completed whole, and so regarded each part, down to and including the signatures of the witnesses, follows a previous part naturally and in proper order, with the signatures of the witnesses and their places of residence the very last words of the instrument. The place of such signatures bears the required relation to the conclusion of the will proper, and obviously they were there placed for the sole purpose of legal attestation. If the words of the will itself with the signature of the testator had reached to the very bottom of the second sheet or page, no one could claim with any show of reason whatever that the fact that the attestation clause and signatures followed on another sheet or page instead of on the second sheet or page in any degree affected the question of sufficiency of execution. The real claim of appellant that the signatures of the witnesses are not "at the end of the will" is necessarily based on the fact of the blank space on the second sheet or page following the testator's signature, a space considerably more than sufficient in size to have permitted the insertion therein of the attestation clause and signatures of witnesses.

[3] What is meant by "the end of the will" with reference to the place of signature of testator and witnesses is a question that has received some consideration at the hands of the courts of New York, from which our statute was taken, as well as from this court; but in our opinion no case cited goes to the extent of warranting the rejection of the will here involved on the theory that there was not a substantial compliance with the requirement that the witnesses sign "at the end of the will." It is settled by the decisions that in view of the requirement no portion of the writing constituting the will proper may follow the signatures. This, of course, is clear. So where the purported signatures, whether of testator or witnesses, have been found in places preceding the end of the writing, the will has been rejected as not executed in accord with the imperative demand of the statute. Obviously, the end of the will cannot be at the beginning or in the middle or anywhere else except after the last provision of the instrument itself. The claim of appellant is that, to be "at the end of the will," the signature of the testator must immediately follow the close of the will, without any considerable intervening blank space, and that the signatures of the witnesses, or at least the commencement of the attestation clause, must immediately follow the signature of the testator, without any considerable intervening blank space. In this behalf reliance is placed on certain expressions in the "court" opinion in Estate of Seaman, 146 Cal. 455, 80 Pac. 700, 106 Am. St. Rep. 53, 2 Ann. Cas. 726, where the purported signatures, both of testator and witnesses, were on the back of a folded will, under the printed words of endorsement, "The last will and testament of" under which the name "Henry Seaman" had been written, and a printed form for date of filing, certainly not a natural or proper place for them, or a place bearing any proper relation to the concluding portion of the provisions of the will. While these signatures were subsequent in place to every provision of the will, it was held that the signature of the testator was not at the end of the will within the meaning of the statutory requirement, and that the end of the will "is not the foot or physical end of the sheet of paper upon which the 'will' is written, but is the physical termination of the testamentary provisions which constitute the will." Discussing the requirement as to the testator's signature, "the court" opinion said:

"The requirement that the name shall be subscribed 'at' the end of the will is not satisfied by having that name written at any place 'after' the termination of the written matter, irrespective of the relation which such place bears to the concluding portion of the will. This provision does not, however, of necessity require that it shall be in immediate juxtaposition with the concluding words of the instrument, but that it shall be so near thereto as to afford a reasonable inference that the testator thereby intended to indicate an authentication of the instrument as a completed expression of his testamentary purposes." (The italics are ours.)

The court went on to say that the signature must in fact be placed in such proximity to the testamentary provisions as to constitute a substantial compliance with the statute, and that while a slight space, a single line "or even more," might be left blank, yet to leave blank an "entire page" would indicate a disregard of the statute which should prevent admission of the will to probate. In his concurring opinion Chief Justice Beatty said:

"The true test to determine whether a decedent has subscribed his name at the end of a will is to take the document as it left his hand, and then, disregarding the signatures of the witnesses [which were in the same place as the testator's], and all evidence aliunde, to see whether it is apparent that his name was placed where it appears for the purpose of execution."

In another concurring opinion by the writer of this opinion, concurred in by Justice Shaw, the test of Chief Justice Beatty was accepted as correct, with the further statement that the signature must be after the termination of the testamentary provisions, and that where so placed "the mere extent of space between such termination and the subscription ought not to affect the question as to whether the statute has been complied with, if the document on its face, disregarding the signatures of the witnesses and all evidence aliunde, fairly indicates that the name was so placed by the testator as a subscription and for the purpose of execution," and that "the extent of space is, of course, material upon the question as to what the document does indicate upon its face." It will be seen that the gist of these opinions is that as to the testator's signature it is not enough that the signature be in any place after the termination of the will proper, "irrespective of the relation which such place bears to the concluding portion of the will" (it being in that case on the back of the folded will and under the words of indorsement of the nature and character of the instrument), and that while it is not required that it shall be in immediate juxtaposition with the concluding words of the will, "it shall be so near thereto as to afford a reasonable inference that the testator thereby intended to indicate an authentication of the instrument as a completed expression of his testamentary purposes." This was the express test prescribed by "the court" opinion as regards the testator's signature, and it may here be assumed as suggested by the court, that the intervention of an "entire" blank page between the concluding portion of the will and the signature would require the rejection of the will as showing a material disregard of the provisions of the statute, for the reason that the instrument would not then on its face warrant the required inference. With relation to the signatures of the witnesses the same test would require that they be placed in such a position with relation to the concluding words of the will and so near thereto, and, of course, following the same, as to warrant a reasonable inference that they were placed where they appear solely for the purpose of attesting the execution of the will. If so placed, they are practically and substantially "at the end of the will" within the meaning of the statutory requirement. We consider this to be practically the ruling in Estate of Seaman, supra, and it commends itself to us as correct. In this case the inference to that effect arising upon an inspection of the instrument is irresistible, and we are satisfied that in the respect suggested there was a substantial compliance with the law in the matter of the execution of the will.

We think the distinction between the case at bar and the various cases relied on by learned counsel for appellant is so obvious as to render consideration of those cases unnecessary here.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; WILBUR, J.; OLNEY, J.; LAWLOR, J.

LENNON, J. I dissent. The will in question was not, in my opinion, executed in keeping with the requirements of section 1276 of the Civil Code. That section provides, among other things, that every written will, other than an olographic will, must be signed by two attesting witnesses who must affix their signatures at the end of the will.

The document admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Giovanni Moro is typewritten and consists of three sheets of paper, 8½ inches wide and 13 inches long, fastened together at the top by staples. The dispositive clauses completely fill the first page. A concluding paragraph consisting of four lines appears at the top of the second page and is immediately followed by the signature of Moro. The remainder of the second page, a space of about 8 inches, is blank. The usual attestation clause followed by the signatures of the attesting witnesses appears at the top of the third page and occupies altogether a space of about 5 inches.

The Estate of Seaman, 146 Cal. 455, 80 Pac. 700, 106 Am. St. Rep. 53, 2 Ann. Cas. 726, is the leading case in California on the question of what is meant by the words "at the end of the will" as they are used in section 1276 of the Civil Code. The decision in that case is fully in accord with the New York cases construing a similar statute. The law is stated by the court in that case as follows:

"The provision that the will must be subscribed at the end thereof requires the testator's name to be written at the termination of the testamentary provisions which he makes in the instrument. The 'will' at whose end the name is to be subscribed is not the sheet of paper or other material upon which these testamentary provisions are written, but it is the declaration which the testator has written thereon for such testamentary disposition, and the 'end thereof' is not the foot or physical end of the sheet of paper upon which the 'will' is written, but is the physical termination of the testamentary provisions which constitute the will. * * * "To say that where the name is there is the end of the will is not to observe the statute. That requires that where the end of the will is there shall be the name. It is to make a new law to say that when we find the name there is the end of the will. * * * Sisters of Charity v. Kelly, 67 N. Y. 409; Matter of O'Neil's Will, 91 N. Y. 522; Matter of Andrews' Will, 162 N. Y. 1.

"The requirement that the name shall be subscribed 'at' the end of the will is not satisfied by having that name written at any place 'after' the termination of the written matter, irrespective of the relation which such place bears to the concluding portion of the will. This provision does not, however, of necessity require that it shall be in immediate juxtaposition with the concluding words of the instrument, but that it shall be so near thereto as to afford a reasonable inference that the testator thereby intended to indicate an authentication of the instrument as a completed expression of his testamentary purposes. It must appear upon the face of the instrument not only that he intended to place it at the end of his testamentary provisions, but that he has in fact placed it in such proximity thereto as to constitute a substantial compliance with this requirement of the statute. While a slight space, such as a single line, or even more, might be left blank between the written matter, and the name without impairing the validity of the will, yet to leave blank an entire page between the two would indicate a disregard of the requirements of the statute, whether resulting from ignorance or intention, which should prevent its admission to probate. See Soward v. Soward, 1 Duval (Ky.) 126."

In the Estate of Seaman, supra, as in the instant case, several New York authorities were urged upon the court by the proponent of the will. Of these Matter of Gilman, 38 Barb. 364, may be taken as representative. In the last-mentioned case the written matter of the will terminated four lines above the bottom of the page where the testator signed his name. The court said:

"An instrument is signed at the end when nothing intervenes between the instrument and the subscription. * * * The place named in the statute is the end. The end of an instrument, in writing, commences and continues until something else, or some other writing occurs."

Referring to the quoted words this court said:

"This language may have been appropriate to the will then before the court, but as a construction to be given to the statute it does not meet with our approval, and is moreover inconsistent with the construction given in the above cases cited from the Court of Appeals of that state [New York]. Particularly do we dissent from the definition of 'end' as given in the last sentence of the quotation." Estate of Seaman, supra.

Applying the reasoning of Estate of Seaman to the instant case, it is manifest that the attesting witnesses did not sign "at the end of the will" within the meaning of the statute. In that case the court opinion, which, of course, states the law of the case, distinguishes between the "will," or declarations of the testator, and the physical substance upon which the will is written. According to the reasoning of that opinion it is not sufficient for a signature to a will to be affixed at any place between the termination of the written matter and the physical end of the material substance which contains the writing; in order to be at the "end" of the will, the signature must be placed at the close of the testamentary provisions. The signature must be affixed in such relation to the place which bears the concluding portion of the will as to afford a reasonable inference that the signature was intended to indicate an authentication of the instrument as a completed expression of the testamentary purposes or, in the case of a witness, as an attestation of the execution of the will. But that alone is not sufficient. Irrespective of the indication of intent, it must appear that the signature was in fact placed in such proximity to the end of the testamentary provisions as to constitute a substantial compliance with the statute. A slight space might be left between the signature of the testator and the signatures of the witnesses, "such as a single line or even more," as stated in Estate of Seaman. Here, however, there is a space consisting of two-thirds of a page, "a space considerably more than sufficient in size to have permitted the insertion therein of the attestation clause and signatures of witnesses." The signatures were placed at the top of a different and subsequent page. While the witnesses signed the last of several pages containing a will and there was no writing following the signatures of the witnesses, they did not sign at the termination of the testamentary provisions. Therefore, there has not been in fact an observance of the provisions of section 1276 of the Civil Code as that section has heretofore been interpreted by this court.

It is true that the question determined in the Estate of Seaman related to the position of the signature of the testator. But the requirement of the statute as to the position of the signatures of the witnesses and the signature of the testator is the same. Under the doctrine of the Seaman Case, we would be constrained to declare the will void had the signature of Moro been placed on the third page where the signatures of the witnesses appear. The same language in the same statute cannot be given two totally different interpretations.

"It is a requirement of the statute that both the testator and the witnesses must sign at the end of the will. Wherever the will ends there the signatures must be found, and one place cannot be the end for the purpose of subscribing by the testator and another place be the end for the purpose of signing by the witnesses." Estate of Hewitt, 91 N. Y. 261.

Although appellant does not rely upon any circumstance of fraud in the execution of the will, it may not be amiss to note that the will was not written upon a connected printed form but was typewritten upon several separate sheets of paper; the sheet containing the attestation clause having no connection, physical or otherwise, with the preceding sheets until it was stapled to them. It is not even numbered. It may be noted, moreover, that, while in the will itself the testator is referred to as Giovanni Moro, this being the name which is signed to the will, the testator is referred to in the attestation clause as John Moro. These circumstances are mentioned, not for the purpose of indicating the probability of fraud in this particular case, but to illustrate the undoubted possibilities of fraud, which it is the very purpose of the statute to prevent, should it be held that a will was duly executed where it appeared that the attestation clause and the signatures of the witnesses were placed upon a separate and independent sheet of paper, regardless of intervening space. For all that appears from the document itself, the paper containing the attestation clause may have been attached to the other sheets composing the document months after the signature of the testator was affixed.

Nor is it material that there may have been no fraud in fact in the instant case.

"It would have been wholly unavailing to show that this will was in other respects properly executed; that there was some excuse for not placing the names of the witnesses at the end of the will; that there was the absence of fraud; and that the transaction was attended with entire good faith and fairness. The proof offered would not tend to show that the place where the signatures were signed was the end of the will." Estate of Hewitt, supra.

JONES v. CALIFORNIA GROWERS & SHIPPERS, Inc. (L. A. 6048.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Sales ⇐353(6)—Seller of growing crop, suing for price, need not allege delivery.

In action by seller of growing crop for balance of purchase price, brought while crop was still growing, it was unnecessary to allege delivery.

2. Sales ⇐12—Growing crops subject to absolute sale.

Growing crops are subject to absolute sale.

3. Pleading ⇐279(4) — Installment of price due after action brought may be set up by supplemental complaint.

Nonpayment of balance of purchase price falling due subsequent to commencement of seller's action may be set up by supplemental complaint.

4. Costs ⇐260(4)—Buyer's appeal on ground that delivery was not alleged held frivolous.

In action by seller of growing crop for balance of purchase price, brought while crop was still growing, buyer's appeal from judgment for seller on ground that there was no specific allegation of delivery held frivolous and to warrant $100 penalty, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by H. T. Jones against the California Growers and Shippers, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for appellant.

James W. Griffin, of Holtville, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. [1-4] Plaintiff recovered judgment for $2,600, being the balance of the purchase price of the entire crop of melons growing on his ranch, which was sold by him to the defendant for $4,600, payable $2,000 cash, $600 June 25, 1918, and $2,000 July 1, 1918. Suit was brought June 26, 1918, for $600. Payment of $2,000 having become due July 1, 1918, its nonpayment was set up by supplemental complaint filed July 10, 1918. The findings and judgment being in favor of plaintiff, the defendant appeals upon the judgment roll alone, claiming that there is no specific allegation of delivery.

Appellant attempts to distinguish this case from that of Christensen v. Cram, 156 Cal. 633, 635, 105 Pac. 950, in which, on an appeal on the judgment roll alone, an allegation that the goods "sold" was held sufficient allegation of a completed sale, upon the ground that "in the case at bar the allegation is that the melons were still growing; therefore a delivery in future must of necessity have been contemplated, and the transaction was not a completely executed one." This position is not tenable. Growing crops, as well as other personal property, are subject to absolute sale. Hamilton v. Klinke (App.) 183 Pac. 675. See, also, Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; Brown v. Anderson, 77 Cal. 236, 19 Pac. 487; Wong Foo v. Southern Pacific Co. (App.) 181 Pac. 823; Johnson v. Dixon Farms Co., 29 Cal. App. 52, 155 Pac. 134, 136.

It was proper to set up the nonpayment of the $2,000 note by way of supplemental complaint. The judgment of the trial court was correct. In view of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, the appeal is without semblance of merit, and a penalty for a frivolous appeal should be imposed. Johnson v. Dixon Farms Co., supra.

Judgment affirmed, with penalty of $100 for frivolous appeal.

TIPPS v. LANDERS. (L. A. 6086.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Evidence ☞ 383(8)—Book account, not kept in usual course of business, and not showing all the dealings, of no probative value.

A book of account, showing on its face that it was not kept in the usual course of business and did not contain all the dealings between the parties, had no probative value above mere memoranda to use to refresh the memory.

2. Payment ☞ 67(1)—Check presumed payment of debt and not loan.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 7, a check delivered by one party to an account to the other is presumed to be a payment on an indebtedness due the payee, and not a loan.

3. Witnesses ☞ 167—Plaintiff cannot testify as to correctness of book account against decedent.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, making incompetent testimony as to matter or fact occurring before death of decedent, plaintiff, in an action against an executor, cannot testify that entries in a book concerning transactions with deceased are true and correct.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by J. H. Tipps against Ida B. Landers, executrix of the estate of T. R. Landers, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. E. Gleason and Conkling & Brown, all of El Centro, for appellant.

James W. Glassford and J. J. Simmons, both of El Centro, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to recover $15,485.47. The complaint is in two counts, each for the above amount, the first upon an "open, mutual and current book account," and the second upon an open, mutual current account, between the plaintiff and T. R. Landers. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit. Plaintiff testified that he kept a record of the transactions between himself and the deceased; that the entries were made by him at or about the time of the transactions, on pages 62 and 65 of an old book, from which the two pages 63 and 64 had been torn out, the credit entries to the plaintiff being on page 62 and those against the plaintiff on page 65. These pages were admitted in evidence over the objection of the defendant that no proper foundation had been laid for their introduction. These pages are as follows, to wit:

The evidence shows that the entries were not a correct record made at the time of the transactions and in the usual course of business. The last item in the account of $85.00, dated April 10, 1914, was for eight hogs delivered on January 28, 1914, and was entered in the book on April 10, 1914. The plaintiff paid for these hogs by check on delivery. If the books had been correctly kept there should be a corresponding entry of this amount in favor of the plaintiff. The last item credited to the plaintiff is $50,000, dated March 14, 1914. Plaintiff claims that this item should be $5,000, and the date March 31, 1914, and claims only this amount in his bill of particulars. The item of $300, December 23, 1910, precedes the item of $1,500, December 20, 1910, and the item of June 22, 1911, precedes the item of December 20, 1910. The item of December 20, 1910, was thus entered more than six months after the transaction recorded. In proof of the correctness of the account, the promissory note of July 1, 1910, for $5,692.00 shown in the account, was introduced in evidence, together with the indorsements thereon. These indorsements were as follows:

Paid 9-1-1909	$ 100.00
11-29-1909	1500.00
	100
Paid November 28, 1910	2000.00
Paid 12-10-1910	300.00
Paid 12-23-1910	626.28
Pad 6-22-1915	4526.28

All Pade June 22, 1911.

[1, 2] A comparison of these payments with the account shows that the item of $100, paid September 1, 1909, was not entered in the account at all; that the item of $1,500, paid November 29, 1910, was entered in the account as made December 29, 1910; that the item of $300, paid December 10, 1910, was entered as made December 23, 1910. The $626.28, paid December 23, 1910, was entered as made December 10, 1910. The indorsement: "Pad 6-22-1915 $4526.28" is claimed by plaintiff to be so much of the item of the account, "6-22-1911, $5413.58," as was necessary to complete the payment of the note, the balance of the amount being applied to the $5,000 note executed at the same date. There are four difficulties with this explanation. First, the date of the indorsement is 1915 instead of 1911; second, the sum of all the items, including the item $4,526.28, exceeds by over $3,000 the amount due thereon June 22, 1911; third, the item $4,526.28 is the exact sum of all the previous payments (omitting the undated $100 item, for which there is no corresponding entry in the account). Fourth, the indorsement "All Pade June 22, 1911" is a much more appropriate indorsement, if made at the time the note was surrendered, as plaintiff testifies. Plaintiff testified to the transaction of June 22, 1911, in explanation of the item of $5,413.58 in the account, to the effect that this item consisted of a total of the amount of certain chattel mortgages executed to the plaintiff and by him transferred to the defendant in payment upon the notes as follows:

"P. E. Patterson, mortgagor, $967.50; T. White, mortgagor, $550.00; D. M. Kirklin, $526.00; E. S. McCollum, $1492.50; Louis Fechin, $355.00; Louis Fechin, $365.00; J. H. Stevinson, $1085.00."

The total would be $5,341. Further, at the foot of page 62 is $24,182.55. It is apparent, therefore, that the entry of $50,000 is a mistake, and the amount should be $5,000. This, however, does not tend to establish the correctness of the book. Furthermore, it also appears that all of the transactions between the plaintiff and Landers were not recorded in the book, Otis Tipps testifying in relation to the item of $85, when asked if any other hogs were sold under similar transactions, stated that there were such transactions, and that he was buying hogs all over the country for different parties, and that his father, the plaintiff, and the deceased had extensive business dealings together. The preliminary proof showed that it was not a book kept in the usual course of business, containing all the dealings between the plaintiff and others, nor did it show all the dealings between the plaintiff and T. R. Landers, nor was there sufficient evidence of the correctness of the account. These book entries, therefore, do not rise in probative value above mere memoranda used to refresh the memory of a witness, as they fail in the foregoing essentials as a book of accounts. Landis v. Turner, 14 Cal. 573, 576; Colburn v. Parrett, 27 Cal. App. 541, 544, 545, 150 Pac. 786. These entries should not be considered of any probative value in determining whether or not there was sufficient proof to establish plaintiff's claim. In discussing the account both parties seem to overlook the interest accruing upon the notes. Even without considering this interest respondent claims that the account shows a balance due the deceased of $3,885.52, on the theory that moneys shown by the account as paid to the defendant are presumed to be applied to some indebtedness, and that only the items indicated in the bill of particulars as having been "loaned," etc., are to be considered as credits in favor of plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 7. Appellant contends that, even on this theory, the total debits would be $26,575.87, and that "deducting the credits of $14,806.07 leaves a balance due appellant of $11,769.80." If we assume that at the time plaintiff and wife executed the notes of July 1, 1910, their total was the balance due to the payee, as seems reasonable, and credit plaintiff with all subsequent items claimed in his account, the balance would be in favor of T. R. Landers for $647.12, if we include interest. If we accept the testimony of the plaintiff, incompetent as it was, that the balance due the defendant on the notes after the payment of June 22, 1911, was $3,500, and credit him with all the subsequent items, the balance due the plaintiff would be $5,806.53. But this includes the item of March 14, 1914, and in view of the fact that this item was merely a deposit of plaintiff's check by Landers, the check would be presumed to be a payment on an indebtedness due Landers. Light v. Stevens, 159 Cal. 288, 113 Pac. 659. Ignoring this payment, we would have a balance in favor of the plaintiff of only $806.53. This balance is more than overcome by the fact that no proof other than the account itself was offered as to the items of "November 12, 1912, $600.00" and "January 9, 1913, $500.00"; and these items must therefore be disallowed. It remains to be determined whether there was sufficient evidence, other than the so-called account book, to establish a prima facie case. In addition to the indorsements upon the notes, it was established that certain checks drawn by plaintiff were deposited by Landers in his bank account. These transactions failed to establish any obligation to repay these amounts by reason of the presumption that money paid by one to another is due the latter. Subdivision 7, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.; Light v. Stevens, supra.

[3] In the foregoing discussion we have mentioned evidence given by the plaintiff as a witness in his own behalf. He was, however, an incompetent witness either to establish the correctness of the account, or to testify with reference "to any matter or fact occurring before the death of" T. R. Landers. Section 1880, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc. In Roche v. Ware, 71 Cal. 375, 12 Pac. 284, 60 Am. Rep. 539, it was stated that plaintiff in an action against an executor could testify with reference to the keeping of books and their correctness. This statement as to the right to testify as to the correctness of the book was criticized in the later case of Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142, and shown to be dicta. In Colburn v. Parrett, supra, it was held by the District Court of Appeals, Second District, that in such a case the plaintiff could not testify that the entries were true and correct. We agree with this decision. An examination of the record satisfies us that the defendant did not waive her objection to the incompetence of the plaintiff as a witness, and that his testimony as to all the items and transactions should be therefore ignored by us in determining whether or not the plaintiff has shown any right of recovery against the defendant. Section 1880, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc. Omitting the incompetent evidence improperly admitted, the judgment of nonsuit on the general ground of failure of proof was properly granted. Carter v. Canty, 186 Pac. 346.

In view of the foregoing conclusion it is unnecessary to determine whether the motion for nonsuit upon the ground that the plaintiff's claim was barred by the statute of limitations could be sustained where the bar of the statute is pleaded by section number only (337), and not by subdivision thereof. Wolters v. Thomas, 3 Cal. Unrep. 843, 32 Pac. 565. It may be observed, however, that the only subdivision of that section which could apply to the plaintiff's cause of action would be subdivision 2. In view of this conclusion it is also unnecessary to consider whether or not the account in question is either a mutual open and current account or a book account within the meaning of that subdivision. Therefore we do not decide that question.

Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞706(5) — Evidence held to show that defendant was operating its ambulance at a negligent speed.

In an action for injuries arising out of a collision between plaintiffs' car and defendant's ambulance, evidence held to warrant finding that defendant was operating its ambulance at an excessive speed, and that such negligence was the sole proximate cause of the collision.

2. Appeal and error ☞1001(1)—Verdict based on sufficient evidence not disturbed.

Where the evidence was sufficient to carry to the jury the question of defendant's contributory negligence, its verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Municipal corporations ☞706(4) — Ordinance prescribing duties of drivers on approach of ambulance admissible.

In an action by motorists whose car was struck by an ambulance when they stopped the vehicle at a street intersection to allow the ambulance to pass, an ordinance, prescribing the duties of drivers on the approach of an ambulance, was properly admitted.

4. Appeal and error ☞1053(3) — Defendant cannot complain of admission of ordinance where instructions construed it as he contended.

In an action by motorists for damages from collision with defendant's ambulance, where it appeared that motorists proceeding across a street intersection stopped on the approach of the ambulance, defendant cannot complain of the admission of a municipal ordinance requiring drivers to stop as near the right-hand curb of the street as possible on the approach of an ambulance, where the court charged that the driver of the ambulance was warranted in assuming the motorists would continue, and that, if the stopping was the cause of the accident, there could be no recovery.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Frank Newman and Anna M. Newman, husband and wife, against the E. E. Overholtzer Sons' Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. P. Adams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank P. Doherty and Randall & Bartlett, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiffs recovered damages for personal injuries to Anna Newman and for injuries to a Ford automobile belonging to plaintiffs, resulting from a collision between the defendant's ambulance and plaintiffs' automobile at the intersection of Twenty-fifth and Main streets, Los Angeles. Main street is 69 feet between curbs at the intersection. The ambulance was empty until after the accident, and was not answering a call. It was a long, heavy machine, having a 149-inch wheel base and weighing 4,500 pounds. It was traveling in a northerly direction at a high rate of speed estimated at 35 to 40 miles per hour, straddling the east rail of the double-track street railway on Main street. The machine driven by plaintiff Frank Newman was proceeding westerly on Twenty-fifth street, and entered Main street, in low gear, at 6 miles per hour and was going across the intersection at that speed until near the east rail of the last track when, hearing the loud and insistent ringing of the ambulance gong, it was stopped when the ambulance was, as some witnesses testified, about 100 feet away and remained standing until the collision. The ambulance driver applied brakes, causing the hind wheels of the ambulance to skid to the point of collision. He swerved to the right in an endeavor to pass to the rear of plaintiffs' machine, but was unable to make the turn, either because of too great speed or because another automobile on his right was also passing. The ambulance struck the respondents' car at the rear wheel, swung it around, and stopped within a few feet.

Appellant claims that the decision of the lower court is erroneous for two reasons: First, that the accident occurred by reason of the sudden negligent stopping of respondents' car; second, that the court erred in admitting in evidence an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles containing the following section regulating the conduct of vehicles upon the approach of an ambulance, to wit:

"Upon the approach of any apparatus of the fire department or any police patrol wagon or any ambulance, the driver of any vehicle in or upon any street shall immediately stop such vehicle as near as possible to the right-hand curb of such street, and it shall be unlawful for any such driver to cause or permit such vehicle to be moved until such apparatus, police patrol wagon or ambulance shall have passed such vehicle."

[1, 2] As to the first claim it is sufficient to say that the jury were justified under the evidence in concluding that the appellant was operating its ambulance at an excessive rate of speed in approaching the intersection in question, and that such negligence was the sole proximate cause of the collision. As to whether or not respondents were negligent under the circumstances in stopping to avoid a collision, it is sufficient to say that the question as to whether such conduct was negligence, and, if so, was a proximate cause of the injury, was for the jury to determine, and we cannot interfere with its determination.

[3, 4] Second: It was proper to admit in evidence the ordinance of the city regulating the conduct of vehicles upon a street upon the approach of an ambulance as an element to be considered in determining the question of negligence of both parties. Appellant's principal attack upon the admissibility of the ordinance is that it does not purport to regulate the conduct of drivers of automobiles crossing the street upon which an ambulance is being operated, and therefore should not be construed to justify the stopping of respondents' automobile. The court instructed the jury in effect that the driver of the ambulance had a right to assume that the respondents' machine would "continue in its journey at approximately the same rate of speed and to govern himself accordingly" thus apparently adopting appellant's interpretation of the ordinance, and again with reference to the stopping of respondents' automobile:

"If you find that such stopping constituted negligence, and that it contributed proximately in the slightest degree to the injury, your verdict must be for the defendant."

These instructions were quite as favorable to the appellant as it was entitled to, and under the circumstances left the issue of defendant's negligence and plaintiffs' contributory negligence to the jury as a question of fact. Their verdict is conclusive upon this court.

Judgment affirmed.

GUARANTY LOAN CO. et al. v. FONTANEL.
(S. F. 9238.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1920.)

1. Corporations $\S$ 283(1) — Statutes governing corporations in regard to notice of meetings construed.

Civ. Code, $\S$ 302, providing that the directors of a corporation must be elected annually by its stockholders, which election must be held on the first Tuesday in June if a different date has not been fixed by the by-laws, and that notice of such election unless waived by all stockholders in writing must be given as prescribed in section 301, is the general rule applying to all corporations, and is not to be applied as a special provision relating to notice to be given of the annual election of directors to the exclusion of section 303, providing that a corporation by by-law may provide for the time, place, and manner of calling and conducting meetings, and may dispense with notice of all regular meetings of stockholders or directors, and may provide for the qualifications and duties of directors, the time of their annual election, and the mode and manner of giving notice thereof.

2. Evidence $\S$ 22(2)—Court knows that regular meeting of stockholders is that at which directors are elected.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the only regular meeting of stockholders of 99 out of 100 corporations is a meeting held annually at which the directors of the corporation are elected.

3. Corporations $\S$ 283(1)—Notice of meeting for election of directors may be dispensed with by by-law.

Though under Civ. Code, $\S$ 303, subd. 4, a corporation may adopt a by-law prescribing the method of giving notice of the annual meeting of stockholders to elect directors, under subdivision 1 it may by by-law dispense with such notice.

4. Corporations $\S$ 289—Authority of directors de facto could not be questioned collaterally.

Though election of directors of a corporation was invalid for lack of notice, where persons elected exercised functions of directors, and there was no other set of men claiming to be such officers, if they were not a board de jure they were a board de facto, their authority could not be questioned collaterally, and their right to office could be tested only in a quo warranto proceeding, or under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 803.

5. Corporations $\S$ 193, 194 — Attendance at and participation in meeting by all stockholders waives objections as to call or place.

Attendance at and participation in meeting by all stockholders of a corporation is a waiver of any objection either to the regularity of the call for the meeting or to its place.

6. Corporations $\S$ 290—Secretary who wrongfully refused to transfer stock cannot claim meeting invalid for absence of stockholders.

Where a meeting was attended by all stockholders except three not present only because of the wrongful act of the secretary in refusing to transfer their shares on the books, such secretary, against whom mandamus is sought for delivery of property in his possession to his successor elected at the meeting, cannot take advantage of his own wrongful act by claiming the meeting was invalid because such stockholders were not present.

7. Corporations $\S$ 283(4) — Secretary who wrongfully refused to transfer stock cannot claim stockholders ineligible as directors.

The secretary of a corporation who wrongfully refused to transfer stock to persons elected directors of the company at a meeting cannot be heard to urge their ineligibility as directors on account of not owning stock, when mandamus is sought to require him to deliver property in his possession to his successor as secretary.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by the Guaranty Loan Company and another against Louis Fontanel, secretary of petitioning corporation, to require him to deliver certain property in his possession to his successor as secretary. Writ granted.

Arthur Joel, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Arthur H. Redington and Albert J. Dibblee, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Fabius M. Clarke, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice Kerrigan of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District while acting as justice pro tempore in this court in place of Mr. Justice Melvin. It is adopted as the opinion of this court.

Application for a writ of mandate directed to respondent, Louis Fontanel, commanding him to deliver to petitioners the seal, books, records, and other personal property pertaining to the office of the secretary of the Guaranty Loan Company, a corporation, of which Bernard E. Tormey is alleged in the petition here to be the secretary.

The parties to this proceeding have stipulated as to the main facts of the case, and, so far as they are essential to a determination of the questions herein involved, they may be summarized as follows:

The Guaranty Loan Company is a corporation having an issued and outstanding capital stock of 324 shares. The Goewey Estate Company is also a corporation with an outstanding capital stock of 1,000 shares, one-fifth of which is owned by Charles Goewey. The estate company is what is commonly called a holding company, owning and holding all of the stock of the Guaranty Company with the exception of three shares which stand of record, one in the name of Charles H. Goewey, one in the name of Louis Fontanel, and the remaining share in that of Richard P. Roberts. These last-mentioned shares were also actually owned by the estate company, but had been placed of record in the names of the persons mentioned for the purpose of qualifying them to hold office as directors of the Guaranty Company. The certificates of these three shares had prior to May 26, 1919, been indorsed by their respective holders, and delivered to the Goewey Estate Company.

The by-laws of the estate company provide that the annual meeting of the stockholders shall be held upon a given day in April of each year for the election of directors and such other business as may come before it. They also provide that no notice of such meeting need be given.

The annual meeting for the year 1919 was convened upon April 14th without any notice to the stockholders by publication or otherwise, and 600 of the 1000 outstanding shares were represented thereat. The meeting, however, was adjourned to April 17, 1919, at which time all of the stock of the corporation was represented either by the presence of its owner or by proxy. Upon the announcement by the presiding officer that the next business before the meeting was the election of directors to serve for the ensuing year the proxy for Charles H. Goewey entered a protest against the holding of the meeting upon the ground that no notice thereof by publication had been given. This protest being disregarded, said proxy withdrew from the meeting. The stockholders remaining in attendance thereupon unanimously elected Walter H. White, R. M. Briare, and B. E. Tormey as directors to succeed Charles H. Goewey, Herbert S. Goewey, and Ansen Herrick, directors at that time. There was also adopted a resolution ordering the newly elected directors to cause to be transferred on the books of the Guaranty Company the three shares of stock formerly held by and still standing on the books of the corporation in the names of Goewey, Fontanel, and Roberts, to White, Briare, and Tormey, one share to each. In accordance with this resolution, the new directors of the estate company did on April 20, 1919, demand of Louis Fontanel, as secretary of the Guaranty Company, that he make said transfer; but this Fontanel then and ever since has refused to do. On said 17th day of April, 1919, the new directors of the estate company having organized by the election of R. M. Briare as president and Walter H. White as secretary, also adopted a resolution directing its president and secretary, on behalf of said corporation, as a stockholder of the Guaranty Company, to call a meeting of the last-named corporation for the purpose of removing from office its board of directors and electing new directors in the event the old board was so removed. Thereupon and in pursuance of said resolution, said officers of the Goewey Estate Company, acting on behalf of the corporation as a stockholder of the Guaranty Company, prepared a call for a meeting of the stockholders of the Guaranty Company to be held on May 26, 1919, for such purpose, addressed it to Louis Fontanel, as secretary of the Guaranty Company, requesting that he give notice of such a meeting and of its purpose as required by law, with which request or demand Fontanel refused to comply. On the 23d day of May, 1919, the office of the Guaranty Company being at that time at room 606 Bank of Italy building, San Francisco, its directors, consisting of Messrs. Goewey, Roberts, and Fontanel, passed a resolution changing its meeting place to an office at No. 809 Kearny street.

The meeting of the stockholders of the Guaranty Company for the purpose of removing its directors was held without published notice thereof in the office of the company in the Bank of Italy building, and Charles H. Goewey had no notice thereof. The 321 shares owned by the estate company were represented thereat; and Briare, White, and Tormey, claiming to represent the remaining three shares of the outstanding stock of the company—the transfer of which to their names from the names of Goewey, Roberts and Fontanel had been refused by the respondent—were also present. At this meeting a resolution was adopted removing the board of directors, and thereupon White, Briare, and Tormey were elected as directors in their place. Immediately afterwards the new board of directors proceeded to organize by the election of Briare as president and Tormey as secretary. Three days thereafter at a meeting of the new board of directors, held, however, at a place other than the Bank of Italy building or 809 Kearny street, White resigned as director, and J. W. Treadwell was appointed by the other two directors to fill the vacancy. On June 25, 1919, the board of directors as thus constituted adopted a resolution changing the office of the company back to the old location in the Bank of Italy building.

Under the by-laws of the Guaranty Company the date for holding the annual meeting of stockholders fell on July 10, 1919, and a notice of this meeting was published by both the old and the new board of directors, the former designating 809 Kearny street as the meeting place, and the latter stating that it would be held at room 607 Bank of Italy building. A meeting was in fact held at each of these places. The one called by Fontanel lacked a quorum and adjourned for that reason. The meeting called by Tormey was attended by the proxy of the estate company appointed by its new board of directors, and there was thus represented at that meeting the 321 shares of stock standing of record on the books of the Guaranty Company in the name of the estate company. There were also present at the meeting Treadwell, Briare, and Tormey, and they were elected directors. Thereupon they organized, and the petitioner Tormey was chosen as secretary. Shortly thereafter Tormey made demand on Fontanel for the books and records of the Guaranty Company in his custody. With this demand Fontanel refused to comply, claiming that the property thus demanded was properly in his custody and control as secretary of the company.

The by-laws of the Guaranty Company provide that no transfer of stock shall be valid until recorded in the books of the corporation. They also provide that each director shall hold one or more shares of stock of record in his name on the books of the corporation.

Respondent, upon the facts as stated, contends that the annual meeting of stockholders of the Estate Company was invalid because no notice was given as prescribed by section 301 of the Civil Code, such notice not having been waived by all of the stockholders in writing, and that the election of directors which took place at that meeting was, therefore, void; that consequently such directors were without authority to call the special meeting of the Guaranty Company, which was therefore invalid, and for the further reason that Fontanel having refused to call it, and the alternative method for calling such a meeting prescribed by section 301, Civil Code, not having been followed, no proper or any notice thereof was given. He also claims that the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Guaranty Company held in the Bank of Italy building on July 10th was invalid, first, because it was not held at the office of the company, and second, because it was not held in response to a call of the company's secretary Fontanel. Finally the contention is made that the persons elected as directors at this meeting were ineligible to hold that office because they were not stockholders of record of the company.

We will first consider the asserted invalidity of the election of directors of the Goewey Estate Company at the Stockholders' meeting of April, 1919, upon the ground that the notice thereof required by section 302 of the Civil Code was not given.

That section provides that the directors of a corporation must be elected annually by its stockholders, which election must be held on the first Tuesday in June if a different time therefor has not been fixed by the corporation's by-laws. Notice of this election, unless waived by all the stockholders in writing, must be given as prescribed in section 301 of that Code, and which notice, generally speaking, is by advertisement in a newspaper. Having laid down this general provision, however, the Legislature by section 303 has empowered corporations to make by-laws governing various matters, among them being the time of the annual election of directors and the method of giving notice thereof, and also permits the adoption of a by-law dispensing with the necessity of giving notice of regular meetings of stockholders or directors. Part of the language of this section may with advantage be quoted:

"303. A corporation may by its by-laws, where no other provision is specially made, provide for:

"(1) The time, place and manner of calling and conducting its meetings, and may dispense with notice of all regular meetings of stockholders or directors. * * *

"(4) The qualifications and duties of directors, and also the time of their annual election, and the mode and manner of giving notice thereof. * * *"

Purporting to act under the authority conferred by this section, the Goewey Estate Company by its by-laws fixed the second Tuesday in April at 2 o'clock p. m. as the time for holding the annual election of directors at a meeting to take place on said day each year, and also dispensed with notice of regular meetings of stockholders and directors, and, accordingly, as we have seen, held its election of directors for the year 1919 at a meeting of stockholders in the month of April of that year. The respondent's contention that this election of directors was invalid is based upon a construction of these two sections which would hold that the by-laws of a corporation cannot provide for the method of giving notice of the annual election of directors, nor dispense with notice of the meeting at which such election is held, because of the presence in section 303 of the words "where no other provision is specially made." He contends that section 302 above referred to contains just such a special provision relating to the notice to be given of the annual election of directors of a corporation, and that such special provision is to be applied to the exclusion of anything contained in section 303.

[1] We cannot agree that this is the construction which should be given to the two sections, and for two reasons: First, that in the matter under consideration, namely, the time, place, and manner of holding the annual election of directors of a corporation, section 302 is plainly the general rule upon the matter, applying to all corporations, unless and until they take advantage of the provisions of section 303 and adopt by-laws covering the same matter in a different manner; and, second, that the construction contended for by the respondent would entirely nullify subdivision 4 of the last-mentioned section, and should therefore be avoided if possible.

[2, 3] While subdivision 4 provides that a corporation may by its by-laws prescribe a method of giving notice of the annual election of directors different from the one found in section 302, subdivision 1 in the same section also provides that notice of all regular stockholders' and directors' meetings may be entirely dispensed with. The Goewey Estate Company having adopted a by-law dispensing with notice of such meetings, under which by-law it proceeded in the present instance, the question arises whether the annual meeting of the stockholders for the election of directors is a regular stockholders' meeting. In resolving this question we cannot ignore the fact that it is a matter of common knowledge that the only regular meeting of stockholders of 99 out of 100 corporations is a meeting held annually at which the directors of the corporation are elected. Consequently, while under subdivision 4 of this section the corporation may adopt a by-law prescribing the method of giving notice of such annual election, under subdivision 1 thereof it may by like by-law dispense with notice. This is a procedure frequently followed; and while its wisdom may be doubted as tending to weaken the intimacy of stockholders with the affairs of corporations in which they have a pecuniary interest, it appears to be justified by the language of the Code provision under consideration.

[4] A further answer to the respondent's contention as to the invalidity of this election of directors is that, conceding for the sake of argument such invalidity, the persons elected exercised the functions of such directors, and there was no other set of men claiming to be directors. Under these circumstances, they were de jure certainly de facto the board of directors, and as such their authority could not be questioned collaterally, and their right to the offices claimed and exercised by them could only be tested in a quo warranto proceeding, or by the method provided by section 803, Code of Civil Procedure. Potomac Oil Co. v. Dye, 10 Cal. App. 534, 539, 102 Pac. 677; 2 Cook on Corporations, § 619.

If, as we hold, the election of directors of the Goewey Estate Company held at the stockholders' meeting of April, 1919, was valid, it follows that the other contentions of the respondent, in so far as they are based upon the alleged invalidity of such election, are untenable. Those contentions are that the following acts done by said board of directors, or by Tormey, their secretary, were void and without effect, namely, the appointment of Tormey as secretary; his demand, as such secretary, upon respondent as secretary of the Guaranty Company, upon presentation of the certificates of stock in the latter corporation duly indorsed by Goewey, Roberts, and Fontanel, to transfer the same into the names of White, Tormey, and Briare, and the demand upon Fontanel to call a special meeting of the Guaranty Company for the purpose of removing the board of directors thereof.

This leaves for consideration the contentions of the respondent that the special meeting of the Guaranty Company was not regularly called and that it was not held at the office of the company; hence that the ousting of its board of directors and secretary was ineffectual: that as to the annual meeting of stockholders of this company, at which Treadwell, Briare, and Tormey were elected and the latter appointed secretary, all its proceedings were void, since the said meeting was not held in response to the call of the secretary (Fontanel) and was not held at the office of the company, and that the directors elected thereat were not eligible to hold such office, not being stockholders of record.

[5] Admitting for the sake of argument the justness of respondent's criticisms of both the special and general meetings, those meetings were nevertheless valid if attended and participated in by all the stockholders of the company. Such attendance and participation would be a waiver of any objection, either to the regularity of the call or to the place of meeting. San Buenaventura, etc., Co. v. Vessault et al., 50 Cal. 534; Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1040. The question presents itself, therefore, as to whether or not these meetings were so attended.

The stipulation as to the facts in this case shows that the meetings in question were attended by all of the stockholders of the company of record with the exception of Fontanel, Goewey, and Roberts. As to these three, they were not the beneficial owners of the stock standing in their names, and a demand had previously been made upon the corporation through its secretary for a transfer of their stock into the names of three others, and these latter were present at the meetings. If the demand upon the company for the transfer of these shares of stock was a legal demand (and we have seen that it was), which should have been complied with by Fontanel, as its secretary, then the situation is that these meetings were attended by all stockholders entitled to be present thereat, and that where the stock of any person present was not of record in his name the lack of such record was due to the wrongful refusal of the respondent to make the transfer upon the company's books.

[6] Now, it is true that both by the provisions of the Code and the by-laws of this particular company it was not in general required to recognize as a stockholder any person who did not appear on the books of the company as such; but in this particular case, the refusal of the respondent to make the transfer being wrongful, the fact is that the three record owners of stock who were not present at the meetings were such only because of the wrong of the respondent, acting as secretary of the company. To permit him under these circumstances to deny the validity of these meetings on the grounds now being considered would be to permit him to take advantage of his own wrong. This he cannot do. The case comes clearly within the equitable maxim that that will be considered as done which ought to have been done; so that as between the old board of directors and its secretary on the one side, and the three owners of stock whose demand for its transfer had been refused on the other, the case should be treated as if the latter were stockholders of record, since the fact that they were not is due solely to the wrongful refusal of an officer of the corporation to make them such.

[7] The objection of the respondent that the newly elected board of directors of the Guaranty Company were ineligible to that office is disposed of, we think, by applying to it the same principle to which resort has just been had. If those gentlemen were not stockholders of record of the company, it was because of the wrongful refusal of the respondent to comply with a legal demand for the transfer of stock to their names. He cannot therefore be heard to urge such ineligibility.

This disposes of the points made by the respondent. Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue, commanding said respondent, Louis Fontanel, to turn over to the petitioner the seal, books, papers, records, and other personal property pertaining to the office of secretary, or belonging to said corporation petitioner.

LANG v. LANG. (S. F. 8651.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Pleading §214(3)—Demurrer admits allegation that property belonged to community.

The truth of the allegation of the complaint that the property sought to be partitioned, and alleged to have been acquired by the parties after their marriage, title being taken in defendant's name, was their community property, is admitted under a general demurrer.

2. Divorce §255—Final decree by default on complaint raising no issue as to property not conclusive of property rights.

Final decree in divorce, in so far as setting aside property to the husband, the successful plaintiff, no question of property being put in issue by the complaint, no disposition thereof being prayed, and judgment being by default, is not conclusive on the wife thereafter seeking partition.

3. Homestead §158 — Partition §12(3)—Homestead community property subject to partition after divorce making no disposition of it.

The husband on the granting of a divorce ceasing to be the head of a family, there being no minor children, and none of the persons mentioned in Civ. Code, § 1261, living with him, so that the qualities of the homestead estate were destroyed, the homestead which was carved out of the community property, and of which no proper disposition was made by the divorce decree, and in which the parties thereupon became tenants in common, is subject to partition.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action for partition by Carrie B. Lang against James A. Lang. From interlocutory decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Thompson, of Fresno, for appellant. Everts & Ewing and W. E. Simpson, all of Fresno, for respondent.

The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District while acting as justice pro tempore in this court in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of this court:

This is an appeal from an interlocutory judgment decreeing a partition and sale of certain real property situate in the county of Fresno. The decree was made and entered after the demurrer of the defendant had been overruled and his default entered for failure to answer the complaint. The only question here presented relates to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action.

[1] The pleading recites that the parties to the action intermarried, and subsequently became the owners of certain real property, which forms the subject of this litigation. The defendant herein took title to the property in his own name, but it is alleged in the complaint that such property was the community property of the parties herein. The truth of this allegation, of course, is admitted under the general demurrer. After the acquisition of the property the wife executed and recorded a declaration of homestead thereon. Thereafter the defendant herein, the husband, filed a complaint against his wife, praying for a divorce on the ground of desertion. The complaint contained no allegation either to the effect that there was or was not any community property belonging to the parties, and no mention, either directly or indirectly, was made of this or any property whatsoever. The prayer for relief in the complaint for divorce was simply that the marriage existing between the parties be dissolved and that each of them be released from all the obligations thereof. Summons was served in that action on the defendant, plaintiff herein, and she having failed to appear her default was entered. This divorce action came on for trial, and the prayer of the husband was granted. The court signed and filed its findings and conclusions of law, but nothing therein contained made any reference to the existence of any community or any other property owned by the parties. The interlocutory decree entered in that action made no mention of or any reference to the existence of any community or other property. After the expiration of one year from the entry of the interlocutory decree a final decree was entered by the court. This final decree, however, set apart to the husband the homestead above referred to. Thereafter this action to partition the property so set aside was brought by the wife, and it is from the decree entered in her favor that this appeal is prosecuted.

From the foregoing state of facts two questions are presented to us for determination: First, whether the final decree of divorce which attempted to set aside the property to the defendant in the divorce action is conclusive against the plaintiff here; second, whether community property which has once been impressed with the character of a homestead retains that character after the marriage on which the homestead depended has been dissolved, and for that reason is not a proper subject for partition.

[2] Upon the first question it is contended by the appellant that the final decree of divorce constitutes a conclusive judgment disposing of the community property of the parties to that action, and that such judgment is not subject to attack at the instance of the plaintiff herein. In support of this argument the appellant relies upon the numerous decisions of our appellate courts declaring the general rule that a judgment is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy, but also as to every other matter that was or might have been litigated. This rule, while generally true, is not always applicable literally. Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1-6, 147 Pac. 1168.

"What is really meant by this expression is that a judgment is conclusive upon the issues tendered by the plaintiff's complaint." Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14-18, 66 Pac. 40, 42. Accordingly it has been held that a finding made by a court of a fact upon which there is no issue in the case before it, and which does not enter into or form the basis of the judgment rendered in the action is not admissible in another action between the same parties, either as an admission or by way of estoppel. Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 81 Pac. 542. As long as matters are not tendered as issues in the action they are not affected by it. Brown v. Brown, supra.

Here, in the divorce action between the parties the question of the community homestead was not presented as an issue in the case. The complaint contained no allegation with reference to it, and the court made no finding as to the existence or nonexistence of community or other property; no disposition was attempted to be made of it under the interlocutory decree; and, except for the order in the final decree, it does not appear from the record in the divorce action that the parties thereto owned any property, community or otherwise. The court was therefore without jurisdiction to make any order with reference to the property rights of the parties, such question not being before it. The only relief sought in the divorce complaint was a dissolution of the marriage tie. The defendant in that action (plaintiff here) had the right to assume that the judgment which would follow a default on her part would embrace only the issues presented by the complaint and the relief therein prayed.

Appellant further argues, and cites us to cases, to the effect that the court having had jurisdiction of the divorce case, it had jurisdiction to err, and however erroneous the judgment might be that the only remedy was by appeal. The vice of this argument is that it assumes that the court had jurisdiction of the res. As above pointed out, the status of the parties was the only issue before the court.

Parties to an action for divorce may submit to the court the simple issue of their right to a divorce without reference to their property. Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 671, 118 Pac. 441, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844. This being so, where a complaint in divorce contains no allegation with reference to property rights, a defaulting defendant should be entitled to assume that the only matter which will be determined by the court is the matter of divorce, and that the question of property rights will be left for consideration and determination in another and separate action. In addition thereto, it is a well-established rule that in a default case the relief granted cannot exceed the prayer. Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 Pac. 1073; Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 Pac. 147, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17. And where relief is given beyond the scope of that asked for, it is a nullity, and may be attacked collaterally, or its effect avoided under the doctrine that it is not res judicata. See note to Sache v. Gillette, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 804. From what we have said upon this subject it follows that the judgment in the divorce case was not conclusive upon the plaintiff herein as to her property rights growing out of her marriage relation with defendant.

Upon this question the respondent presents the additional argument that the proper time and place for the determination by the court of the property rights of the parties was at the time of the entry of the interlocutory decree, and not under the final decree. The conclusion we have reached upon this question makes it unnecessary to further discuss this branch of the case.

[3] Upon the second contention counsel for appellant argues that this case falls within the rule that a homestead cannot be made the subject of an action for partition. In this behalf it is contended that property once impressed with a homestead continues ever to be a homestead until abandoned in accordance with the provisions of the statute in relation thereto. Authority can be found to the effect that where the rights of children are concerned the homestead is not affected by the divorce where the decree is silent upon the question. Redfern v. Redfern, 38 Ill. 509; Holcomb v. Holcomb, 18 N. D. 561, 120 N. W. 547, 21 Ann. Cas. 1145; and Byers v. Byers, 21 Iowa, 268. The cases to this effect are based upon the theory that there is still a head of a family within the meaning of the homestead acts, and that the children's rights cannot be affected by the quarrels of their parents. 2 Bishop, Marriage, Divorce and Separation, § 1210. Here, however, the rights of minor children are not involved. The only issue of the marriage was a son, who at the date of the entry of the final decree was an adult. It is not contended that defendant had residing with him upon the property in question any of the persons mentioned in section 1261 of the Civil Code upon which a claim could be based that he was the head of a family. No such questions are presented by this appeal.

Defendant complains of the judgment for the reason that it gives to plaintiff a forced sale of the homestead, by reason of the fact that she voluntarily and without cause abandoned her home—a right denied her had she remained a dutiful wife. As against this claimed hardship resulting from the judgment it might be mentioned that so far as the record shows plaintiff herself is not without cause for complaint. It appears therefrom that she had been the wife of defendant for over 22 years and the decree made no provision whatever for her support and maintenance. However, this may be, the law has made provision for the disposition of the homestead upon the dissolution of a marriage under which the rights of the parties may be equitably adjusted. Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 3. For reasons not disclosed by the record defendant failed to avail himself of this provision, for he raised no such issue in his divorce action. While as a general proposition a homestead cannot be made the subject of an action for partition, the principle has no force when applied to the instant case. Here the family was severed by the decree of divorce, and the qualities of the homestead estate were thereby destroyed. Rosholt v. Mehus, 3 N. D. 513, 57 N. W. 783, 23 L. R. A. 239; Bahn v. Starcke, 89 Tex. 203, 34 S. W. 103, 59 Am. St. Rep. 40. Such a decree is as effectual in producing this result as would be a declaration of abandonment, for where, as here, the homestead having been carved out of the community property, and no proper disposition having been made of it by the decree, the parties became tenants in common thereof, and this being so each had the right to sever their joint ownership. De Godey v. Godey, 39 Cal. 157; Biggi v. Biggi, 98 Cal. 35, 32 Pac. 803, 35 Am. St. Rep. 141; Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 505, 42 Pac. 1064; Tabler v. Peverill, 4 Cal. App. 671, 88 Pac. 994; Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 Pac. 1168; and Shoemaker v. Chalfant, 47 Cal. 432. Under the circumstances of this case defendant upon the granting of the divorce ceased to be the head of a family, and he was no longer entitled to a homestead exemption of the character here involved. Zanone v. Sprague, 16 Cal. App. 333, 116 Pac. 989. No family, no homestead. Waples on Homestead Exemptions, p. 70. The homestead being destroyed, the parties as tenants in common could convey or sever their relative interests therein. Simpson v. Simpson, 80 Cal. 237, 22 Pac. 167; Grupe v. Byers, 73 Cal. 271, 14 Pac. 863; and Brown v. Brown, supra; 13 Ruling Case Law, p. 679.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Brokers ⇐65(1)—Representations of broker as to quality of oil to be produced mere statement of opinion.

A statement made by a broker to his principal that oil to be taken from a well would contain less than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance could be no more than an opinion which could not have deceived the principal.

2. Brokers ⇐65(1)—Principal not deceived by representations disregarded by him.

A principal was not deceived by a representation of his broker that oil to be taken from a well would not contain 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, where the contract entered into between the principal and the seller disclosed no provision to the effect that the oil to be delivered therein should not contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance; it clearly appearing therefrom that such oil would contain substance in excess of such per cent. in contemplation of which the contract provided that in estimating net quantity nonpetroleum substance in excess of 2 per cent. should be deducted, and it being apparent that the representation was disregarded by principal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by George H. Gillons against the Turner Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. Judgment affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

William H. Fuller and Earl L. Wisdom, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell & Mathews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a commission as broker for services rendered to defendant in procuring an oil contract.

Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

The material facts, as they appear from the verified complaint, are: That defendant, on January 31, 1917, made a written contract with the Graham-Loftus Oil Company for the purchase of certain crude oil to be delivered in monthly quantities during the year ending January 31, 1918, as therein specified. On the same date with this contract defendant made and delivered to plaintiff the contract herein sued upon, wherein, after reciting the making of the contract with the Graham-Loftus Oil Company and that plaintiff had rendered certain services to defendant in obtaining the same, it promised and agreed in express terms to pay him six cents per barrel for all the crude oil delivered to defendant by the Graham-Loftus Oil Company under and pursuant to the contract therefor, which payments were to be based upon and determined by monthly settlements had between defendant and the Graham-Loftus Oil Company for oil so delivered; that between the 1st day of August and the 28th day of September, 1917, the defendant, as shown by statements rendered, received from said Graham-Loftus Oil Company 19,808.45 barrels of crude oil, delivered to it by the Graham-Loftus Oil Company pursuant to the terms of said oil contract, for which it made payment; that by reason whereof defendant became obligated under its agreement with plaintiff to pay him $1,188.50, all of which sum remains due and unpaid; none of which material facts are denied by the answer.

As a defense, the answer affirmatively alleged that plaintiff and his partner, one Treat, represented to defendant that the oil to be delivered by the Graham-Loftus Oil Company pursuant to the contract therefor did not and would not when delivered contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, whereas all the oil so contracted to be delivered by the vendor contained more than 5 per cent. of such substance, which, and the fact that said oil would contain such substance in excess of 2 per cent., was well known by plaintiff at the time of the execution of the contract made by defendant to pay him the commission, but that, with intent to deceive defendant, he fraudulently concealed such knowledge from it, who, believing and relying upon the representations so made, was thereby induced to make the contract to pay him said commission.

The court sustained plaintiff's objections to proffered testimony in support of these allegations, and this ruling constitutes appellant's chief ground of complaint. Respondent argues: First, that plaintiff was not the vendor of the oil, but was defendant's broker in procuring the contract from the Graham-Loftus Oil Company; that the contract made with him recites the making of the oil contract; and that as such broker he had rendered services to defendant in procuring this particular contract, for which, with full knowledge of the terms and conditions thereof, it without qualification agreed to pay him the commission; that the oil contract attached to and made a part of the complaint discloses no provision to the effect that the oil to be delivered thereunder, in quantities of 10,000 barrels per month and covering a period of 12 months, should not contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, but, on the contrary, it clearly appears therefrom that such oil would contain substance in excess of said percentage, in contemplation of which the contract provides that in estimating the net quantity of oil delivered each car should be inspected and in ascertaining the net quantity all nonpetroleum substance in excess of 2 per cent. should be deducted therefrom. And hence it is apparent that the representations, if made, were disregarded by defendant. Second, that the alleged representations by plaintiff, assuming them to have been made, were not as to existing facts, but were expressions of opinion as to a commodity to be produced in the future, the quality of which must have necessarily depended not only upon the character of the oil, as and when extracted from the bowels of the earth, but upon the treatment thereof by the vendor prior to its delivery.

[1] We deem it unnecessary to discuss the first proposition, since, in our opinion, respondent's second contention must be sustained. It appears from the contract made between the Graham-Loftus Oil Company and defendant that the oil made the subject thereof was not then produced, but was oil which the vendor as lessee was to receive as royalty during the period covered by the contract from its lessee and to be produced and extracted from wells upon certain lands described in the contract. The representation alleged to have been made by plaintiff was that the oil so to be produced in the future "did not and would not, when delivered to defendant, contain 2 per cent. nonpetroleum substance"; and that Charles H. Treat, alleged to have been a partner of plaintiff, represented to defendant that said oil "so sold and to be delivered was and would be at time of delivery clean and free from sediment or other nonpetroleum substance that might interfere with or prevent the refining thereof through the equipment and under the process and method then in use in the refining plant of said defendant"; and that said Treat further represented to defendant "that he knew that none of said oil as and when delivered to defendant under the terms of the proposed contract of purchase would contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance."

In so far as the representations applied to the then present condition of the oil to be extracted from the sands underneath the surface of the earth, it is apparent that no one could tell with any degree of certainty from day to day or month to month what its quality as produced would be as to content of water and other nonpetroleum substance. Defendant, who was engaged in the purchase of oil, must be deemed chargeable with notice of this obvious fact; and thus knowing that plaintiff and Treat were without means of information enabling them to make the representation as an existing fact, it could not, from the nature and physical circumstances of the case, be calculated to deceive it. Therefore defendant was not justified in considering the statement other than as the expression of belief and opinion that the oil in place was of the quality stated. The alleged statement made by Mr. Treat was to the effect that the oil when delivered would not contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance. This was the expression of an opinion in the nature of a prediction based upon what he believed was the quality of the oil in place or what he believed would be done by the vendor of the oil in extracting nonpetroleum substances therefrom before delivering the same. The alleged representation did not purport to be a statement of an existing fact, but one in the nature of a promise as to the character of oil which the vendor would deliver, and this depended not only upon the purity of oil to be produced from the wells, but also upon the care and process of treatment given it prior to its delivery. Fraud in avoidance of a contract cannot be predicated upon such statements; and from the fact that defendant, in purchasing the oil from the Graham-Loftus Oil Company, contracted for oil containing in excess of 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, it is clear that it did not rely thereon in making its contract to pay plaintiff the commission.

The judgment is affirmed.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, an appeal from a motion for a new trial is unauthorized and will be dismissed.

2. Brokers ⇨65(1)—Principal having independent knowledge could not rely on false representation.

A principal purchasing through a broker oil to be taken from a well could not, in a suit by the broker for commissions, assert that he relied on a representation of the broker that the oil would not contain more than 2 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, where he made an independent investigation and had full knowledge as to the quality and character of the oil before the purchase.

3. Trial ⇨397(5)—Finding on ultimate fact makes other findings unnecessary.

In an action by a broker for commissions, where defendant set up a counterclaim for damages in excess of the commissions claimed, on ground that contract entered into with the third person was procured by broker's fraudulent misrepresentations, a finding for plaintiff on all the allegations of his complaint, and that plaintiff made no misrepresentations or gave any warranty as claimed by defendant, disposed of all material issues in the case, and it was not necessary to make a finding as to the damage alleged to have been suffered by defendant, which was urged as a counterclaim and in support of which evidence was admitted.

4. Appeal and error 1079—Points not argued in brief not considered.

Where appellant in its brief states, "There are many other errors specified in defendant's specifications or errors, but we submit the court's attention has been called to sufficient error to reverse the cause, and without waiving any of the other errors will not further discuss them," the points so presented will not be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by George H. Gillons against the Turner Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller and Earl L. Wisdom, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bordwell & Mathews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. [1] Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,889.59, together with interest, alleged to be due as commission, for negotiating a contract for the purchase of crude oil. Defendant appeals from the judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying motion for a new trial. The latter appeal was unauthorized and is dismissed. Section 963, Code Civ. Proc.

The complaint sets out in full a contract in which it is agreed that the defendant will pay a commission to the plaintiff, at the rate of six cents a barrel, for his services as broker, in procuring a contract between the appellant and the Graham-Loftus Oil Company, for the purchase of a quantity of oil. It also sets forth a contract, between the appellant and the latter company, under which it is further alleged the appellant purchased the oil on which plaintiff claims to be entitled to the commission. Defendant filed an answer and counterclaim in which it alleged, as a defense to the action, and as a basis for the recovery of damages, that the contract to pay the commission was procured through fraud, deceit, and misrepresentations made by the plaintiff, and one Charles H. Treat, who is alleged to be the partner or agent of plaintiff.

In support of its claim defendant alleges that plaintiff and Treat represented to it and warranted that the oil, which defendant contracted through plaintiff to purchase from the Graham-Loftus Oil Company did not, and would not, when delivered to defendant, contain a greater average amount than one per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, and that no part of said oil would contain a greater amount than 2 per cent. of the same material, whereas, in truth and fact, it is averred, all of the oil so purchased under the contract and delivered to the defendant, contained an average quantity of 6 per cent. of nonpetroleum substance, which facts were well known to plaintiff, but were concealed by him for the purpose, and with the intent to wrong and defraud defendant and to induce it to enter into the contract with plaintiff for the payment of the commission. It is further alleged that defendant was unable with its refining plant and equipment to properly refine the oil so purchased, by reason of the excess of nonpetroleum substance, in such manner as to obtain the profit therefrom which it could have obtained had said oil contained less than the specified 2 per cent. of such matter. Defendant placed its loss by reason of the alleged acts of the plaintiff at $53,700.

The court found in favor of the plaintiff on all the allegations of his complaint. On the issues tendered by the answer it found that neither plaintiff nor Treat at any time made the representations or gave any warranty, as claimed by defendant, but made no finding as to the damage alleged to have been suffered by defendant and which was urged as a counterclaim, and in support of which evidence was admitted. Because of these findings the defendant seeks a reversal of the judgment upon two grounds, which we will consider in reverse order from that in which they were presented.

[2] Appellant's contention that the contract sued upon was obtained through fraud, and is therefore void, is disposed of by the court's findings. The execution of the contracts, set out in the complaint, was admitted, as was the receipt of the given quantity of oil and the nonpayment of plaintiff's claim. The defendant is engaged in refining crude oil, and its president is, by occupation, an oil refiner. Prior to the time the defendant entered into the contract with the Graham-Loftus Oil Company, its president made an independent investigation, together with Treat, as to the quality and character of the oil, particularly the amount of water and sediment the oil contained. He was given the "run sheets" of the Graham-Loftus Oil Company, showing the percentage of water and sediment, in the oil produced from the lease of that company, as varying from 1 to 56 per cent. Disinterested witnesses testified as to other facts, clearly establishing that the defendant had full independent knowledge of the character of the oil before it signed the contract for its purchase. Both the plaintiff, and Treat, denied making the statements charged by the defendant. The evidence therefore, amply supports the findings of the trial court that no fraud was practiced in the inception of the contract, and that the alleged misrepresentations were not made.

[3] Appellant asserts that in omitting to find the facts, presented by the allegations in support of its counterclaim for damages, the court failed to find upon a material issue, requiring a reversal of the judgment. We are not prepared to so hold. The ultimate fact in the case is whether or not the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff. Defendant has tendered, as a defense that the contract, under which plaintiff claims, was procured by false and fraudulent misrepresentations, made with intent to induce it to enter into the agreement, is void and affords no basis upon which plaintiff can recover. It therefore denies and puts in issue the indebtedness. All the other contentions revolve around the issue thus presented. Although the defendant may have been damaged by reason of its inability to refine the crude oil purchased by it from the Graham-Loftus Oil Company, the court's findings declare, in effect, that the detriment has occurred through no fault of plaintiff. The court has found, with ample support in the evidence, that no improper act of plaintiff entered into the transaction, that the defense interposed by the defendant cannot avail, and that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the amount prayed for. This was a finding upon the ultimate fact, the amount, if anything, due from the defendant to plaintiff (Jacobs v. Ludemann, 137 Cal. 176, 178, 69 Pac. 965), and necessarily concluded the whole controversy. Tower v. Wilson, 188 Pac. 87.

As the findings disposed of all the material issues in the case, and necessarily defeated the defendant's right of recovery, it was unnecessary that they should go further. Smith v. Dubost, 148 Cal. 622, 624, 84 Pac. 38; Black v. Harrison Home Co., 155 Cal. 121, 132, 99 Pac. 494. The failure to do so was not an error requiring a reversal of this judgment.

[4] Appellant, in its brief, says:

"There are many other errors specified in defendant's specifications of errors, but we submit the court's attention has been called to sufficient error to reverse the cause, and without waiving any of the other errors will not further discuss them."

Points thus presented will not be considered by us. Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 199, 124 Pac. 817; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 689, 76 Pac. 661.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREER-ROBBINS CO. v. INSURANCE CO.
OF STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.
(Civ. 3300.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1920.)

1. Insurance ⇨327—Removal of goods from one compartment of a building to another held not to violate fire policy.

Where goods insured were located in a building divided into two compartments by a fire wall having automatic fire doors, the fact that the goods were moved from one compartment to the other, which act decreased the risk, held not to violate the terms of the policy.

2. Insurance ⇨146(3)—Policy construed in favor of insured.

Where the language and terms of insurance policies are framed and formulated by the insurer, ambiguities therein are to be resolved in favor of insured.

3. Insurance ⇨327—Ambiguities in policy as to removal cleared by proofs.

The ambiguities in a fire policy, insuring goods described as located in a brick building, etc., "situate in the rear of" a given street number, which policy was claimed to have been violated by removal of goods from one side of fire wall to the other, were cleared away by proofs showing that the building was a single brick structure, and that the goods at the time of insurance were not in the rear of such structure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Greer-Robbins Company against the Insurance Company of the State of Pennsylvania. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James, Smith & McCarthy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This was an action upon an insurance policy issued by the defendant to plaintiff on September 23, 1916, covering certain auto supplies and sundries of merchandise belonging to the plaintiff, and being at the time of their destruction by fire in the plaintiff's building at the northeast corner of Flower and Twelfth streets in the city of Los Angeles. The policy in question was a California standard form of fire insurance policy, and the terms thereof, in so far as they relate to the description and location of the property insured, read as follows:

"In consideration of the stipulations herein made, and of $37.50 premium, does insure Greer-Robbins Company, Incorporated * * * to an amount not exceeding $2,500.00 to the following described property while located and contained as described herein and not elsewhere, to wit: $2,500.00 on merchandise, materials, sundries, spare and extra parts * * * all while contained in or attached to the brick building, in basements or under sidewalks thereof, and its additions, situate in the rear of No. 1158 South Flower street, being the northeast corner of West 12th street."

Upon the date of said insurance policy the goods in question were located in a rear room of the plaintiff's building and place of business on the corner of South Flower and Twelfth streets in the city of Los Angeles, but were subsequently moved to a front room of said building, where they were at the time of their destruction by fire. It is the appellant's contention that by the terms of the policy above quoted the obligation of the insurer was to insure said goods only so long as the same were located in the room in the plaintiff's said building in which they were at the time of their insurance, and that their removal to another part of said building terminated the liability of the insurer.

Upon the trial of the cause it appeared that the building and place of business of the plaintiff at the time of the insurance of said property, and also at the time of the destruction thereof by fire, was a single two-story brick building having a frontage of 80 feet on South Flower street and 155 feet on Twelfth street; that a fire wall had been constructed in accordance with a building ordinance of the city of Los Angeles across said building near the middle thereof, through which there were two automatic fire doors connecting the front and rear compartments of said building created by the construction of said fire wall. The trial court found from these facts that the rear portion of the building in which said goods were stored at the time of their insurance did not constitute a separate building or addition, and could not be held to be in any sense a rear or detached building from the plaintiff's main structure, and the court therefore held that the provision of the policy above quoted must be construed as insuring the goods in question while they were contained in any portion of the plaintiff's said building, and hence that the plaintiff, under the terms of said policy, had a right to move and relocate said goods in any portion of its said building without violating the terms of said insurance policy. And the court further found that by the plaintiff's removal of the goods from the rear to the front room of its said building the risk or hazard was decreased. From these findings the trial court drew the conclusion that the plaintiff had not violated the terms of its insurance policy by the change in location of said goods in its said building, and rendered judgment accordingly in plaintiff's favor.

[1, 2] We are entirely satisfied that the court in so doing correctly construed the terms of the insurance policy above set forth. It is true that there is some ambiguity in the language of the policy; but it is well settled that, since the language and terms of insurance policies are framed and formulated by the insurer, whenever ambiguities occur therein they are to be resolved in favor of the insured. Pacific, etc., Co. v. Fire Ins. Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 Pac. 4; Raulet v. Insurance Co., 157 Cal. 215, 107 Pac. 292; Rankin v. Insurance Co., 89 Cal. 209, 26 Pac. 872, 23 Am. St. Rep. 460.

[3] The ambiguities in the present policy were practically cleared away by the proofs in the case, which showed that the plaintiff's building was a single brick structure, and that the goods at the time of their insurance were not in the rear of such structure as the uncertain terms of the policy would seem to indicate, but were actually within the plaintiff's said building at all times, and were simply moved from place to place therein for the convenience of the plaintiff's business. This being so, we are of the opinion that the trial court correctly held that the terms of the plaintiff's policy were not violated by the removal of the goods in question from one part of plaintiff's building to another.

Judgment affirmed.

DE BAIROS v. BARLIN.

BARLIN v. E. B. & A. L. STONE CO. et al.
(Civ. No. 3253; S. F. 9062.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Banc, Denying Hearing, May 21, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 113—Variance between actual and represented description of land held to warrant rescission.

Deficiency of $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet in a represented frontage of 80 feet held material, and to warrant rescission by the purchaser under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1690.

2. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 34—Vendor, misrepresenting frontage of lot without fraudulent intent, guilty of constructive fraud.

A vendor of land, representing a frontage to be 80 feet, without any actual fraudulent intent, was guilty of constructive fraud, where the frontage was only $77\frac{1}{2}$; it being a vendor's duty to inform himself correctly regarding the boundaries of the land he is seeking to sell, in view of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1573.

3. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 107—Motive of vendee in rescinding not inquired into.

The motives of a vendee in rescinding a contract of sale of land may not be inquired into, when he has a legal reason for rescinding.

4. Appeal and error ☞877(6)—Cross-defendants, appealing as group, could not complain of decree affecting respective rights

Where plaintiff and others, as cross-defendants, joined in one answer, and did not ask the court to litigate the matter of their rights as against each other, and, on judgment for defendant, joined in a notice of appeal, argument cannot be made on appeal that the rights of cross-defendants were not properly adjusted among them, since a cross-defendant, considering himself aggrieved, should have appealed therefrom, making the other cross-defendants respondents.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Vendor and purchaser ☞95(2), 101—Acceptance of overdue installments does not eliminate provision that time is of essence.

Acceptance of overdue installments of the price on an executory contract for the sale of land waives any right to declare a forfeiture on account of the previous failures to pay when due, but alone does not change the terms of contract as to forfeiture for future failures, nor eliminate a provision that time is of the essence of the contract, though there may be conduct and acquiescence by a vendor sufficient to justify the inference by a court as a matter of fact that the vendor has waived the condition regarding a forfeiture, in which case the condition may be revived by notice to the vendee.

6. Vendor and purchaser ☞118—Vendee in default may rescind contract for fraud or mistake.

A vendee's right to avoid and rescind a contract of sale for fraud of vendor in procuring its execution, or for mistake inducing its execution, is not lost by his default on payments due on the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Bernardino De Bairos against Jacob J. Barlin, who filed cross-complaint against E. B. & A. L. Stone Company and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant, the plaintiff and cross-defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed by the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. E. Rode, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff and cross-defendants from a judgment against them in an action by which Bernardino De Bairos, as assignee of the other cross-defendants, sought to recover from the defendant $1,069.65, the sum of unpaid installments under three contracts for the sale of real property. Under these contracts, cross-defendants E. B. & A. L. Stone Company and Jennie F. Stone are vendors, and the defendant is the vendee, of a parcel of land in a subdivision of Stonehurst, Brooklyn township, Alameda county, Cal. Title to said property was not to be transferred until all of the payments provided by the contracts had been made.

Defendant answered, denying that the installments were due, and alleged that by mutual mistake of fact there was a deficiency of $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet in the total frontage called for by the three contracts, and that he had rescinded the contracts. He also alleged that, because of said deficiency in said lots, plaintiff could not convey in accordance with the contracts, and that the contracts were not fair, just, and equitable in their terms, but, on the contrary, the purchase price provided therein was grossly in excess of the reasonable and fair value of the lots. He also alleged that plaintiff was suing for the balance due upon the full purchase price of the lots, and had never tendered a deed to defendant. In his cross-complaint, defendant set up the same facts regarding the mistake in the frontage on Pearmain street, and alleged actual fraud and fraudulent representations, as well as a want of consideration, predicated upon said facts, and, in an additional count, prayed for a return of the money paid under the contracts as money had and received by the cross-defendants. The cross-defendants answered, admitting an error in the description, creating a deficiency of $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet, denied knowledge of this at the time of the sale, denied fraud and want of consideration, denied defendant's right to rescind, and offered to allow such rebate as the court might deem equitable on account of the deficiency of $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet.

The court found that the three contracts sued upon constituted a single transaction. The contracts were entered into on June 10, 1910. The vendors had been the owners of an entire tract, including the lots sold to the defendant, and had platted and subdivided this tract into lots. Prior to the sale to defendant, plaintiff's assignors had had two surveys and plats made of this tract. These maps or plats were introduced in evidence. It appears that they are alike in the general platting—the difference between them being that on the first map Plum street (also called 107th avenue) is shown as $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet southeast of its location on the second map, so that the block of land, of which defendant's purchase formed a part, is $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet longer on the first map than on the second map, and lots Nos. 84 and 85 of said tract (being the lots at the corner of Plum and Pearmain streets) are shown with a frontage of 80 feet on the first map and $77\frac{1}{2}$ feet on the second map.

One Hundred and Seventh avenue, or Plum street, was laid out, and the street work and gutters, curbs, etc., were placed, in accordance with the second map. This work, including the cement walks, extended up to the property line and was almost completed on June 10, 1910, when the defendant entered into his contracts. The difficulty arises by reason of the fact that the vendors had arrows stamped in the cement walks as monuments indicating the lot lines, and these arrows were stamped in accordance with the first map. The result was that lots 84 and 85, purchased by defendant, were shown by the arrows placed in the sidewalks to have a frontage of 80 feet on Pearmain street. Neither of the maps were recorded. The description of the property in the contracts was by courses and distances, and, on its face, conveyed 80 feet on Pearmain street. The testimony of the surveyor was, however, that, if this description were followed, it would lead to a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ feet across the line of 107th avenue. The testimony of the defendant and his wife is that, when they went to look at the property with the agent of the vendor, they were shown the arrows in the cement walk, which indicated that the property had a frontage on Pearmain street of 80 feet by a depth of 100 feet along 107th avenue; the depth being indicated also by an arrow.

With respect to the finding that the three contracts were entered into as one transaction, there appears the testimony of defendant's wife that they bought the entire property (supposedly 80 feet) as one piece, and then asked the agent if he would divide it up in the contracts, so that one lot would have 30 feet frontage, and the other two would have a frontage of 25 feet each, and could be held by them for their sons who were at that time children. The boys had nothing to do with the purchase, and never paid any part of the consideration, and it was merely the idea of the mother, after the purchase had been decided upon, that portions of the land should be held by the father for the boys. The testimony of the defendant was to the same effect. Both testified, also, that they really wished a larger lot than the one they thought they were purchasing, but, not being able to secure an additional 5 or 10 feet, took what was represented to them as 80 feet. They testified that the lots scarcely would be large enough to meet their requirements if they were as represented, and that they would not have purchased them if they had known that they were only $77\frac{1}{2}$ feet in the aggregate.

[1] Of course, the question of what is a material difference between the actual and represented description of land is a question of fact, and varies with the circumstances and the uses of the land and the size of the parcel being sold. There was some evidence in the record which, appellants insist, indicates that the discrepancy was not material in the present case, because of the use of the land contemplated by the defendant. There are other considerations, however, which evidently weighed with the trial court in making its findings upon this point. The defendant testified that he thought the lots were in a section which would develop and improve rapidly, that the agent so stated to him, and that the agent also stated that in a short time trains would run every hour from East Fourteenth street to Stonehurst station. The use to which such a lot may be put in the future is uncertain. The defendant may have had an idea at the time of purchasing of using the place as a home, but he was not bound by that intention. It was his privilege to use the lot in any manner that might be most profitable at any later date, or to sell the same for use by others.

There might be many uses to which an 80-foot lot could be put, which would not be equally well met by a $77\frac{1}{2}$ -foot lot. The sale value of such a lot might be materially different if it contained 80 front feet than it would be if it contained only $77\frac{1}{2}$ feet, and the difference in value, we think, would not be a matter of exact measurement. The appellants' main argument upon this question is that, because the defendant testified that he thought when he got old he might build a home on the lot and have a garden and chickens, therefore it appears that the smaller lot would serve such purpose as well. The value of one's property certainly cannot be fairly estimated, without taking into consideration the ever-present possibility of sale. We think, therefore, that the finding of the court that the deficiency was material, is warranted under all the facts and circumstances in evidence. From the direct evidence of the defendant and his wife that they would not have bought less than 80 feet; that the lots were too small, even at that measurement, the court was justified in concluding that this was a material inducement for entering into the contract. We think the deficiency was not capable of exact and entire compensation, and the right of the defendant to rescind under such conditions is recognized in section 1690, Civil Code.

[2] The court found that the vendors had been guilty of fraud in misrepresenting the frontage of the lots. Constructive fraud is defined by our Code as:

"Any breach of duty which without an actual fraudulent intent, gains an advantage to the person in fault * * * by misleading another to his prejudice." Section 1573, Civ. Code.

It was certainly a breach of the vendor's duty not to inform himself correctly regarding the boundaries of the land he was seeking to sell. Furthermore, it appears that the vendor had in its possession at that time the two maps, which gave different measurements for this property, and it was its duty to become aware of this fact, and to investigate and ascertain the truth, before making any representations in regard thereto. It had at hand the means of ascertaining the truth, and defendant did not have, because the maps were not recorded. Furthermore, it appears in the record, by the testimony of R. P. Macdonald, secretary of E. B. & A. L. Stone Company, that the two maps were made, and that there was a change in the second map, and that the attention of the company was called to this about two years later, at which time the company wrote to the surveyor, asking for an explanation. They received no reply and evidently nothing more was done about it. Thereafter, for several years, with actual as well as constructive knowledge of the discrepancy, the vendors continued to demand payment of the full purchase price from the defendant and to receive partial payments thereon, and made no allowance for, or explanation of, the discrepancy, and charged interest and compound interest upon their books against the defendant upon the entire purchase price. Indeed, the vendors made no attempt in any way to remedy the mistake until the defendant discovered the facts and rescinded the contracts, which was after the commencement of the present action, by which it was still sought to enforce the payment of the purchase price agreed upon for 80 feet of land.

Another question argued by appellants is that the defendant may not rescind because he was delinquent in his payments due under the contracts at the time of the attempted rescission, and that he must fully perform his part of the contract in order to come into equity with clean hands. It appears that the vendors accepted overdue payments from time to time under the contracts, and thus waived the provision that time was of the essence of the contracts. They have not terminated the contracts because of defendant's default, but, on the contrary, they have considered the contracts as in full force and effect, and have sued to recover the installments due thereunder. If they keep the contracts alive by their own election, they must keep them alive for all purposes, and bear their burdens as well as accept their benefits. If the contracts were in full force and effect, and a mistake had been made in a material fact, which was their inducement, they could be rescinded. The evidence is that defendant rescinded promptly after discovery of the misrepresentations.

[3] Appellants urge that the real reason why the defendant desires to rescind is that at this time he has not the money necessary to make his payments. The courts have held that the motives of the vendee in rescinding may not be inquired into, when he has a legal reason for rescinding and relies thereon. Cabrera v. Payne, 10 Cal. App. 675, 678, 103 Pac. 176; Crim. v. Umlsen, 155 Cal. 697, 702, 103 Pac. 178, 132 Am. St. Rep. 127.

[4] The deed from Stone Company, by which the plaintiff acquired his interest in the property in controversy, was introduced in evidence. The court found this deed to be in fact a mortgage. This finding was based upon the following clause in the deed:

"This deed is given to secure cash advances of $761.72, the amount of the consideration hereinbefore named on the property hereinbefore named."

There were also in evidence assignments of the contracts sued upon, which assignments recited that the interest of the assignors in the contracts and in the property covered thereby were transferred to the assignee, the plaintiff here. Appellants contend that, even though the above-quoted clause in the deed may have raised a doubt as to the character of the deed, the assignments nevertheless conveyed the title to the property absolutely, and that a consideration of both instruments together leaves no doubt as to the intention of the parties that the full and indefeasible title, subject to the contracts of purchase, should be conveyed. The holding of the court that the deed was in reality a mortgage only affects the rights of the cross-defendants among themselves. It does not affect the rights of the defendant and cross-complainant, who is the respondent here. The Stone Company is objecting because it asserts that it has by this deed transferred title to the property in controversy to the other appellant, De Bairos, and that by the decree of the court, the contracts being rescinded, De Bairos will have the title to the property, free of the lien of the contracts, and Stone Company will be compelled to return to the defendant the money paid by him, and thus Stone Company will be out both property and money. But the appellant Stone Company, for these very reasons, should not object to a finding of the court which is consonant with the protection of what it asserts are its rights: for, under the holding of the court that this deed was merely a mortgage, the equity in the property would be in Stone Company, and upon the payment of the advances made by De Bairos, Stone Company would have the full and free title.

Argument cannot be made upon this appeal that the rights of the cross-defendants are not adjusted among themselves in the decree. The cross-defendants joined in one answer and did not ask the court to litigate the matter of their rights as against each other. They joined in their notice of appeal from the judgment for the defendant. Their respective rights are matters in which the respondent is not concerned in any way. The cross-defendants should have asked, if they desired, a determination of their respective rights among themselves, and the one considering himself aggrieved by such determination should have appealed therefrom, making the other cross-defendant a respondent. The respondent here has no interest in defending the right of either against the other. In so far as the judgment affects the respondent it is proper. He recovers his money from the parties to whom he has paid it; his contracts are rescinded, and the title of the property, which never vested in the defendant, is left either where it was before the contracts were entered into, or where the cross-defendants by their own conveyances have placed it since that time.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in this court is denied.

The opinion of the District Court, in answer to the appellants' proposition that the defendant was not entitled to rescind the contract while he was himself in default by nonpayment of installments due on the purchase price, says that—

"The vendors accepted overdue payments from time to time under the contracts, and thus waived the provision that time was of the essence of the contracts." (Italics ours.)

The language we have italicized is not a correct statement of the law without further qualification.

[5] Acceptance of overdue installments of the price, on an executory contract for the sale of land, waives any right to declare a forfeiture on account of the previous failures to pay when due. But such acceptance alone does not change the terms of the contract as to forfeiture for future failures, nor eliminate the provision that time is of the essence of the contract. There may be conduct and acquiescence by the vendor sufficient to justify the inference by a court as a matter of fact that the vendor has waived the conditions of a contract regarding a forfeiture, which he afterward claims the right to enforce, and when, in such a case, the waiver has continued until after all installments are due, the condition cannot be revived, except by notice to the vendee. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 296, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 285, 128 Pac. 751; Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 684, 130 Pac. 432; American, etc., Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 519, 133 Pac. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44; Myers v. Williams, 173 Cal. 304, 159 Pac. 982. But none of these cases holds that such waiver is absolute, or that the provision cannot be revived and a forfeiture produced by a notice requiring performance within reasonable time.

[6] The true answer to the proposition of appellants, above stated, is that the rule it invokes applies only to cases where a rescission is sought or claimed by one party to an executory contract on the ground of a breach of the contract by the other party. All the cases to that effect are of that character. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 458; Fairchild, etc., Co. v. Southern, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 273, 110 Pac. 951; Duncan v. Jeter, 5 Ala. 604, 39 Am. Dec. 342; Hatton v. Johnson, 83 Pa. 222; Myers v. Gross, 59 Ill. 436; Seymour v. Bennett, 14 Mass. 266. We know of no case which holds that such rule applies to a case where the vendee, in default on payments due on the contract, seeks to avoid and rescind it for fraud of the vendor in procuring its execution, or for mistake inducing its execution. Payment by the vendee, after discovery of the fraud or mistake, might tend to show a waiver thereof, and thus defeat an attempted rescission, but a refusal to pay would be entirely consistent with the right of the vendee to rescind for such cause.

AMERICAN BOND & MORTGAGE CO. v. LINDSAY et al. (Civ. 3163.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 14, 1920.)

1. Corporations  110—Defendant, to whom stock was issued, but who transferred it, proper party to company's suit to cancel.

In action by corporation to cancel treasury stock as issued in exchange for other stock, in contravention of permit granted by commissioner of corporations under the Investment Companies Act, or Blue Sky Law, defendant held neither a necessary nor a proper party, so far as the relief sought by the company was concerned; he having transferred to another defendant, who had full notice and knowledge of all facts affecting its validity.

2. Appeal and error  1073(3)—Error in judgment against defendant, not a proper party, prejudicial as to costs.

Error in judgment against a defendant, who was neither a necessary nor a proper party, was prejudicial in so far as the judgment held such defendant liable for costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the American Bond & Mortgage Company, a corporation, against L. Lindsay and others. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant Lindsay appeals. Reversed as to such defendant, and cause remanded, for modification of judgment in accordance with the opinion.

A. L. Abrahams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark & Pierson and Denis Loewenthal, all of Los Angeles, for respondent American Bond & Mortgage Co.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action by a California corporation to cancel an issue of certain of its shares of treasury stock—shares that it had issued to the four defendants, Lindsay, Corbaley, Maescher, and McKinney, in exchange for certain shares that they owned of the capital stock of the State Investment Company. The theory of the complaint is that the issue of plaintiff's stock in exchange for stock of the State Investment Company was in direct contravention of a permit that had been granted by the commissioner of corporations, and that therefore, under the provisions of the Investment Companies Act, commonly known as the Blue Sky Law (St. 1913, p. 715), the issue was a nullity. The appeal is by the defendant Lindsay.

The case, as presented by the complaint and found by the court, is substantially as follows: At a time when plaintiff's board of directors was dominated and controlled by one Pearson, the latter, for his own illegal profit and gain, caused 57,226 shares of plaintiff's treasury stock to be issued to the four above-named defendants in exchange for 71,532 shares of the capital stock of the State Investment Company, that theretofore had been issued to and were then owned by these four defendants. Of the 57,226 shares of plaintiff's treasury stock so issued, 19,944 were issued to defendant Lindsay. Previous to the issue of the 57,226 shares, and pursuant to the act commonly known as the Blue Sky Law, plaintiff, whose capital stock was divided into 2,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each, had made application to the commissioner of corporations for authority to sell its corporate stock. A temporary permit was issued by that officer, whereby plaintiff was authorized to issue not exceeding 1,000,000 of its shares "in exchange for property, the fair and reasonable net market value of which * * * shall * * * equal or exceed 110 per cent. of the par value of the shares issued therefor."

It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court, in substance and effect, that the value of the State Investment Company's shares, that the four defendants transferred to plaintiff in exchange for its 57,226 shares of treasury stock, did not exceed 63 per cent. of the par value of plaintiff's capital stock. Wherefore plaintiff, which, since the exchange, has come under the control of a board of directors by whom the whole transaction has been repudiated, seeks to rescind the exchange and to cancel the issue of its treasury stock as a void issue under the Blue Sky Law, section 5 of which reads:

"It shall be unlawful to issue any security to which this act is applicable unless a certificate or a temporary permit authorizing the issue thereof shall first have been received from the commissioner of corporations as provided in this act."

The complaint alleges, and the court finds, that before the action was commenced the 19,944 shares of plaintiff's treasury stock that it had issued to Lindsay in exchange for shares of the State Investment Company had been transferred by Lindsay to John R. Gardiner, who, though made a party defendant, was not served with summons and did not appear in the action. It further is found by the court that, at all times since the transfer to Gardiner, the 19,944 shares have stood in his name on plaintiff's books. The complaint also alleges that Gardiner acquired the stock from Lindsay with full knowledge of all the facts affecting the validity of its issue. Plaintiff's evidence showed without conflict that, when the action was commenced, Lindsay had no interest whatever in the stock; he having theretofore transferred all his interest therein to Gardiner, as we have stated. For this reason Lindsay moved for a nonsuit. The motion was denied.

After finding the facts substantially as we have stated them, judgment was entered against the four defendants, Lindsay, Corbaley, Maescher, and McKinney, whereby the court, in substance, decreed: (1) That the issue of the shares of plaintiff's treasury stock, which, of course, included the 19,944 that had been issued to Lindsay and by him transferred to Gardiner, was and is void; (2) that plaintiff cancel said issue on its records; (3) that defendant Lindsay, as well as his codefendants Corbaley, Maescher and McKinney, deliver to plaintiff the certificate or certificates evidencing the issuance of the 57,226 shares, and this notwithstanding Lindsay had transferred his shares to Gardiner, in whose name the stock then stood of record on plaintiff's books; and (4) that plaintiff recover its costs. From that judgment Lindsay has taken this appeal.

[1] The appeal presents a number of interesting questions arising under the Blue Sky Law, which, however, it will not be necessary to consider, since appellant was neither a necessary nor a proper party defendant, and for that reason alone the court should have adjudged that plaintiff take nothing as against Lindsay and that he recover of plaintiff his costs. The stock certificate that evidenced the issue of the 19,944 shares to Lindsay was not a negotiable instrument; and, moreover, Gardiner, according to plaintiff's complaint, took the shares, as the transferee of Lindsay, with full knowledge of all the facts affecting the validity of the issue. Gardiner, therefore, cannot possibly have any cause of action against Lindsay for damages, or for reimbursement, based on the fact, if it be a fact, that Lindsay never acquired title to the stock. Gardiner's knowledge of the facts precludes any possible claim that his vendor, Lindsay, impliedly warranted the title. 35 Cyc. 386; Dreisbach v. Eckelkamp, 82 N. J. Law, 726, 83 Atl. 175; Libby v. Pelham, 30 Idaho, 614, 166 Pac. 575, concurring opinion of Justice Morgan. Appellant's presence, therefore, as a party defendant, was not necessary to a determination of any controversy there might be between Gardiner and himself. There was no basis for any controversy between them.

[2] So far as the relief sought by plaintiff is concerned, appellant was neither a necessary nor a proper party defendant. Plaintiff asked that the issue of the stock be canceled. For that purpose (in so far as the shares issued to Lindsay are concerned) it was necessary to have Gardiner only before the court. Plaintiff and Gardiner are the only parties interested in those shares. Appellant had no possible interest in the controversy; there was nothing that he could do, or be compelled to do, that could effect a cancellation of the invalid issue of plaintiff's treasury stock; and his presence as a party defendant was therefore neither necessary nor proper. Topping v. Van Pelt, Hoff. Ch. (N. Y.) 545; Wright v. Day, 59 Misc. Rep. 76, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1105; Fairgate Realty Co. v. Drozda (Mo.) 181 S. W. 398; Campodonico v. Grosini, 66 Cal. 358, 5 Pac. 609. For this reason, appellant's motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. However, it will not be necessary to remand the case for a new trial, since the findings themselves, because they disclose that Lindsay had transferred all of his shares to Gardiner, show that it was error to render judgment against appellant; and that error, at least in so far as the judgment adjudges appellant liable for costs, is prejudicial.

The judgment is reversed as to the defendant Lindsay, and the cause remanded, that the judgment may be modified in accordance with what is here said.

FAIRMONT CREAMERY CO. v. LOS ANGELES ICE & COLD STORAGE CO.
(Civ. 3354.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 13, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

I. Appeal and error §1097(1)—Decision on former appeal law of case.

A decision on a former appeal of the same action between the same parties is binding as the law of the case on retrial in so far as the facts on retrial correspond with those on the first trial.

2. Factors §52—Pledge of goods by broker valid though bill of lading not negotiable.

Where an owner of eggs shipped a car to a broker, who, on obtaining possession, placed them in defendant's warehouse and obtained a loan on pledge of the eggs, the owner cannot defeat the pledge which was valid against it under Civ. Code, § 2991, there being nothing to indicate that the broker did not have title, on the ground that the bill of lading was nonnegotiable, for, even if defendant pledgee had examined the bill of lading, it would not have disclosed the broker's lack of title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Fairmont Creamery Company against the Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry K. Norton and Roy V. Rhodes, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment against it rendered in an action for conversion of a carload of eggs. When the action was first tried, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, from which judgment the defendant appealed. Upon the appeal the judgment was reversed. The decision upon the first appeal is reported in 33 Cal. App. 414, 165 Pac. 553. The case was then retried, resulting in a judgment for the defendant, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The important facts, as stated on the first appeal, also appear from the present record and are as follows:

On June 17, 1913, one Fred F. Lambourn was engaged in business at Los Angeles as a broker selling merchandise on behalf of consignees and also as a dealer in merchandise on his own account. He had been in business for several years. In August, 1913, he was adjudged a bankrupt. The plaintiff was engaged in the produce business at Omaha, Neb., and had been doing business with Lambourn as a broker since April, 1911. On June 5, 1913, Lambourn telegraphed plaintiff that he had sold a car of eggs. The telegram was as follows:

"Sold car candled current receipts fifty-three and over small dealers eighteen cents track. Wire car number and when can ship."

On June 7, 1913, the plaintiff shipped the carload of eggs thus ordered and made the consignment directly to and in the name of Lambourn. The car arrived at Los Angeles on June 17, 1913. When the merchandise was shipped from Omaha a bill of lading therefor, showing the shipment from plaintiff to Lambourn, was received from the railroad company, and was mailed by the plaintiff to Lam-

Lambourn. According to the testimony of plaintiff's sales manager, this was done that Lambourn "might obtain possession of the eggs for the purpose of making delivery to the various parties to whom he had sold as our broker." At the same time the plaintiff forwarded through the Omaha National Bank to that bank's correspondent in Los Angeles a draft on Lambourn for $2,160, the purchase price of the eggs. The draft was not paid. On June 17, 1913, Lambourn informed the superintendent of the defendant that he had a car of eggs and wanted a loan upon it. The eggs were taken into the possession of the defendant and placed in its warehouse, and defendant issued to Lambourn a warehouse receipt therefor. Thereupon, on the same day, the defendant loaned to Lambourn $2,300, taking his note therefor, together with an agreement pledging the car of eggs to the defendant as collateral security for the payment of the note and any other liability or liabilities of Lambourn to the defendant, "due or to become due or that may be hereafter contracted." In making this loan the defendant made no special inquiry as to the ownership of the merchandise and did not see, or ask to see, the bill of lading. It simply accepted Lambourn's statement that he owned the car of eggs. It had no knowledge concerning the ownership of the property. On September 10, 1913 (after the bankruptcy of Lambourn), the defendant sold the eggs for $2,880. On September 24, 1913, the plaintiff made a demand for the same upon the defendant, claiming to be the sole owner, and offered to pay storage charges on the eggs. Upon these facts (the statement of which is taken from the opinion rendered upon the first appeal), all of which also appear clearly from the record now before us, the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, on April 14, 1917, decided that Lambourn was a factor, and as such had ostensible authority to deal with the goods of the principal as with his own in transactions with persons not having notice of the actual ownership. Civ. Code, §§ 2026, 2369. The appellate court also decided that section 2991 of the Civil Code was applicable to the facts shown; that the eggs were consigned to Lambourn to be transferred by him to the purchaser of the same; and that "in the meantime they could not be identified as belonging to any purchaser, and the property remained in possession of Lambourn for the purpose of making those transfers." The opinion upon the first appeal continues further:

"Counsel for respondent further suggests the fact that the defendant did not inquire of Lambourn as to the form of the bill of lading, and never saw that document until the day of the trial. Therefore, they say, that as to them Lambourn had mere possession, and that appellant cannot in any sense be said to be a pledgee who received the property in good faith in the ordinary course of business. We think that it was not necessary for appellant to examine the bill of lading. By acting upon the assumption that Lambourn had such bill of lading and without examining the same for itself, appellant took the risk that he might not have any such document in his possession. But since he did have it, the case is the same as if appellant had examined it and relied upon the evidence obtained by its own inspection."

[1] In so far as the facts are substantially the same upon the second appeal as upon the first appeal the decision upon the first appeal is the law of this case. However, appellant urges upon our attention two additional points in the evidence upon the second trial. It states them to be:

"(1) That Lambourn had a bond up with the railroad company so that he might obtain cars without showing a bill of lading and going through the usual course of business.

"(2) Lamoreaux, superintendent of cold storage for the defendant, testified that the board of directors of the L. A. Ice & Cold Storage Company had adopted a policy of transacting business, such as was done in this case with Lambourn, with only regular customers and not with strangers. And further he testified to the effect that the reason that they did not call for the bill of lading or some indicia of ownership in taking these goods as pledge for the loan, was because they relied upon the fact that they were dealing with an old customer."

[2] It is contended that, as the bill of lading was not made "to order" and was not negotiable, therefore this fact would have put the defendant upon notice if it had examined the same. We find no merit in this contention. The plaintiff consigned the goods directly to Lambourn, and the bill of lading designated him as the consignee. It is true that, as between the plaintiff and Lambourn, this bill of lading transferred only the right to the possession of the goods and not the full title, but it is this very possession for the purpose of transferring title to others which is the basis of a pledgee's rights under section 2991 of the Civil Code. It is true that because the bill was nonnegotiable Lambourn was obliged to wait until he secured possession of the goods before pledging them. If the bill had been negotiable, he could have dealt with it before the goods arrived and cut off all equities; but he did not attempt to do this. He did not negotiate the bill. He waited until the goods arrived and properly secured possession of them, because the eggs were billed to him. If the defendant had examined the bill of lading, it would have discovered nothing which would have militated against its rights under section 2991, Civil Code. The bill of lading merely showed that Lambourn was entitled to the possession of the eggs. The limited purpose of the possession did not appear from the bill of lading, and was enforceable only as between the plaintiff and Lambourn, or parties having knowledge of the facts. The plaintiff could have protected itself fully by attaching the bill of lading to the draft which it sent to the bank for collection. It did not choose to do this.

The matter of the effect of the nonnegotiability of the bill of lading is argued by appellant in several connections, but the discussion herein disposes of the matter in its various applications. The other matter urged by the appellant we consider to be without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZARTARIAN v. ZARTARIAN. (Civ. 3184.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1920.)

1. Divorce ⚭37(6)—Decree cannot be based on cross-complaint for cause of action not accrued.

No divorce can be based on defendant wife's cross-complaint for desertion where such cause of action had not accrued, under Civ. Code, § 107, either at the time of the filing of plaintiff husband's complaint or of the wife's cross-complaint.

2. Divorce ⚭93(3)—Complaint or cross-complaint must allege effects of cruelty.

A complaint or cross-complaint for divorce for cruelty must, under Civ. Code, § 94, allege either that the cruelty resulted in bodily harm, or injury to health, or in a reasonable fear of one or the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Markar H. Zartarian against Agavnie Zartarian. From judgment for plaintiff granting divorce, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Florence L. Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. M. Astor, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. In this action plaintiff sought a divorce from the defendant on two grounds—cruelty and desertion. Defendant by her answer denied the material allegations of the complaint.

Defendant also served and filed a cross-complaint, in which it is alleged, among other things, that for a long time after the marriage of the parties hereto they lived together in Boston, Mass., during which time plaintiff carried on and maintained a prosperous shoe-repairing business in that city; that during such time plaintiff upon several occasions ran away and left defendant, and that he finally sold the business for $1,500, and, taking such sum, together with some $3,000 which he had in the bank at that time, left "and came to California, city of Los Angeles," at which place he bought out a grocery business; that some time after plaintiff's departure from Boston, defendant, learning his whereabouts, "followed the plaintiff to the city of Los Angeles about November 15, 1915, and there effected a reconciliation, and lived with said plaintiff up to the very day of February 12, 1916, in the city of Los Angeles"; that plaintiff and defendant carried on said grocery business together, but finally determined that it was not paying, whereupon they decided to sell out, at which time it was understood that both of them would return to Boston; that at plaintiff's persuasion defendant preceded plaintiff to Boston, leaving Los Angeles on February 12, 1916, in accordance with the understanding arrived at, fully believing that she would be followed by her husband as soon as he sold out the business; that the business was in fact subsequently sold by plaintiff, and that plaintiff did not go to Boston as agreed, but remained in Los Angeles, there opening up a shoe-repairing business; that defendant took sick while in Boston after so returning to that city from Los Angeles, and that she, "being without means, was unable to return to Los Angeles, and was compelled to remain in Boston"; that later money was furnished her by friends, and, so aided, she returned to Los Angeles in December, 1916, but that "on November 11, 1916, while the defendant was in the city of Boston, waiting for plaintiff to come on, the plaintiff herein filed a suit for divorce, in the city of Los Angeles, against the defendant herein, on the grounds of desertion." Then follows a recitation of facts showing that plaintiff's net earnings from his shoe-repairing business were "about $50 per week," and "that by their united efforts they had acquired about $5,000 in cash before coming to Los Angeles," but that the whole amount thereof was in plaintiff's charge. It is further shown by the cross-complaint that the issue of the marriage of the parties hereto "was one daughter, eight years old"; that while defendant was sick in Boston, having no money with which to provide for said daughter, she sent the child, through the assistance of a mutual friend, to plaintiff herein in Los Angeles, to be cared for by him, and that plaintiff placed the said child in the Orphanage Home at Santa Monica, Cal. Cross-complainant, in conclusion, alleges that she is wholly dependent upon her own labor and the charity of her friends for support; that plaintiff, since defendant's return to California upon recovery of her health, has refused to inform her of the child's whereabouts, and refuses to live or cohabit with her; and that he has threatened her life, and refuses to provide for her in any way or to allow her to return to his house. Then follows a prayer for judgment on the cross-complaint, asking: (1) for a division of the common property; (2) that plaintiff be restrained from disposing of or in any way encumbering the said shoe-repairing business, or the said $5,000, and from taking away the said child; (3) $15 per week permanent alimony for the separate maintenance of herself and child; (4) for support during the pendency of the action, as the court might deem proper; (5) attorney's fees and costs; and (6) for general relief.

Plaintiff, by his answer to defendant's cross-complaint, denies some of the material allegations, and sets up the defense that "he is now and has been working for his brother for $9 per week," and that that is all he earns.

On the issues thus presented the case was tried. Findings were specifically waived by the parties. There is some doubt as to whether this can be legally done; but that point is not before us, and we therefore refrain from any discussion thereunder. Omitting formal parts, the following judgment was entered:

"Therefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a decree of divorce be granted to the defendant against the plaintiff; that when one year shall have expired after the entry of this interlocutory judgment a final judgment and decree shall be entered, granting a divorce herein, wherein and whereby the bonds of matrimony existing between said plaintiff and said defendant shall be dissolved, and at that time the court shall grant such other and further relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of this action. It is further adjudged that the minor child of the parties, named Alice Zartarian, shall, until the further order of the court, be in the custody of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff is directed, until the further order of the court, to keep and maintain said child at the Los Angeles Orphans' Home, at 815 El Centro Ave., Los Angeles, Cal."

The appeal is on the judgment roll alone, and "from that part of the interlocutory judgment rendered by the above-named court in the above-entitled action, and herein entered on the 10th day of December, 1917, which ordered, adjudged, and decreed that a decree of divorce be granted to the defendant herein against the plaintiff herein, but denied the prayer of the defendant herein for alimony and separate maintenance of herself and minor child, and which further adjudged that the custody of said minor child, named Alice Zartarian, be given to plaintiff."

[1, 2] Three grounds are urged by appellant for the reversal of the judgment: (1) That the judgment is not supported by the pleadings; (2) that the court erred in granting relief inconsistent with the case made by the pleadings and embraced within the issues; and (3) that the court erred in rendering a judgment for divorce in favor of the defendant.

Appellant urges in support of the first point that, the trial court having found from the evidence that plaintiff was not entitled to a divorce from defendant, "but in the face of the allegations of defendant's cross-complaint and the issues raised by the answer thereto and the relief sought by the defendant the court adjudged and decreed that a decree of divorce be granted to the defendant against plaintiff"—granting custody of the child to plaintiff—the only pleadings pertinent to this appeal, since plaintiff was denied relief on his pleadings, are defendant's cross-complaint and plaintiff's answer thereto, as well as the interlocutory judgment. It also is urged that the cross-complaint does not state a cause of action "on the ground of desertion, or any ground."

With this view we are in full accord. If the cross-complaint is intended to allege facts upon which to base a cause of action for desertion or willful neglect, and even though we concede, without so holding, that it does, yet it conclusively appears upon its face that no divorce can be based thereon, because such cause of action had not accrued, either at the time of the filing of plaintiff's complaint or defendant's cross-complaint. Section 107, Civ. Code. On the other hand, if the facts alleged in the cross-complaint be true—and for our present purposes we must so assume—still we are of the opinion that the cross-complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the plaintiff for extreme cruelty, as contemplated by section 94 of the Civil Code.

"The particular facts relied on as constituting cruelty should be set forth in detail; it is not sufficient to allege cruelty in general terms, as in the language of the statute. However, every act complained of need not be specifically described; it is enough if sufficient facts are alleged to establish legal cruelty as a ground for divorce. * * * The acts of cruelty should be alleged with reasonable certainty as to time and place. However, the exact day and place of the occurrence of each particular act need not be alleged; and where the conduct complained of is continued and not confined to any particular time or locality, a specific allegation of time and place is impracticable and should not be required. * * * Since, to constitute a ground for divorce, cruelty must result either in bodily harm or injury to the health or a reasonable fear of one or the other, either one or the other of these effects of the misconduct on the complainant must be alleged." (Italics ours.) 14 Cyc. 667 et seq.; Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571, 166 Pac. 330; MacDonald v. MacDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 102 Pac. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45; Smith v. Smith, 124 Cal. 651, 57 Pac. 573; Nelson v. Nelson, 18 Cal. App. 602, 123 Pac. 1099; Ryan v. Ryan, 33 Mont. 406, 84 Pac. 494; Claunch v. Claunch (Tex. Civ. App.) 203 S. W. 930.

There is nothing in the cross-complaint now under consideration which brings it within the provisions of the rule just quoted, and particularly does it contain no allegation bringing it within the portions which we have italicized. There being no such allegation, then it is clear that no evidence could legally be received, even if offered, in support of such contention.

Nothing is contained in the judgment roll before us upon which the judgment appealed from may find support. This being true, it becomes unnecessary to discuss any other point raised.

Judgment reversed.

(Civ. 3317.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

1. Negligence $\S$ 134(1) — Evidence held to make prima facie case for owner of grain destroyed by fire.

In an action for destruction of grain by fire, evidence held to make a prima facie case for plaintiff calling upon defendants to rebut the necessary inferences arising from the testimony.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 330(3) — Evidence held to show relationship of principal and agent between defendants and workmen who set fire.

In an action for destruction of grain by fire, evidence held to make a prima facie showing of the existence of the relationship of principal and agent between the corporate defendants and the workmen on their power line who started the fire, adequate in the absence of evidence to the contrary to support findings that such relation existed.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 6 — Performance of work for another prima facie evidence of employment.

The fact that one is performing work and labor for another is prima facie evidence of employment, and supports the presumption that such person is the employé of such other, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

4. Negligence $\S$ 134(10) — Evidence held to show that fire was communicated from power companies' right of way.

In an action against power companies for destruction of grain by fire set on their right of way, evidence held sufficient to justify finding that the flames were communicated by a fire which originated on the companies' right of way, and which had origin in some instrumentality used by their employés.

5. Negligence $\S$ 21—Employés of power companies negligent in not extinguishing fire on right of way.

The employés of power companies were guilty of gross negligence in not properly controlling and extinguishing a fire on the right of way occupied by a power line in proximity to a field of ripened grain when their attention was directed by a passerby to the probability of its spreading.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 996—Appellate court cannot set aside findings supported by inferences from facts proved.

It is not within the power of the appellate court to disregard or set aside findings of the trial court supported by inferences founded on facts proved.

7. Assignments $\S$ 22—Chose in action arising from violation of property right or from obligation or contract assignable.

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 954, a chose in action arising out of either the violation of a right of property, or out of an obligation or contract, is assignable.

8. Negligence $\S$ 106—Insurer of grain destroyed by fire not necessary party to owner's action against parties at fault.

It was not necessary that the insurance company which paid an owner of grain for its destruction by fire through the negligence of power companies should have been joined in the owner's action against the companies either as plaintiff or defendant.

9. Pleading $\S$ 11—Reassignment by insurer of rights under subrogation to owner of standing grain destroyed did not need to be pleaded.

The owner's insurer has merely a cause of action arising by subrogation or equitable assignment through settling a loss, by fire occasioned by negligence of another, and such assignment and the reassignment by the insurer to the owner are probative matters having no place in the owner's complaint against the wrongdoer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by A. L. Dibble against the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, a corporation, and the Midland Counties Public Service Corporation, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Short & Sutherland and Carl E. Lindsay, all of Fresno, for appellants.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick and Geo. K. Ford, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment awarding plaintiff damages for the destruction by fire of certain grain belonging to him, caused through the negligence of the defendants. The case was tried before the court without a jury. It was stipulated that, if judgment went against one of the defendants, it might be entered against both of them. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the defendants moved for a nonsuit. The motion was denied, whereupon the defendants declined to offer any evidence. The findings of the trial court followed the allegations of the complaint. In seeking a reversal of the judgment the appellants urge two grounds: First the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and the judgment based thereon; and, second, that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest in this action, at least to the amount of $3,025.60.

It is admitted that the plaintiff was the lessee of certain lands upon which he had grown a crop of wheat and barley. The defendants owned and maintained a right of way, adjacent to the land of plaintiff, over which it operated a power line. From the testimony of Mr. McCabe, who was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, it appears that on the afternoon of June 8, 1915, he was passing along the county road, which was located a few feet westerly from the power line. Two men, Schultz and Moore, were at that time in view. One of them was in the act of descending from one of the poles, supporting the power line, while the other was on the ground near the foot of the pole. A team and wagon, which McCabe identified as belonging to the defendant power corporation, was standing nearby. A small fire, three or four feet across, was then burning in the tall, thick, dry grass which extended to plaintiff's field, a distance of about 200 feet, and in which plaintiff's grain was standing and ready for the harvest. The wind was at that time blowing from the fire in the direction of plaintiff's field. About 20 feet from the place where the fire was burning, and so situated that the wind would carry sparks from it toward the fire, McCabe observed a fire pot, with what seemed to be coals of fire in it. What appeared to be a torch, such as is used by plumbers, was lying just where the blaze was starting. The fire at this time could have been readily extinguished. When McCabe approached, the two men were standing near it with sacks or cloths in their hands. McCabe said, "Boys, if you ain't careful, you will have a big fire here on your hands," to which one of the men replied, "Never mind, partner, we will attend to the fire." Neither of the men, however, made any attempt to extinguish, or stay, the spread of the flames, which, owing to an increasing wind, almost immediately spread rapidly until they reached and consumed plaintiff's grain.

[1] It is the contention of the appellants that this evidence was wholly insufficient to prove that the fire in question was started by the negligence of the defendants, or that it was permitted to spread and reach the grain upon plaintiff's land, because of any carelessness whatever on the part of defendants, or either of them. We are of the opinion, however, that the plaintiff made out such a prima facie case as called upon the defendants to rebut the necessary inferences arising from the testimony, and that the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

[2, 3] Appellants first argue that as there was no direct testimony that either Schultz or Moore were employed by the defendants, and no evidence as to the kind of work they were doing at the time of the fire, they may have been strangers to the defendants and not in any way connected with them. This contention cannot be upheld. The men appeared to be engaged in some kind of work connected with the business of the defendants. They were working on the right of way of defendants' power line. One of them was descending from one of the power line poles. The other was close at hand. No other men were in sight. The implements for their work were scattered about. The fire pot, the torch, and the wagon and team, were all indicia of their employment. The facts were sufficient, in our judgment, to make a prima facie showing of the existence of the relationship of principal and agent between the corporation defendants and the workmen, which, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, was ample to support the findings of the trial court that such relation existed at the time of the fire. 1 Labatt, Master and Servant, § 22, pp. 69, 73. The fact that one is performing work and labor for another is prima facie evidence of an employment and supports a presumption that such person is the servant and employé of the other, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. King v. Hercules Powder Co., 178 Pac. 531; Indiana, etc., Railways v. Adamson, 114 Ind. 282, 15 N. E. 5; Waalor v. Great Northern Railway Co., 22 S. D. 256, 117 N. W. 140, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 297; Robinson v. Doe, 224 Mass. 319, 112 N. E. 1007; Bush v. Southern Railway Co., 63 S. C. 96, 40 S. E. 1029; Howell v. Mandelbaum & Sons, 160 Iowa, 119, 140 N. W. 397, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 349.

[4, 5] Appellants also claim that there is no evidence to show that the employés in question either started the fire, or failed to extinguish it, or that they negligently permitted it to spread. While it is true there is no direct evidence as to the origin of the fire, the trial court had the right to make any logical, reasonable deduction, which the admitted facts, and the undisputed testimony of the witness McCabe permitted. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176, 116 Pac. 530. It is a fair inference that the flames which destroyed plaintiff's property were communicated thereto by the fire, which originated on the right of way of defendants, and which had its origin in one or other of the instrumentalities used by defendants' employés in their work. Reuter v. San Pedro, etc., Co., 37 Cal. App. 277, 283, 174 Pac. 927; St. Paul Fire, etc., Co. v. Southern Pacific Co., 30 Cal. App. 140, 142, 157 Pac. 247; Fay v.

Cox, 188 Pac. 623; Toledo, etc., Co. v. Fenstermaker, 163 Ind. 534, 72 N. E. 561, 562; Roundtree v. Mt. Hood, etc., Co., 86 Or. 147, 168 Pac. 61. It is equally clear to us that the employes of defendants were guilty of gross carelessness in not properly controlling and extinguishing the fire when their attention was directed by McCabe to the probability of its spreading. It was burning in tall, dry grass near the adjacent fields of stubble and grain, and it should not have required any warning to apprise them of this imminent danger.

[6] The deductions drawn by the trial court are not illogical, or inherently unsound, either as to the employment of Schultz and Moore or as to the origin and source of the fire. Whether or not the workmen were the servants of the power company was so peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants that the plaintiff was not required to make as strong showing in that regard as might have been otherwise required. As against the deductions drawn by the trial court, which seem eminently reasonable, no other inferences founded on facts proved in the case find support. It is not within the power of this court to disregard, or set aside, the findings thus supported. Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 799, 158 Pac. 753; County of Alameda v. Tieslau, 186 Pac. 398.

On cross-examination of the plaintiff it was developed that the grain was insured against fire in the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, which paid plaintiff $3,025.60, the amount due under its policy. On redirect examination plaintiff established that, before the commencement of the action, the insurance company assigned to the plaintiff all rights and causes of action against the defendants, arising out of the loss or damage occasioned by the fire. A written assignment was admitted in evidence over the contention of the defendants, the objection being that the cause of action was not assignable and that the assignment had not been pleaded. The defendants then made application to the court to amend their answer by setting up a further defense, which, in substance, was that the action had not been brought, and was not being prosecuted, in the name of or by, the real party in interest.

The court denied the application to amend.

[7] Appellants complain of the act of the court in admitting the assignment in evidence and its further action in refusing permission to file the amendment to the answer. Their contention, first, is that the insurance company, upon the payment of the loss of the plaintiff, was subrogated to plaintiff's rights, and became the real party in interest to the extent of its payment, and that the cause of action which the insurer had, because of its subrogation to the rights of plaintiff, was not assignable. Appellants seek to invoke the rule of law relating to actions for death or personal injuries, and for damage to property under statutes different from ours. Section 954 of the Civil Code has effected a change in the common-law rule of the nonassignability of choses in action. One arising out of either the violation of a right of property or one arising out of an obligation or contract may now be transferred. Stapp v. Madera Canal & Irrigation Co., 34 Cal. App. 41, 46, 166 Pac. 823.

[8, 9] The next point urged by appellants is that the insurance company should have been joined in the action, either as plaintiff or defendant. We find no merit in this contention. It was not necessary even that the assignment by the insurance company to the plaintiff should have been pleaded. The insurer merely had a cause of action arising by way of subrogation or equitable assignment. Caledonia Insurance Co. v. Northern Pacific Railway Co., 32 Mont. 46, 49, 79 Pac. 544. This assignment by operation of law, and the reassignment by the company to plaintiff, left the claim as it was originally and invoked probative matters that had no place in the pleading. Zany v. Rawhide Gold Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 373, 377, 114 Pac. 1023. The action was therefore properly commenced by the plaintiff alone.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GUTIERREZ. (Cr. No. 699.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 14, 1920.)

1. Infants — Evidence held insufficient to show that infants had no parent or guardian.

In a proceeding to take from their father the custody of infants, evidence held insufficient to establish that they had no parent or guardian capable of exercising proper parental control over them.

2. Infants — To justify taking infants from custody of parent, facts specified in statute therefor must be averred and found.

To take from the father the custody and control of infants, under Juvenile Court Law, § 9b, providing that no ward of the juvenile court shall be taken from the custody of his parent or legal guardian without the consent of such parent or guardian, unless the court shall find such parent or guardian to be incapable of providing, etc., proper maintenance, training, and education, or unless such person has been convicted of a felony, or the court shall find that the welfare of such ward requires his custody to be taken from the parent or guardian, averments of facts specified must be made in the petition, and findings thereof must appear of record to support an order divesting the parent or guardian of control.

3. Infants ~~and~~ 16—Custody of Infants cannot be taken from parent under Juvenile Court Law because others might better provide for and train them.

The custody of infants cannot be taken from their parent and natural guardian under the Juvenile Court Law, and given to another because it is deemed the infants may be better provided for and trained as wards of the state, and interference with the natural relations of parent and child is justified only where there is demonstrated incapacity or something akin to criminal neglect.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Proceeding by the People of the State of California, on behalf of Guadalupe and Elvira Gutierrez, alleged wards of the Juvenile Court. From an order taking them from the custody and control of their father Tomas Gutierrez, he appeals. Order reversed.

E. F. Du Fresne, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of San Diego, sitting as a juvenile court, declaring Guadalupe and Elvira Gutierrez, minors, to be wards of said court, and taking them from the custody and control of their father, Tomas Gutierrez, appellant herein.

The only averment upon which jurisdiction could be maintained to declare these minors wards of the court is contained in the following allegation of the petition: "That said Guadalupe and Elvira Gutierrez have no parent or guardian capable of exercising proper parental control." The court, in its order committing the minors to the care of their grandmother, under the custody of the probation officer, finds that all of the allegations of the petition are true. In the hearing on writ of habeas corpus in this same matter, we held that this finding was sufficient to sustain the order. On this appeal the issue is presented on the sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding. We think the evidence is insufficient.

[1, 2] It was shown by the testimony, without dispute, that at the time of commencing this proceeding the minors, who are girls aged respectively one and three years, were in the custody of their father. The mother is dead, and the children had for some time been in the immediate care of the maternal grandmother, with the father's consent, and under an arrangement whereby he paid for their keep. Some two or three months prior to this proceeding the father took them from the grandmother, owing to some personal differences which had arisen between the two. He at first kept them at his home, with the help of a woman he employed, but later sent for and paid the transportation of a brother and his family, who lived in New Mexico, to come to San Diego and live with him and make a home for himself and the children. They were all living together under this arrangement when this proceeding was commenced. It is undisputed that the father is an industrious man, earning good wages, affectionate with the children, spending his money freely to provide for them, and able and willing to care for them. There is nothing to indicate that the care and custody given these minors by their father is not as good as ordinarily falls to the lot of families in the same station in life. There was some evidence tending to show that the children were well and affectionately cared for by the grandmother, and that she was so situated as to give them better attention and more wholesome surroundings than they were likely to receive under the arrangements made by the father. It is quite evident from the remarks of the trial judge, shown in the transcript of the proceedings, that it was this circumstance that influenced his decision to take the children from the father and place them in the custody of the probation officer under the immediate care of the grandmother. But there is neither any allegation in the petition nor finding in the order of commitment to justify depriving the father of the custody of his children on the ground that their welfare demanded that the father be deprived of their custody. Section 9b of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1233) provides that—

"No ward of the juvenile court as defined in this act shall be taken from the custody of his parent or legal guardian without the consent of such parent or guardian unless the court shall find such parent or guardian to be incapable of providing or to have failed or neglected to provide proper maintenance, training and education for said person; or unless said person has been tried on probation in said custody and has failed to reform, or unless said person has been convicted of a crime by a jury, or unless the court shall find that the welfare of said person requires that his custody be taken from said parent or guardian."

The findings thus required are necessary to support the order of commitment, and must regularly appear of record. In re Brodie, 33 Cal. App. 751, 753, 166 Pac. 605. As has already been pointed out, the only finding in this matter is that the minors "have no parent or guardian capable of exercising proper parental control"; and we have held that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

[3] Moreover, we question if the evidence presented in the record is sufficient to justify a finding that the welfare of the minors requires that their custody be taken from the father, if such an allegation had appeared in the petition, or such finding had been made. The Juvenile Court Law certainly does not contemplate the taking of children from their parents and breaking up family ties merely because, in the estimation of probation officers and courts, the children can be better provided for and more wisely trained as wards of the state. Probably from mere considerations of healthful and hygienic living and systematic education and training this would be true in the cases of thousands of families of wealth and respectability. We think it is only in instances where there is demonstrated incapacity or something akin to criminal neglect that the law is justified in interfering with the natural relations of parent and child.

Notwithstanding we are fully satisfied that the juvenile court was actuated by its desire that these children should have a better home than the father was likely to provide, we are convinced that neither the law nor the facts in the case justified the order appealed from.

The order is reversed.

SEARCY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF HUMBOLDT COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2182.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

Venue ⇐78—Order transferring cause to other county deprived court of all jurisdiction.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 949, under section 399, when the superior court of Humboldt county made its order transferring a divorce action to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, it lost all jurisdiction of the action for all purposes, and could not allow plaintiff wife alimony for support, and counsel fees on defendant husband's appeal from the order; jurisdiction to do so was in the superior court of San Francisco county.

Application for writ of prohibition by C. L. Searcy against the superior court of the county of Humboldt and Hon. Denver Sevier, judge thereof. Writ granted.

Henry L. Ford and J. T. Fraser, both of Eureka, and V. A. McGeorge, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondents from proceeding further with certain orders and proposed orders in a divorce action wherein one Mary Louise Searcy is the plaintiff and above-named petitioner is defendant. Said superior court on the 9th day of January, 1920, on due proceedings had in that behalf, made and entered its final order, changing the place of trial of said action from said county of Humboldt to the city and county of San Francisco. On the same day the petitioner appealed from said order, and his appeal is now pending.

Notwithstanding said change of place of trial, said superior court, respondent herein, upon the usual notice and motion, proceeded to make its further order, allowing to said plaintiff Mary Louise certain sums by way of alimony for her support and also as counsel fees on appeal.

The petitioner insists that said orders are in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Said court is about to take proceedings against petitioner looking to the enforcement of said orders.

1. When the court made its order transferring the cause to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, it thereby lost, for all purposes, all jurisdiction of the action. Chase v. Superior Court, 154 Cal. 789, 99 Pac. 355; Hatch v. Galvin, 50 Cal. 441, and People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093. In the first of these cases the court uses the following language:

"We are of the opinion that the action was transferred to Santa Clara county when the order was finally made and entered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. There must be a moment of time when the court transferring the case loses jurisdiction, and the court to which it is transferred acquires jurisdiction. When the court to which the action is transferred acquires jurisdiction, the court which made the order transferring it has no power to make any further order in the premises."

In the Hatch Case the court says:

"The order thus entered * * * vested jurisdiction in the court of said Abner C. Squire, and necessarily put an end to the jurisdiction of the defendant over the case."

To the same effect are the following cases from other jurisdictions: State v. Lay, 123 Mo. 609, 29 S. W. 999; Cunningham v. Current, etc., 165 Mo. 270, 65 S. W. 556, and Fatt v. Fatt, 78 Wis. 633, 48 N. W. 52.

It is provided in section 399 of the Code of Civil Procedure that:

"The court to which an action or proceeding is transferred has and exercises over the same the like jurisdiction as if it had been originally commenced therein."

Therefore in the absence of an appeal there exists no doubt that the respondents lost all jurisdiction and power of every sort in the premises.

2. It is insisted by the learned judge of the court below that, in the ordinary divorce action, the power of the court to make further allowances pending an appeal is fully recognized, and in support of this position he cites the following cases: Reilly v. Keilly, 60 Cal. 626; Ex parte Winter, 70 Cal. 292, 11 Pac. 630; and Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 428, 27 Pac. 732. Without quoting from these cases at length, they may be summed up as holding that the lower court, in case of an appeal, retains sufficient jurisdiction to order further payments of alimony and counsel fees. While the authorities are far from uniform in other states, this doctrine in this state is too well settled to be open to question. This principle does not, however, obtain in a case wherein the place of trial has been changed. It is not to be doubted that some court has or retains the power to order additional alimony and counsel fees, but not the court from which the venue has been changed.

In the ordinary case, the entire jurisdiction in case of an appeal remains apportioned between the trial court and the appellate court. In the absence of a stay of proceedings all the powers which do not pass to the appellate court as appertaining to the disposition of the case on appeal remain with the lower court, and may be exercised by it. One of these powers is the right to award additional alimony and counsel fees.

But in the case now under examination the court made its unconditional order changing the place of trial. This order, as we have seen, operated, eo instanti, to change the jurisdiction to the new court. There is no provision for a stay of proceedings in case of a change of place of trial. Section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as pertinent, reads as follows:

"And except, also, where the order grants or refuses to grant a change of place of trial of the action."

An interval of time ensued between the making of the order changing the place of trial and the taking of the appeal. And hereat is found the crux of the whole matter. During this interval it is manifest that the only court having any powers in the premises was the San Francisco court. It could during that interval have granted additional allowances and have proceeded in every way with the trial or other disposition of the case. The appeal which was subsequently taken did not reinvest the Humboldt court with any of the powers which had already passed to the new court. A part of the order complained of provides for alimony for the support of the wife. In every view of the matter the San Francisco court, by the order of transfer, acquired jurisdiction to make or modify similar orders. Such co-ordinate and coequal jurisdiction cannot have existed at the same moment of time in each of the two courts.

The conclusion of the court is that the order of transfer vested the entire jurisdiction in the San Francisco court, and that this order became operative immediately upon its entry. All subsequent proceedings in the Humboldt court are null and void.

Let a writ of prohibition issue as prayed for.

ROBINSON v. CLEMONS. (Civ. 2066, L. A. 5449.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 22, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 20, 1920.)

1. Highways $\Leftarrow$ 184(2) — Evidence held to show that defendant's vehicle approaching intersection was not under control.

In an action for damages resulting from a collision between automobiles at an intersection of highways, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the speed at which defendant was traveling was not such as to keep the car under his control, so as to permit vehicles on his right to pass, as required by a statute enacted in 1913.

2. Highways $\Leftarrow$ 184(2) — Evidence held to show ordinary care by plaintiff automobilist at intersection.

In an action for damages resulting from a collision of automobiles at a crossroads, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that there was no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, independent of statute, in approaching the crossing at 12 to 15 miles per hour.

3. Highways $\Leftarrow$ 177 — Automobilist about to cross intersection may assume car will not approach at excessive speed.

An automobilist reaching an intersection when another automobile on the intersecting street was 100 to 150 feet away could properly assume that such other car was not violating rules of prudence by excessive speed and that he had plenty of time to cross, and act accordingly.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Highways $\Leftarrow$ 177—Violation of speed law does not prevent recovery unless contributing to accident.

A violation of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 639), regulating the speed of an automobile on approaching an intersecting way where the view of the road traffic is obstructed, will not prevent a recovery for damages caused by a collision, where such violation could not have contributed to the accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by L. F. Robinson against H. B. Clemons. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Earl E. Moss, of Ventura, for appellant.

John A. Galvin, of Fillmore, for respondent.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages resulting from a collision between an automobile he was driving with one that was being driven by the defendant. The accident occurred at the town of El Rio, Ventura county, at about 8 o'clock of the morning of December 24, 1915. At that time the plaintiff was driving in a southerly direction on a crossroad towards the city of Oxnard and the defendant was driving in a westerly direction on the state highway towards Ventura.

We gather from the record that these two roads do not cross each other at a right angle. The highway runs somewhat in a northwesterly direction; the northeast corner of the intersection being at an obtuse angle and the northwest corner an acute angle. The plaintiff was driving at a speed of between 12 and 15 miles per hour. As he reached the north line of the state highway, he observed the defendant coming towards him at a distance of from 100 to 150 feet. The plaintiff proceeded across the highway a distance of about 35 feet when his car was struck by the defendant's, broken and injured, and himself hurt. The defendant's car was also damaged somewhat.

It is the claim of the appellant that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence that brought on the injury. Thus, negligence is predicated on the claim that the state law then in force provided:

"That in any event no person shall operate * * * a motor * * * on any public highway * * * at a greater rate of speed than ten miles an hour when the operator's * * * view of the road * * * is obstructed, either upon approaching an intersecting way or in traversing a crossing or intersection of ways."

This charge of excessive speed against the plaintiff by the defendant does not come with very good grace from him, when we consider the speed with which he himself was traveling. The evidence shows that while plaintiff was traveling 35 feet the defendant traveled 100 or 150 feet. If the plaintiff, with a speed of 15 miles per hour, traveled 35 feet, while the defendant, approaching a crossing, traveled 100 feet, then the defendant was traveling at the rate of 42.9 miles per hour. If the distance covered by the defendant was 150 feet, while the plaintiff was going 35 feet, as is probable from the evidence, then his rate of speed was 64.2 miles per hour. But from other considerations the appellant's position is untenable.

1. The Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 did not go into effect until after this accident. By its terms it was not to be in effect, as to such matters as are here involved, until December 31, 1915. Stats. 1915, § 22, subd. d, p. 410. The act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 639) was in force, but it did not contain any provision similar to the above in the act of 1915. It merely provided:

"Vehicles approaching an intersecting road," etc., "shall be under control of the operator thereof so as to permit vehicles on the right of the vehicles approaching to first cross such intersecting road."

[1] The defendant violated this provision of the act of 1913. The court could well find from the evidence that the speed he was traveling was not such as to keep the car under his control so as to permit vehicles on the right to pass, and he violated it in not giving the plaintiff, who was to his right, the right of way and permitting him to cross in safety. As to the plaintiff, the court was justified in finding that his speed of from 12 to 15 miles per hour did not cause the car to be "not under his control." Again, the plaintiff's rate of speed did not bring on the collision and injury.

The Civil Code, § 1714, in defining negligence and contributory negligence, uses this language:

"Every one is responsible, not only for the result of his willful acts, but also for all injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property or person, except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself."

[2, 3] Did the plaintiff, by want of ordinary care, bring the injury upon himself? The court was justified by the evidence in making a finding that there was no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff in approaching the crossing at 12 to 15 miles per hour. The judge of the lower court stated that he was thoroughly familiar with the scene of the accident. This being so, he knew the width of the intersecting roads, the angle at which they crossed each other, and the presence or absence of obstructions to view, and it was for him to decide whether a speed of from 12 to 15 miles per hour at that particular place was an exhibition of a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff. Any one, the most careful, about to cross a highway and observing another vehicle approaching at a distance of from 100 to 150 feet, would not deem it necessary to stop or to do any particular thing to avoid a collision. He would properly assume and have a right to assume that the other car was not violating all rules of prudence by excessive speed; that he had plenty of time to cross and act accordingly. This would be the attitude of any reasonable man under the circumstances, and therefore the plaintiff was not guilty of a want of ordinary care in pursuing his journey. His speed of from 12 to 15 miles per hour did not cause the trouble. It may be that the slowness of his driving did. Perhaps, if he had been traveling 20 miles an hour instead of 15, the accident would have been avoided.

We have examined the evidence and are of the opinion that the findings of the court as to the amount of the damages sustained by the plaintiff have sufficient evidence to support them. We are also of the opinion that there was no failure to find upon any material issue raised by the pleadings.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The statement in the opinion that there was no provision in the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 similar to that contained in the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, regulating the speed on approaching an intersecting way where the view of the road traffic is obstructed, is apparently erroneous. However, it sufficiently appears that any possible violation of this provision by plaintiff did not contribute to the accident.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

PEOPLE v. GILMAN. (Cr. 693.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. April 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §371(12)—Evidence of assault on another subsequent to killing held admissible to show motive.

In a trial for murdering an officer, the defense being resistance to unlawful arrest, testimony regarding accused's assault on a woman immediately after the killing held competent, as tending to show accused's motive was anger growing out of the previous quarrel, in which they had all participated, and not resistance to his arrest.

2. Homicide §272—Question of resistance of illegal arrest held for jury.

In trial for murder of an officer, the defense being resistance of an unlawful arrest, the question of illegal arrest held for the jury on the issue whether accused was disturbing the peace so that deceased was authorized in arresting him under Pen. Code, §§ 836, 837, without a warrant.

3. Homicide §55—Resistance of illegal arrest reduces killing to manslaughter.

Where in resistance to an illegal arrest the extreme of taking the life of the officer is resorted to, the homicide cannot at most be more than manslaughter.

4. Homicide §55—For murder to be reduced to manslaughter on ground of resistance of illegal arrest actual resistance must appear.

For killing an officer to be reduced from murder to manslaughter on the plea of resistance of illegal arrest, there must be evidence, not only of an illegal arrest, but also that the killing was done in actual resistance to the act of making the arrest or in maintaining the illegal custody of accused, and a person merely formally restrained by a verbal notice that he is under arrest for a misdemeanor cannot respond by shooting to death the officer, and escape the charge of murder on the ground that he was protecting his liberty from illegal restraint.

5. Homicide §55—Resistance to illegal arrest not shown by facts.

Where accused, placed under arrest by an officer, had gone into his own house ostensibly to get his hat and coat, and, instead of asserting his freedom by refusing to return to the officer's custody, armed himself, and, returning to where the officer waited, for the purpose, as he himself declared, of ordering the officer from the premises, shot him down, without giving him a chance to leave or waiting for any overt act in attempted furtherance of the alleged illegal arrest, accused's claim that the killing was reduced to manslaughter as having occurred in the resistance of illegal arrest could not prevail.

6. Homicide §348—Failure to give instruction not reversible error, where absence of such instruction probably not prejudicial.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, in a murder trial, refusal of instruction as to resistance of illegal arrest as reducing the killing to manslaughter held not reversible, even if technical error, where the circumstances shown in the evidence were such as to render it extremely improbable that the absence of such instruction was in any way prejudicial to accused, or at all affected the jury's verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Lewis H. Gilman was convicted of first degree murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Shreve & Shreve and George H. Shreve, all of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SLOANE, J. The defendant and appellant was convicted before a jury in the superior court of the county of San Diego of murder in the first degree.

The circumstances leading up to the tragedy were substantially as follows: The defendant and his wife, on the morning of May 17, 1919, were in the kitchen of their house on the outskirts of the village of La Mesa. Just across the street lived a family by the name of Parks. One Miller, the brother of Mrs. Parks, on the occasion in question, fired his shotgun at a rabbit in the distance. The defendant and his wife, startled by the shot, and appearing to think the shot was aimed in their direction, ran out of the house, and, approaching Miller, who had fired from the Parks' grounds, accused him of shooting in the direction of and into defendant's house. The parties thereupon engaged in an altercation over the matter; Miller disclaiming shooting in the direction of the house. Different members of the Parks family came upon the scene, and the testimony is to the effect that defendant became much excited and very abusive. During the altercation the decedent, Fay, who was a special deputy sheriff, came upon the scene of action. He announced that he was an officer. The defendant demanded the arrest of Miller for unlawful shooting. Miller then explained that he had been shooting at a rabbit, and pointed out to Fay the place from which he shot, the location of the rabbit, and the direction of the shots. Miller's statement, according to the testimony of the people's witnesses, greatly angered defendant, and he applied a number of very offensive, vulgar, and opprobrious epithets to Miller and other members of the Parks family, in the presence and hearing of Fay and the women and children of the Parks family. The language and conduct, as testified to on the part of the people, clearly constituted a breach of the peace. Fay then ordered Gilman from the premises, and apparently took him into custody, leading him away toward defendant's own home. On approaching the house, defendant went in advance of Fay and defendant's wife, who had accompanied them back from the scene of the altercation, and entered the house, while Fay remained on the porch or just in front of the steps on the outside. In a very short time defendant reappeared with a revolver in his hand, and immediately opened fire upon Fay, shooting him twice and killing him instantly. He then, without stopping, hurried across the street toward the Parks' home, where Mrs. Parks and her mother and the children were standing outside. He fired the pistol, and the women and children ran. He overtook Mrs. Parks, tried to shoot her, but she diverted the shot by grasping his arm. He then threw her to the ground and beat her over the head with the pistol. She was rescued by Miller, her brother, who sprang upon the defendant from a window, held him down upon the ground, and beat him into submission; and he was then again taken into custody.

[1] Subject to two assignments of error presented on this appeal, there is no question that the conviction of the defendant for murder in the first degree was amply justified under the law and evidence of the case. One of the grounds of error relied on is the admission in evidence, over the objection of defendant's counsel, of the testimony regarding the assault upon Mrs. Parks by the defendant immediately after the killing of Fay. It is claimed that this was a subsequent and independent offense, not a part of the res gestæ, and the testimony thereof extremely prejudicial to defendant. The general rule that evidence of another offense cannot be introduced for the purpose of indicating a likelihood that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged is undisputed. The exception to the rule, as pointed out in People v. Edwards, 13 Cal. App. 551, 110 Pac. 342, is where the evidence of other acts is so connected with the original transaction as to be part of the res gestæ, or to show the motive and intent of the act charged. In this case the only justification suggested for the shooting of Fay was that it was done in resisting an illegal arrest. We think the fact that the defendant, without a moment's hesitation or delay, rushed from the scene of the first shooting, in an attempt upon the lives of members of the Parks family, was competent evidence tending to show that the motive which impelled him in both instances was anger and resentment growing out of the previous quarrel and altercation in which they all had participated; and that it was not in resistance to an arrest, but in resentment at the part that the deceased and the members of the Parks family had taken against him, that he entered upon his murderous purpose. The facts in People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 59, 130 Pac. 1044, present a closely analogous case, where the court says:

"There was no error in permitting the people to prove the assault upon Molina, following the firing of the shot that killed Avila. The general rule is, of course, that evidence of offenses other than the one for which the defendant is on trial is not admissible. But where the two offenses are part of a single transaction, every element of defendant's conduct in that transaction could be shown to the jury for the purpose of illustrating his motive and intent in committing the act which was the basis of the charge against him' (People v. Manasse, 153 Cal. 10 [94 Pac. 92]; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141 [32 Pac. 864]; People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 468 [44 Pac. 186]; People v. Teixeira, 123 Cal. 298 [55 Pac. 988]; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 363 [75 Pac. 1093]). It was the theory of the prosecution—and the theory was entirely reasonable under the evidence—that the shooting of Avila and the assault on Molina were parts of one attack upon the two, perpetrated in pursuance of a single scheme to terrorize or injure them because they were working for the Llewellyn Iron Works. Whatever was done in the course of that attack was proper as throwing light on the motive and intent of O'Bryan and his companions."

[2-4] The other exception taken by appellant is to the ruling of the trial court in refusing an instruction in behalf of defendant to the effect that where the evidence shows that a homicide is committed in resisting an unlawful arrest, the ground of conviction is limited to manslaughter. Defendant, corroborated to some extent by the testimony of his wife, denied that he was guilty of any tumultuous or offensive conduct, or used any vulgar, profane, or indecent language in the presence of Fay and the other persons present at the time of the arrest. As Fay was only a special officer, he was without official authority to make arrests without a warrant, and under the authority of Penal Code, §§ 836, 837, could only have legally arrested defendant for a breach of the peace committed in his immediate presence, either in official capacity or as a private person. While the evidence on this matter is such as to render it extremely unlikely that the jury entertained a reasonable doubt that defendant was disturbing the peace at the time of his arrest, the evidence to the contrary was such as to make the question of an illegal arrest one for their consideration. It cannot be doubted that the doctrine contended for by appellant, and stated in the opinion of the court in People v. Dallen, 21 Cal. App. 770, 132 Pac. 1064, that "where, in resistance to an illegal arrest, the extreme of taking the life of the officer is resorted to, the homicide cannot at most be more than manslaughter," finds support in a well-recognized line of authority. Ross v. State, 10 Tex. App. 455, 38 Am. Rep. 643; Briggs v. Commonwealth, 82 Va. 564; Wharton's Crim. Law, vol. 1, § 136, and citations. To admit, however, the application of this doctrine there must be evidence, not only that there was an illegal arrest, but that the killing was done in actual resistance to the act of making the arrest or maintaining the illegal custody of the defendant. It cannot be admitted that a person who is merely formally restrained by a verbal notice that he is under arrest for a misdemeanor can respond by shooting to death the officer, and escape the charge of murder on the ground that he was protecting his liberty from illegal restraint. 2 R. C. L. p. 474; Roberson v. State, 43 Fla. 156, 29 South. 535, 52 L. R. A. 751; State v. Meyers, 57 Or. 50, 110 Pac. 407, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 143; Porter v. State, 124 Ga. 297, 52 S. E. 283, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 730.

[5] In this case the arrest was effected by notifying defendant that he was under arrest, and perhaps by the further placing of hands upon him to direct him from the premises. Had he at that time resisted, and, in a struggle to regain his freedom, killed the arresting person, there might be room for the application of the doctrine contended for. But the homicide here occurred some time after the arrest, while the defendant was out of the physical control of the officer. Defendant had gone into his own house, ostensibly to get his coat and hat. Instead of asserting his freedom by refusing to return to the custody of the officer, he armed himself, and, returning to where the officer waited, for the purpose, as he himself declares, of ordering him from the premises, shot him down, without giving him a chance to leave or waiting for any overt act in attempted furtherance of the alleged illegal arrest. The testimony of the defendant and his wife as to the alleged act of Fay in making a movement and reaching out his arm toward the defendant, who was approaching him with a gun in his hand, presents too trivial a circumstance to in any way justify the shooting. At the time of the homicide the deceased was using no force or show of force toward the defendant. In People v. Bradley, 23 Cal. App. 44, 136 Pac. 955, where a special policeman in plain clothes arrested a man on suspicion, without revealing his identity as a peace officer, and the prisoner, while walking with the officer to the jail, suddenly turned into an alley and shot the officer, it is held that the killing was not justifiable, nor was the act reduced from murder to manslaughter. The court says:

"We are satisfied that the evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty of a willful and malicious murder. Not even the semblance of a legal excuse is shown for the killing of the deceased. It may be conceded that the evidence does not show that the arrest of the defendant was authorized, and that therefore it was a trespass against the person of the defendant, which might have been rightfully resisted with the same degree of force employed in making the arrest. The evidence, however, affirmatively shows that no force or show of force was resorted to by the deceased at any time. The mere fact that the deceased failed to reveal his identity as a peace officer, and the further fact that the arrest was apparently unauthorized and not made in strict accord with the forms required by law, may have justified the defendant in breaking the arrest, but such facts alone were wholly inadequate either to justify the killing of the deceased or to reduce such killing from murder to manslaughter. People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 573; Keady v. People, 32 Colo. 57, 66 L. R. A. 353, 74 Pac. 893."

[6] The instruction asked by appellant and refused by the court was as follows:

"The court instructs you that if you find from the evidence that the decedent, Fay, was attempting to make an unlawful arrest of the person of the defendant, Gilman, and that the killing occurred while the defendant was resisting such unlawful arrest, it will then be your duty to acquit the defendant of the charge of murder, both of the first and second degree, and consider only the question of whether or not he be guilty of manslaughter."

We are satisfied that there was no sufficient evidence before the jury that the shooting was done in resisting an arrest to justify the instruction. Even if technically a proper instruction, the circumstances of the shooting, as shown in evidence, were such as to render it extremely improbable that its absence was in any way prejudicial to the defendant, or at all affected the verdict of the jury; and the error, if there was such, might be disregarded under section 41½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

Judgment affirmed.

TYLER v. J. I. METROVICH BLDG. CO., Inc., et al. SUNSET LUMBER CO. v. SAME. HENRY COWELL LIME & CEMENT CO. v. SAME. (Civ. 3256.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1920.)

1. Action ⇨59—Allegations of complaints in consolidated actions may be taken together to remedy defects.

Actions having been consolidated for trial, the allegations of the various complaints may be taken together and treated as one pleading; the allegations in one complaint remedying the defects or omissions in another.

2. Fraud ⇨50—Must be proved.

The presumption is always against fraud, which can be put in issue only by direct and positive allegations, and must be proved.

3. Mechanics' liens ⇨229—Claimant entitled to judgment of foreclosure, irrespective of amount due contractor from owner, who did not file bond.

When no bond to satisfy materialmen and laborers, with good and sufficient sureties, has been filed by the owner in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, a lien claimant is entitled to judgment to foreclose his lien on the land of the owner, irrespective of the amount due from the owner to the contractor.

4. Mechanics' liens ⇨226—Where bond filed, court must restrict recovery from owner to amount due contractor.

Where a bond to satisfy laborers and materialmen, with good and sufficient sureties, in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, is filed by the owner, if it is equitable to do so, the court must restrict a lien claimant's recovery to the aggregate amount found due the contractor.

5. Mechanics' liens ⇨271(1)—Claimant must allege that statute relative to owner's bond has not been met.

To entitle a lien claimant to foreclose on the property irrespective of the amount due from the owner to the contractor, it is essential to allege that the terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, relative to bond to be given by the owner to satisfy laborers and materialmen, have not been met.

6. Election of remedies ⇨3(2)—Lien claimants cannot enforce bond against sureties, and set up invalidity to enable them to go against owner.

A party cannot denounce a contract as void, and at the same time demand enforcement of its provisions favorable to him, so that mechanic's lien claimants cannot enforce against the sureties bond given by the owner, and at the same time seek recovery against the owner on the theory of the invalidity or insufficiency of the bond.

7. Mechanics' liens ⇨223—Bond need not be filed personally by owner or contractor.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, does not require that the bond to satisfy materialmen and laborers shall be personally filed for record either by owner or contractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Consolidated actions by G. L. Tyler, doing business under the name and style of G. L. Tyler Company, the Sunset Lumber Company, and the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, respectively, against the J. I. Metrovich Building Company, Incorporated, Adolph D. Grabstein, Max Grabstein, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Grabstein appeal. Reversed.

R. N. Wolfe, of Pittsburgh, and J. E. White, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ralph H. Wight, of Martinez, for respondent Tyler.

C. L. Colvin, of Oakland, for respondent Sunset Lumber Co.

G. G. Hatch, of San Francisco, for respondent Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Co.

Creed, Jones & Dall, of San Francisco, for respondent Contra Costa Bank and others.

NOURSE, J. This is a joint appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in three consolidated cases, brought to foreclose their several liens for services and materials furnished to the contractor under a written contract for the construction of a building on the lands of the defendants Grabstein, the owners, and to recover deficiency judgments against the contractor and the sureties upon his bond. Judgment was rendered as prayed in the several complaints, and the owners alone appealed.

The allegations of the complaints relating to the execution of the contract, the filing of the liens within due time, the furnishing of the labor and material, and the amounts due the respective plaintiffs therefor were all admitted. The three actions having been duly consolidated and coming on regularly for trial, a stipulation was made that certain allegations of the complaints were true, and that a bond in proper form was filed, but it was left open to the court to determine "whether the bond is sufficient in law." No other evidence was offered by the plaintiffs, and thereupon the defendants Grabstein moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain a judgment against them to enforce a lien upon their real property. This motion was denied, and the defendants declined to offer any evidence, whereupon judgment followed in favor of the plaintiffs as above stated.

There is but one point presented by the record, and that is: Upon whom rests the burden of proof that the sureties on the bond filed under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, are good and sufficient? The question of the sufficiency of the sureties upon this bond was not put in issue by any of the three complaints. In the Tyler complaint it was alleged that neither the owners nor the contractor filed a bond. But it was affirmatively alleged that one Cornelius did file a bond, and at the trial it was stipulated that such bond was in due form. The theory of this respondent was that the bond should have been personally filed for record by either the owner or the contractor. In the complaint of the Sunset Lumber Company it was alleged that a bond was duly executed, and was thereafter, before the commencement of the work under said contract, filed with the county recorder. A similar allegation appears in the complaint of the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, with the additional allegation that said bond was so made and executed for the purpose of complying with the laws of the state of California. In each of the actions a copy of the bond was made a part of the complaint, the contractor and the sureties upon the bond were made parties defendant, and deficiency judgments were rendered against the contractor and these sureties.

[1-5] The actions having been consolidated for trial, the allegations of the various complaints may be taken together and treated as one pleading; the allegations in one complaint remedying the defects or omissions in another. Olson-Mahoney Lumber Co. v. Dunne Investment Co., 30 Cal. App. 332, 351, 159 Pac. 178. Hence, if the bond was made and executed for the purpose of complying with the laws of the state of California, as alleged in the complaint of the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, it is to be presumed that the defendants did not commit a fraud by filing a "straw" bond, as argued by respondents. The presumption is always against fraud. It can be put in issue only by direct and positive allegations and must be proved. When no bond has been filed, with good and sufficient sureties, in compliance with section 1183, the lien claimant is entitled to a judgment to foreclose his lien upon the land of the owner, irrespective of the amount due from the owner to the contractor. But where such a bond is filed, and it is equitable to do so, the court must restrict recovery from the owner to the aggregate amount found due from the owner to the contractor. In order to entitle the lien claimant to a foreclosure upon the property irrespective of the amount due from the owner to the contractor, it is essential to allege that the terms of this section have not been met.

[6] Furthermore, it is elementary that a party cannot denounce a contract as void, and at the same time demand enforcement of its provisions favorable to him. Here all the plaintiffs assumed that the bond was good and joined the sureties as parties defendant, and the court gave judgment against each of the sureties in accordance with the prayers of the complaints. They thus put in issue the bond in its entirety, without any allegations in their complaints sufficient to apprise defendants that at the time of the trial they would attack its validity.

[7] On behalf of the respondent Tyler it is argued that the requirements of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, were not met, because the bond was actually filed for record by one Cornelius, who appears to have been the architect for the owner. But the section does not require that either the owner or the contractor shall personally file the bond for record.

For the reasons given the judgment is reversed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; BRITTAIN, J.

47 Cal. App. 107

Ex parte GILLETT. (Cr. 719.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 13, 1920.)

1. Arrest $\Leftrightarrow$ 29—Affidavit for arrest, on ground that defendant was guilty of conversion as agent, insufficient.

An affidavit for arrest, made by the assistant secretary of a corporation, setting forth that property described was that of the corporation until the fraudulent conversion of money arising from the sale thereof by defendant, with whom the property was placed as the corporation's agent, etc., is insufficient to warrant an arrest under Code Civ. Proc. § 479, subd. 2, authorizing arrest in case of embezzlement by an agent; the remainder of the affidavit alleging that the defendant at times actually unknown, but believed to be on or about two years next preceding the bringing of the suit, did unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently convert to his own use and sell the described property, etc., for it did not appear that the fiduciary relation existed at the time of the misappropriation.

2. Arrest $\Leftrightarrow$ 27—Affidavit on information and belief, and not stating facts, held insufficient.

Where an affidavit as a whole, made by an officer of a corporation seeking the arrest of a defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 479, subd.

4, on the ground that he had fraudulently converted property of the corporation, showed that the officer had no personal knowledge of the transaction, and the facts on which information and belief was founded were not given, such affidavit is insufficient, under section 481, notwithstanding many of the averments as to fraudulent misappropriation, taken by themselves, did not appear to be made on information and belief.

3. Arrest — 29—Affidavit should set forth more than mere conclusion of fraud.

An affidavit seeking defendant's arrest, under Code Civ. Proc. § 479, subd. 4, providing for arrest in case of fraudulent conversion, etc., which merely set forth that defendant had fraudulently misappropriated property, without averring the circumstances, is insufficient to justify an order of arrest, in view of the fact that such averment would not support a judgment in a civil action.

Application by F. F. Gillett for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County, to secure release from custody. Petitioner discharged.

M. M. Meyers, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. C. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The petitioner is seeking under this writ to secure his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Los Angeles county. The sheriff justifies the detention of petitioner under an order of arrest issued by the superior court of Los Angeles county by virtue of the provisions of section 479 of the Code of Civil Procedure for arrest and bail in civil actions. It is contended by petitioner that the affidavit under which the arrest was ordered is not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order.

The affidavit purports to be in pursuance of subdivisions 2 and 4 of said section 479. Under subdivision 2 it is apparently sought to charge the defendant with having converted to his own use and embezzled money or property belonging to the plaintiff while the same was in defendant's custody in a fiduciary employment as agent of plaintiff, and in the course of his employment as such agent. Under subdivision 4 it is attempted to charge the defendant with fraud in concealing or disposing of the property for the detention or conversion of which the action is brought. At any rate, if the affidavit does not state facts bringing the matter within these provisions of the subdivisions named, it is wholly and hopelessly futile.

[1] The matters alleged in the affidavit, so far as they are material in determining the objections to its sufficiency, are as follows:

"R. H. Chappel, being first duly sworn, deposes and says: I am the assistant treasurer of the Standard Scale & Supply Company, a corporation, plaintiff herein; that at all of the times herein alleged the property hereinafter described was the property of plaintiff herein, until the fraudulent conversion of the money arising from the sale thereof by defendant, with whom all of said personal property was placed by plaintiff, as plaintiff's agent; * * * that defendant herein, at times actually unknown to affiant and plaintiff corporation, but believed to be on or about two years next preceding the bringing of the suit herein, did unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently convert to his own use and dispose of and sell the hereinbefore described personal property, with the intent to cheat and defraud plaintiff of said personal property and the value thereof; that defendant has received the full value of said property in money, and has unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently refused to pay to plaintiff, or account to plaintiff, for said money, and no part of the money so received therefrom by the defendant has ever been delivered to or paid to plaintiff. * * *

It is apparent that an essential of an affidavit, to justify the order of arrest under subdivision 2, is that the misappropriation or conversion of the property occurred in the course of the defendant's employment as agent of plaintiff. The fact that he was at any time such agent is only impliedly stated, by referring to the defendant as one "with whom all of said property was placed by plaintiff, as plaintiff's agent." This averment, such as it is, refers to the time when the property was intrusted to defendant. The time when the alleged misappropriation took place is expressly declared to be unknown to affiant or plaintiff, and it is nowhere intimated that the fiduciary relation existed at that time, or that the acts complained of were in the course of his employment.

[2] As to the averment charging fraudulent conversion under subdivision 4 of the section, it may be said to be substantially in the language of the statute. It has been held that an affidavit charging the acts substantially in the language of the statute is sufficiently specific, if the allegations are made upon affiant's own knowledge of the facts. Matter of Caples, 26 Cal. App. 786, 148 Pac. 795; In re Keene, 34 Cal. App. 263, 167 Pac. 194. In the latter decision the court says:

"The affidavit upon which an order of arrest in a civil action is asked need not state the evidentiary facts upon which the principal fact rests, if instead thereof the affidavit follows the statute and declares in positive terms that such principal fact exists."

But it is further added in the opinion that—

"This is subject, of course, to the qualification that, if the facts stated in the affidavit show that necessarily affiant is acting only on information and belief other than actual knowledge, then the evidentiary facts must be stated."

The affiant in this case describes himself as the assistant treasurer of the plaintiff corporation, as of the date of the affidavit. It does not appear how far back his connection with the plaintiff company extended, or whether he had any personal knowledge of its transactions, and, as already pointed out, he expressly avers that the alleged wrongful acts of defendant occurred "at times actually unknown to affiant and plaintiff corporation, but believed to be on or about two years next preceding the bringing of the suit herein." How long prior to the date of the affidavit the suit was begun does not appear. In any event, it must be apparent that affiant had no personal knowledge of how or why or when, if at all, defendant disposed of plaintiff's property. It is at least a fair presumption that, if he had no knowledge during a period of more than two years after the happening of the event that there had been a conversion of plaintiff's goods, he was not in a position to testify on his own knowledge of the manner and nature of the conversion. Such presumption was entertained in Ex parte Fkumoto, 120 Cal. 316, 52 Pac. 728, where it is said:

"Several of the statements of fact are made expressly on information and belief, while many others, although not so stated in terms, are of a character which could in their nature only have been so made, whereas the facts upon which such information and belief are founded are in no instance given. In this the affidavit fails to comply with one of the express * * * requirements of the statute" (Code of Civil Procedure, § 481).

[3] It is difficult to understand how, even on the most positive statement of personal knowledge, the bare averment that the act was done fraudulently can be accepted as a statement of fact in support of an order of arrest, whereby in a civil action a defendant is deprived of his liberty, when the same statement would constitute an insufficient averment of the fraud in the complaint to recover the money or property claimed to be misappropriated. Heller v. Dyerville Mfg. Co., 116 Cal. 127, 47 Pac. 1016; Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 53 Pac. 26. Fraud is the gist of this proceeding. Its existence should be determined from the evidence stated, and not as a conclusion of the affiant.

"Where no prosecution for perjury would lie against the affiant, predicated upon the falsity of any of the matters set forth in the complaint, it is radically insufficient." Peterson v. Nesbitt, 11 Cal. App. 370, 105 Pac. 135.

In Ex parte Fkumoto, supra, the court, while impliedly conceding that allegations of fact made in the words of the statute are sufficiently stated, in discussing the requisite proof of fraud under an affidavit in arrest and bail, says:

"It is not enough to assert such fraudulent intent in general terms. Like the statement or proof of a cause of action for fraud, the specific facts relied on must be shown, that the court itself may deduce the fraud, and not leave the question of the sufficiency of his facts to be passed upon by the party. Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 107. If this is so in cases not involving the liberty of a citizen, a fortiori is it demanded in a proceeding such as this. Otherwise the party is constituted the arbiter of his own rights." "A warrant of arrest cannot be issued on hearsay, nor upon any statement, however positive, founded upon hearsay." Lay v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 558, 105 Pac. 775.

It may be added that such warrant of arrest cannot be made upon the mere statement of a conclusion of law.

In this case the defendant, petitioner here, seems to have come lawfully into the possession of the property involved. It does not appear when it was delivered to him, but it is admitted that for a period of two years or upwards the plaintiff corporation had had no knowledge of its condition or whereabouts, or the circumstances under which the petitioner disposed of it. It would be the establishment of a dangerous precedent to permit the petitioner here to be deprived of his liberty upon the bare statement of a conclusion or opinion of the assistant treasurer of the company that there was a fraudulent conversion of the goods.

The petitioner is discharged.

BAYLESS v. REED et al. (Civ. 3186.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 16, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨175(2) — Appellate court cannot render judgment for amount due plaintiff to save expenses of another trial.

Under Const. art. 6, §§ 4, 4½, the appellate court, in an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, cannot find for plaintiff the amount due him to avoid the expense and necessity of another trial in the case.

2. Husband and wife ⇨259—Wife's earnings held community property.

The earnings of a wife for her services as nurse, sought to be recovered by her husband in an action against a decedent's estate, are community property.

3. Witnesses ⇨143(5)—Wife not incompetent as assignor of husband in his action against decedent's estate to recover for wife's services.

Where a husband is suing for services rendered by his wife to a person since deceased, his claim is not derived from his wife, since he is entitled to the value of her services by virtue of his marital rights; hence she is a competent witness for him, her testimony not being excluded by Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, excluding testimony of parties or assignors of parties in such cases.

4. Witnesses — 138—Statute excluding testimony in action against decedent's estate applies only to parties and assignors.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, excluding the testimony of parties or assignors of parties in actions against a decedent's estate, was not intended to extend the disqualification to any other persons except parties or assignors of parties.

5. Witnesses — 140(9)—Wife not incompetent because of interest in husband's action against decedent's estate to recover for her services.

In an action by a husband against a decedent's estate to recover for his wife's services, the fact that should plaintiff recover the wife would be interested in the result, the fruits of such recovery being community property, does not make her an incompetent witness under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by C. R. Bayless against J. F. Reed and another, as executors of the last will of Edwin Ferris, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.
